STUDIES IN THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

INTRODUCTION.

1. THE WONDERFUL CHARACTER OF THE PSALMS.

THE Psalms are wonderful. They have been read, repeated, chanted, sung, studied, wept over, rejoiced in, expounded, loved and praised by God's people for thousands of years. The most ancient of these productions is now [1866] three thousand three hundred and twenty-six years old. The least ancient of them is two thousand four hundred and fifty-three years old. The difference in date between the most ancient and the most modern of them is eight hundred and seventy-three years. They were all written in Asia, so that we in this Western World can have no national pride respecting them. Yet pious people here and all over the earth have found and can find no compositions more suitable for delineating their devout emotions, and for expressing their pious sensibilities than those of inspired Psalmists. If to any man these songs are unsavory, the reason is found in the blindness and depravity of the human heart. Hengstenberg: "The Psalms are expressions of holy feeling, which can be understood by those only, who have become alive to such feeling."

Horne: "Composed upon particular occasions, yet designed for general use; delivered out as services for Israelites under the law, yet no less adapted to the circumstances of Christians under the Gospel, the Psalms present religion to us in the most engaging dress; communicating truths which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which poetry can never equal, while history is made the vehicle of prophecy, and creation lends all its charms to paint the glories of redemption. Calculated alike to profit and to please, they inform the understanding, elevate the affections, and entertain the imagination. Indited under the influence of Him to whom all hearts are known, and all events foreknown, they suit mankind in all situations, grateful as the manna which descended from above, and conformed itself to every palate. The fairest productions of human wit, after a few perusals, like gathered flowers, wither in our hands, and lose their fragraney; but these unfading plants of paradise become, as we are accustomed to them, still more and more beautiful; their bloom appears to be daily heightened; fresh odors are emitted, and new sweets extracted from them. He who hath once tasted their excellences will desire to taste them yet again; and he who tastes them oftenest will relish them best."

Other things being equal, he who has the most heavenly mind, will be the most successful student of the Psalms. Carnal tempers are ill suited to spiritual truths. The blind cannot see afar off. No natural acuteness, no learning, no amount of examination will answer the purpose unless we are taught from heaven and thus made docile. The best qualification for studying any portion of God's word is the influence of the Holy Spirit abiding in us, warming our cold hearts, giving us humbleness of mind, and right affections. Augustine: "Form thy spirit by the affection of the Psalm. . . If the Psalm breathes the spirit of prayer, do you pray; if it is filled with groanings, groan also thyself; if it is gladsome, do thou rejoice also; if it encourages hope, then hope thou in God; if it calls to godly fear, then tremble thou before the divine majesty; for all things herein contained are mirrors to reflect our own real characters. . . Let the heart do what the words signify."

Cassian: "That we may enjoy this treasure, it is necessary that we say the Psalms with the same spirit with which they were composed, and accommodate them unto ourselves in the same manner as if every one of us had composed them, or as if the Psalmist had directed them purposely for our uses; not satisfying ourselves that they had their whole completion in or by the Prophet, but discerning every one of us our own parts still to be performed and acted over in the Psalmist's words, by exciting in ourselves the same affections which we discern to have been in David, or in others at that time, loving when he loves, fearing when he fears, hoping when he hopes, praising God when he praises, weeping for our own or others' sins when he weeps, begging what we want with the like spirit wherein his petitions are framed, loving our enemies when he shows love to his, praying for ours when he prays for his, having zeal for the glory of God when the Psalmist professes it, humbling ourselves when he is humbled, lifting up our spirit to heaven when he lifts up his, giving thanks for God's mercies when he doth, delighting and rejoicing in the beauty of the Messiah, and of the Church his spouse, when he is delighted and rejoiceth; when he relates the wonderful works of God in the creation of the world, bringing his people out of Egypt, etc., admiring and glorifying God as he stands amazed and glorifies him; and when he mentions the punishments inflicted on rebellious sinners, and rewards and favors bestowed on the obedient, we likewise are to tremble when he trembles, and exult when he exults, and walk in the court of heaven, the sanctuary, as he walks, and wish to dwell in it as he wishes. Finally, where he as a master teaches, exhorts, reprehends, and directs the just man, each of us must suppose him speaking to him, and answer him in such due manner as the instruction of such a master exacts." That we may in some measure perform this vital substantial part of our task, "Let us at the beginning of the Psalm, beg of God that light and affection, and gust and savor, with which David was affected when he made it, and that with the affection and desire of obtaining what he felt." As well might men hope that improvements in agriculture would render unnecessary the rain of heaven, as that any advancement in Biblical science would make us independent of the grace and Spirit of God, imparting to us right tempers and right views.

2. TESTIMONY OF COMMENTATORS.

Many, who have written on the Psalms, have left their testimony to the pleasantness of their labors. They seem to have been walking through the green pastures and by the still waters. Thus Calvin: "If the reading of these COMMENTARIES confer as much benefit on the church of God as I myself have reaped advantage from the composition of them, I shall have no reason to regret that I have undertaken this work."

Horne: "And now, could the author flatter himself, that any one would take half the pleasure in reading the following exposition, which he hath taken in writing it, he would not fear the loss of his labor. The employment detached him from the bustle and hurry of life, the din of politics, and the noise of folly; vanity and vexation flew away for a season, care and disquietude came not near his dwelling. He arose fresh as the morning to his task; the silence of the night invited him to pursue it: and he can truly say, that food and rest were not preferred before it. Every Psalm improved infinitely on his acquaintance with it; and no one gave him uneasiness but the last; for then he grieved that his work was done. Happier hours than those which have been spent on these Songs of Sion, he never expects to see in this world. Very pleasantly did they pass, and moved swiftly along: for when thus engaged, he counted no time. They are gone, but have left a relish and a fragrance upon the mind, and the remembrance of them is sweet." Chalmers quotes this experience of Horne as "an actual specimen of heaven upon earth, as enjoyed for a season of devotional contemplation on the word of God."

Morison speaks of his labors in this department as "a delightful task," and says, "Should the benefit of perusing this exposition be equal to that which has attended the writing of it, it will not be consulted in vain. Truly it has proved a source of spiritual excitement to the author, for which he hopes ever to be grateful to the God of his life. It has tended to endear the retirements of the closet, and to discover beauties in the word of God, which never fell with equal interest upon his mind."

Hengstenberg: "However this work may be received, the author has found an ample recompense in itself, and hopes that he shall be able to look back upon it with pleasure, even in eternity."

During a Christian and ministerial life, neither short, uneventful, nor free from dark days and sharp sorrows, the author has freely mingled with the suffering people of God of various names and conditions, and has never been able to secure to himself, or administer to others full support and abounding consolation without a resort to the Psalms. Here was always something well suited to every stage of religious experience and to every kind and degree of affliction. He has therefore preached much on texts chosen from this part of Scripture. This has been specially true of his weekly lecture, which he has maintained wherever he has exercised his ministry. And although this work has been prepared in the midst of other and pressing duties, yet he has often been refreshed by writing or revising even a paragraph. "Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." "Thy testimonies have I taken as an heritage forever; for they are the rejoicing of my heart."

3. THE PSALMS EXCELLENT.

The testimonies in favor of the Book of Psalms are numerous and striking. Athanasius calls it "an epitome of the whole Scriptures." Basil says it is "the common treasure of all good precepts . . . the voice of the church . . . a compendium of all theology." Ambrose: "The law instructs, history informs, prophecy predicts, correction censures, and morals exhort. In the Book of Psalms you find the fruit of all these, as well as a remedy for the salvation of the soul. The Psalter deserves to be called, the praise of God, the glory of man, the voice of the church, and the most beneficial confession of faith." Augustine: "What is there that may not be learned in the Psalms?" Luther: "The Psalter is a little Bible, and the summary of the Old Testament. One verse of the Psalms is sufficient for the meditation of a day; and he, who at the end of the day finds himself fully possessed of its sense and spirit, may consider his time well spent." Cassiodorus: "The Book of Psalms is splendid, illuminated with brightness, solacing the wounded heart, like the honey-comb refreshing the inner man, speaking the language of hidden virtues, inclining the proud to humility, making kings poor in spirit, yet gently nourishing and animating the timid and the feeble." Gerhard: "The Psalter is a theatre, where God allows us to behold both himself and his works; a most pleasant green field, a vast garden, where we see all manner of flowers; a paradise, having the most delicious flowers and fruits; a great sea in which are hid costly pearls; a heavenly school, where we have God for our teacher; a compend of all Scripture; a mirror of divine grace, reflecting the lovely face of our heavenly Father; and the anatomy of our souls." Melanethon says the Book of Psalms is "the most elegant work extant in the world." Calvin: "I have been accustomed to call this book, I think not inappropriately, 'an anatomy of the soul;' for there is not an emotion of which any one can be-conscious that is not here represented as in a mirror. Or rather, the Holy Spirit has here drawn to the life all the griefs, sorrows, fears, doubts, hopes, cares, perplexities, in short, all the distracting emotions with which the minds of men are wont to be agitated. . . . There is no other book in which are recorded so many deliverances, nor one in which the evidences and experiences of the fatherly providence and solicitude, which God exercises towards us, are celebrated with such splendor of diction, and yet with the strictest adherence to truth." Rivet, borrowing from one of the early Fathers, compares this book to Paradise, where grow all manner of fruits, and says that his object in his exposition is to show the beauty, and gather the fruit of this pleasant garden and place it before his readers. Hooker adopts and amplifies the language of Augustine on the subject. On his death-bed the learned Salmasius said, "O I have lost a world of time. If one year more were added to my life, it should be spent in reading David's Psalms and Paul's epistles." John Brent says, "You may rightly and fitly call the Psalter an epitome of the sacred books." Of these sacred songs John Milton says, "Not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition, they may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy to be incomparable." Sir Daniel K. Sandford: "In lyric flow and fire, in crushing force and majesty, that seems still to echo the awful sounds once heard beneath the thunder-clouds of Sinai, the poetry of the ancient Scriptures is the most superb that ever burned within the breast of man." Why should not such a book be studied from age to age? I marvel not that Jerome in his letter to Læta respecting the education of her grand-daughter, said, "Let her learn the Psalms." I am not surprised, when a pious, infirm friend, nearly eighty years old, writes to me saying, "I constantly read the Psalms, and often commit them to memory." Could a child of God on the verge of the grave have a more heavenly employment? Well does David Dickson speak of "this sweet-smelling bundle of Psalms." Dodd: "The Psalms are fitted to all persons and ages, to all manner of employments, and to all conditions and circumstances of life: but they have still one further excellence, that they contain a variety of striking prophecies concerning Christ and his church." Clarke: "I know nothing like the Book of Psalms: it contains all the lengths, breadths, depths, and heights of the Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Christian Dispensations. It is the most useful book in the Bible, and is every way worthy of the wisdom of God." Tholuck: "Piety, Jewish or Christian, if genuine, and not formal, has derived more nourishment from the Psalms than from any other source."

He cites beautiful testimonies to the same effect from the great statesman, Moser, from the classical Herder, and from the historian, John Mueller.

Mueller: "The Psalms teach one to prize a much tried life. . . David yields me every day the most delightful hour. There is nothing Greek, nothing Roman, nothing in the West, nor in the land towards midnight, to equal David, whom the God of Israel chose to praise him higher than the gods of the nations. The utterance of his mind sinks deep into the heart, and never in my life, never have I thus seen God."

Herder: "The use of the Psalms became the blessing of humanity, not only on account of their contents, but also on account of their form. . . For two thousand years have the Psalms frequently and differently been translated, and still there are many new formations of their much embracing and rich manner possible. . . The Psalter is the hymn-book for all times."

Moser: "How much comfort, light, and strength have the Psalms imparted to my fainting soul. I often not only missed the way, but lost the very trace of it. I sat me down as if I had become petrified. One word from the Psalms was a sunbeam to me; like a lark I settled on the pinions of that eagle; carried by her, I scaled the rock, and beheld from that eminence the world, with its cares and mine, stretched out beneath me; I acquired to think, infer, mourn, pray, wait, hope, and speak in the spirit of David. I thank thee, O Lord, that thou hast humbled me. I acquired to know and understand the rights of God—his purposes of love and faithfulness to every man, but especially to myself—his mighty wisdom towards us his creatures in our present state of probation, as well as the blessedness, benefit, and necessity of sufferings for our cleansing, purification, and perfection. I learned to esteem myself happy in being permitted to endure suffering. I attained to a better knowledge of the wisdom and love of God, the truth of his word and assurance, the unalterable faithfulness of his promises, the riches of his mercy and long-suffering; of my own dependence, insufficiency, nothingness, and inability without him, of the wickedness and deceit of my heart, of the world, of men, and of the profound wisdom of God in the blending of evil with good. I became less in my own sight, more suffering and affectionate, more sparing and forgiving, more severe with myself, more lenient to others. I learned to trust God in all my ways and to renounce the claims of fame, honor, and comfort. It was nourishment to my soul to be enabled to say: ‘Lord, let me possess but Thee.’ I asked for no more aid in temporal concerns than his wisdom might find good for the best of my soul. I learned to become more contented in my desires, more moderate in my enjoyments. I was enabled with tears to express my gratitude for mercies, which formerly I counted not as blessings, but as my right and due. If my soul would keep holy-day, the Psalms became my temple and my altar. Next to the writings of the New Testament, they are now to me my dearest and most precious book—the golden mirror, the cyclopædia of the most blessed and fruitful knowledge and experience of my life; to thoroughly understand them will be the occupation of eternity, and our second life will form their commentary.”

In his Cours de Literature the celebrated Lamartine, probably regarding the last four Psalms (the Hallelujah Hymns) as one whole (as Hengstenberg also does) thus speaks: “The last Psalm ends with a chorus to the praise of God, in which the poet calls on all people, all instruments of sacred music, all the elements, and all the stars to join. Sublime finale of that opera of sixty years sung by the shepherd, the hero, the king, and the old man! In this closing Psalm we see the almost inarticulate enthusiasm of the lyric poet; so rapidly do the words press to his lips, floating upwards towards God their source, like the smoke of a great fire of the soul wafted by the tempest! Here we see David, or rather the human heart itself with all its God-given notes of grief, joy, tears, and adoration—poetry sanctified to its highest expression; a vase of perfume broken on the step of the temple, and shedding abroad its odors from the heart of David to the heart of all humanity! Hebrew, Christian, or even Mohammedan, every religion, every complaint, every prayer has taken from this vase, shed on the heights of Jerusalem, wherewith to give forth their accents. The little shepherd has become the master of the sacred choir of the Universe. There is not a worship on earth which prays not with his words, or sings not with his voice. A chord of his harp is to be found in all choirs, resounding everywhere and forever in unison with the echoes of Horeb and Engedi! David is the psalmist of eternity; what a destiny—what a power hath poetry when inspired by God! As for myself, when my spirit is excited, or devotional, or sad, and seeks for an echo to its enthusiasm, its devotion, or its melancholy, I do not open Pindar, or Horace, or Hafiz, those purely Academic poets; neither do I find within myself murmurings to express my emotion. I open the Book of Psalms, and there I find words which seem to issue from the soul of the ages, and which penetrate even to the heart of all generations. Happy the bard who has thus become the eternal hymn, the personified prayer and complaint of all humanity! If we look back to that remote age when such songs resounded over the world; if we consider that, while the lyric poetry of all the most cultivated nations only sang of wine, love, blood, and the victories of coursers at the games of Elidus, we are seized with profound astonishment, at the mystic accents of the shepherd-prophet, who speaks to God the Creator as one friend to another, who understands and praises his great works, admires his justice, implores his mercy, and becomes, as it were, an anticipative echo of the evangelic poetry, speaking the soft words of Christ before his coming. Prophet or not, as he may be considered by Christian or skeptic, none can deny in the poet-king an inspiration granted to no other man. Read Greek or Latin poetry after a Psalm, and see how pale it looks."

4. PECULIARITIES OF THE PSALTER.

The Book of Psalms is very peculiar. It differs from all other parts of God's word. It contains one hundred and fifty distinct compositions. Of these, some consist of a very few short sentences. Others are quite extended. One has a hundred and seventy-six verses. In the Hebrew the Psalter contains two thousand five hundred and seventeen verses. The middle verse is in Ps. lxxviii. 36. Of these compositions, sometimes seventy-four, sometimes seventy-three, and commonly seventy-two are ascribed to David, "The man raised up on high, the anointed of the God of Jacob, and the sweet Psalmist of Israel." There never arose another Psalmist like him. Jerome: "Simonides, Pindar, and Alceus, among the Greeks; Horace, Catullus, and Serenus, among the Latins, were famous for their poetic writings; but in his lyrics David personates Christ, and with his ten-stringed psalter celebrates his rising from the dead." Augustine: "David was a man eminently skilled in songs, being one who loved musical harmony, not to produce a carnal delight, but with the will of faith." The son of Sirach says of David: "In all his works he praised the Holy One most high with words of glory; with his whole heart he sung songs, and loved him that made him. He set singers also before the altar, that by their voices they might make sweet melody and daily sing praises in their songs. He beautified their feasts, and set in order the solemn times unto the end, that they might praise his holy name, and that the temple might sound from morning." Ecclus. xlvii. 8-10.

Several of the Fathers and some more modern writers make David the sole author of the Book of Psalms, but this is unquestionably a mistake.

Twelve of the Psalms are ascribed to Asaph, who seems to have been a man of exquisite sensibilities, much tempted, but remarkably delivered. He was cotemporary with David, and wrote his first Psalm about one thousand and twenty years before Christ. He is mentioned as a composer of Psalms in 2 Chron. xxix. 30, where he is also called a Seer. Two of the Psalms are ascribed to Solomon, the son of David, a great preacher, and the wisest of mere men. 1 Kings iv. 29-34. Only one Psalm is believed to have been written by Moses, (and Kennicott denies even that to him, though on insufficient grounds,) Moses, the man that spoke to God in the mountain till his face had an intolerable brightness. Although Angus claims that Ps. lxxxviii. is of the greatest antiquity, being written, he thinks, B. C. 1531, yet in this he is pretty certainly mistaken; and we may safely say that the 90th Psalm is the most ancient of all these songs. Scott dates it 1460, and Angus 1489 years B. C.

One Psalm is ascribed to Heman the Ezrahite, and one to Ethan the Ezrahite. Of these men we know that they were the sons of Mahol, that they had two eminent brothers, Chalcol and Darda, that they were cotemporary with Solomon, and that they were wise men, though surpassed by their monarch. Some think Ethan and Jeduthun the same; but that is doubtful. Some think Psalms lxxxviii. and lxxxix. were written by persons living before the time of David. But this cannot be proven. Compare 1 Kings iv. 31; 1 Chron. xv. 17, 19; xxv. 1; 2 Chron. xxxv. 15. That the Ethan and Heman mentioned in 1 Chron. ii. 6 cannot be the authors of Psalms lxxxviii. and lxxxix. is evident from the contents of Psalm lxxxix. which records things said and done long after their day. Of the remaining sixty-one Psalms the authorship is either wholly unknown or somewhat uncertain. Of these, eleven are ascribed to the sons of Korah as authors, or are addressed to them as musical performers; but learned men are not agreed on this point. It is almost certain that David wrote some of those ascribed to the sons of Korah. It would not profit the reader here to inquire at length into this matter, which will probably in several cases never be fully settled. To us the sense of the Psalm, if clearly ascertained, is the same, whoever may have been the writer. It is certain that David was the author of several to which his name is not prefixed. Thus the second Psalm is not on its face ascribed to David, yet in Acts iv. 25 we learn from infallible authority that it was composed by him. In substance the same may be said respecting the 95th Psalm, which in Heb. iv. 7 is expressly ascribed to David, though there is no statement to that effect in the Psalter. It is said in Ps. lxxii. 20: "The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended." Whatever else that phrase may mean, it cannot teach that no portion of the Psalms subsequent to the 72d in our arrangement was written by David.

5. THE PSALMS INSPIRED.

The real author of the Psalms is the Holy Spirit. In other words, the penmen of these compositions were inspired of God. So Chrysostom: "How does it concern me whether David was the author of all the Psalms, or whether some of them were written by others since it is certainly known that they were all written by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit?" Williams: "The divine authority of the Book of Psalms has, we believe, never been controverted by those who admit the inspiration of any part of the Old Testament." David expressly claims inspiration for himself: "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue. The God of Israel said, the Rock of Israel spake to me." 2 Sam. xxiii. 2, 3. This clearly claims inspiration. David was certainly inspired. On the day of Pentecost, Peter did but declare the judgment of the Church and the mind of God, when he said, "This Scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake," etc. Acts i. 16. And in Acts xiii. 29-37, Paul speaks of the Psalms in a way that he surely would not do if he did not regard them as the word of God. Our Saviour himself teaches that in the hundred and tenth Psalm David spoke "by the Holy Ghost," and that "David in spirit called him Lord." Matt. xxii. 43, and Mark xii. 36. In his last interview with his disciples, just before his ascension, our Lord puts Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms on the same level, as containing unfailing truths. Luke xxiv. 44. Indeed, Christ and his apostles always treated the Psalms as the infallible word of God. Heb. iii. 7. They are quoted or referred to scores of times in the New Testament as of the highest authority in religion, as may be seen from the following

Some of the Jews deny to David the title of prophet; but in Acts ii. 30 Peter expressly calls him a prophet. In whatever sense the word prophet may be taken, it surely belongs to David. He was a great teacher. He predicted many great events. No man can consistently deny inspiration to the Psalms without denying it to all the Scriptures. If the Psalms are inspired it is easy to understand why they should be so powerful in their influence over the minds and hearts of men. They are a fire and a hammer. They are life and spirit.

6. DIFFICULTY OF UNDERSTANDING THE PSALMS.

If any ask, why should a divinely inspired and devotional book be so hard to be understood, and lead to so considerable diversity of interpretation? the answer has been given a thousand times: The human mind is very weak, and liable to many prejudices and to much darkness; and the things of God are very excellent and glorious. The fact that the book is highly devotional and experimental takes nothing from the difficulty; for the nearer we are to the throne, the more dazzling is its effulgence found to be; and the more deeply truth enters into our spirits, the less able do we feel ourselves to tell its relations and describe its beauties. The Psalms were written a long time ago, in an age and country very diverse from our own, and in a language so peculiar as to have now no parallel. In his preface to the book of Psalms with notes, the learned Creswell thus accounts for much of the difficulty: "The Hebrew is not only a dead language, but the oldest of all dead languages; it is, moreover, the language of a people that lived under institutions and in a climate very different from those of our own country, so that the idioms with which it abounds cannot but be strange to our habits of thinking, and our modes of speech; nor have we any book but the Bible itself to consult for an illustration of these phraseological peculiarities.

The paucity of the words also contained in that ancient tongue is such, that the same Hebrew term very often bears a great variety of significations, the connection of which with each other cannot always be satisfactorily ascertained: and, again, there are words, each of which is found but once in the whole volume of Scripture, so that their meanings can only be conjectured, either from their affinity to other words, or from the purport of the passage where they occur.

“The following are amongst the many grammatical Hebraisms which we meet with in the Book of Psalms. The future and past tenses are put almost indiscriminately, the one for the other, and the former of them is used occasionally to designate not that which will happen, but that which is accustomed to happen. The infinitive is put for every other mood, and also for nouns even in the accusative case. The future tense is sometimes expressed by a verb in the imperative mood. Two substantives are put instead of a substantive and an adjective; a substantive is frequently used adverbially; and the same substantive repeated denotes multitude. When the negative particle occurs in the first member of a sentence, it is sometimes to be understood, and must be supplied, in the following members. Hebrew sentences are also in other respects very often elliptical, broken and imperfect; and in the same sentence there is in many instances a change of person in the speaker, without any express intimation of it.

“From the peculiarities above mentioned, and especially from the different ways in which an ellipse may be supplied, it is plain that the text of Scripture must needs admit of a considerable latitude of interpretation; so that although none of its important doctrines, whether they relate to faith or morals, are thereby left doubtful, yet does it contain passages the exact meanings of which are more or less uncertain. The candid and pious reader, however, will with Augustine gladly acknowledge that all which he fully comprehends in the sacred volume is most excellent; whilst he looks with feelings of veneration upon that smaller portion of it which he less perfectly understands, but which the diligence and erudition of future times may, through divine aid, be enabled to elucidate.”

This is the proper place to remark on those forms of expression in the Psalms, which taken according to the sound are imprecations of evil upon enemies. Respecting these the following remarks are offered to show that the inconsistency of such passages with the existence of genuine benevolence is merely apparent. True piety is ever the same. It teaches us to do good for evil, to bless and curse not. The Psalms themselves show that the law of love was understood by David as we now understand it. See Psalm vii. 4. True religion requires men, always did require men to supplicate blessings, such as repentance, forgiveness and salvation on our earthly foes.

To explain these imprecatory forms of speech some say that they are not expressive of the feelings of the writers as private persons, but that they are inspired by the Holy Ghost to say these things in the name of God, or of Christ. But God swears that he has no pleasure in the death of sinners; Christ when dying prayed for his murderers; and the Divine Spirit is the author of all holy love in man's heart. The representative of the Holy One must be like him.

Nor does it aid the matter to say that all these persons, against whom imprecations are uttered, are incorrigible foes of God and good men; for first, it cannot be shown that in all cases they were so; and, secondly, Jesus Christ wept over the city, which he knew to be hopelessly doomed to destruction. We must be like Christ. If a man is known to be incorrigibly wicked, we may not pray for him; but we may not ask God to hasten his perdition.

Others say that such imprecations are simple expressions of a strong sense of the justice of God in sending calamities and curses on the wicked. No doubt every sin deserves God's terrible and eternal displeasure, and all ought to say so. But personal ill-desert is not confined to those, who shall be lost. The righteous are not saved because they have not sinned, nor because they have sinned less than others, nor because they do not deserve perdition. Their salvation is wholly gratuitous. Every regenerate man has a strong sense of the justice of his own destruction, if God should finally cast him off. Yet no good man uses any form of imprecatory words, respecting himself. And he has no right to use such phrases merely to convey the idea that the thing is just. For there are other modes, well known to pious men, of doing the same thing. It would be just in God to damn the world, but in saying that, we may not seem to ask him to do it. On the contrary we should pray for all, who are in the land of the living, and have not sinned unto death, even while we confess that no man deserves anything but wrath. It should never be forgotten, however, that all such passages are based upon the fact that the punishment of the wicked will be perfectly just.

Many say that the verbs in the clauses under consideration might and should be rendered in the future.

Horne: "The offence taken at the supposed uncharitable and vindictive spirit of the imprecations, which occur in some of the Psalms, ceases immediately if we change the imperative for the future, and read, not 'let them be confounded,' etc., but, 'they shall be confounded,' etc., of which the Hebrew is equally capable. Such passages will then have no more difficulty in them than the other frequent predictions of divine vengeance in the writings of the prophets, or denunciations of it in the gospels intended to warn, to alarm, and to lead sinners to repentance, that they may fly from the wrath to come. This is Dr. Hammond's observation; who very properly remarks, at the same time, that in many places of this sort, as particularly in Ps. cix., (and the same may be said of Ps. lxix.,) it is reasonable to resolve, that Christ himself speaketh in the prophet; as being the person there principally concerned, and the completion most signal in many circumstances there mentioned; the succession especially of Matthias to the apostleship of Judas. It is true, that in the citation made by St. Peter from Ps. cix., in Acts i. 20, as also in that made by St. Paul from Ps. lxix., in Rom. xi. 9, the imperative form is preserved: 'Let his habitation be void,' etc. 'Let their table be made a snare,' etc. But it may be considered, that the apostles generally cited from the Greek of the LXX. version; and took it as they found it, making no alteration, when the passage, as it there stood, was sufficient to prove the main point which it was adduced to prove. If the imprecatory form be still contended for, all that can be meant by it, whether uttered by the prophet, by Messiah, or by ourselves, must be a solemn ratification of the just judgments of the Almighty against his impenitent enemies, like what we find ascribed to the blessed spirits in heaven, when such judgments were executed: Rev. xi. 17, 18; xvi. 5, 6, 7: See Merriek's Annotations on Ps. cix., and Witsii Miscellan. Sacr. lib. i., cap. 18, sect. 24. But, by the future rendering the verbs, every possible objection is precluded at once."

Scott: "The future tense is often used for the imperative, or the optative mood, in the Hebrew, which has not that precision, as to tenses and moods, which prevails in many other languages. But where the literal rendering contains simply a prediction, and changing the future for the imperative, or optative, implies an imprecation, or a wish, the literal version is frequently preferable. . . We must by no means desire and pray for the destruction of our enemies, but we may predict the ruin of God's enemies, who will fall by their own counsels, and in the multitude of their iniquities." If these seeming imprecations are mere predictions, the matter is relieved of all serious difficulty. This view is well supported by authority.

But the use of the future tense instead of the optative mood does not in all cases satisfy Scott, for he says, "Yet it cannot be denied that the form of imprecation is often used, implying that the impenitent enemies of God and Christ will perish, with the approbation of all holy creatures; and that the very prayers of believers for themselves and the Church will be answered in the destruction of their enemies." Others have expressed similar views.

Therefore some adopt and enlarge on the idea that "we may predict the ruin of God's enemies." Surely we may do that. We must do it in all fidelity and tenderness. The view then is that the form of expression in our English Bible in many places is an ordinary method of prophetically announcing both curses and blessings. An examination of many passages in the Psalms and in the prophets would confirm this view.

Either this or the next preceding mode of explaining the difficulty will to most candid persons be satisfactory. The latter is perhaps to be preferred.

Some, however, unite both, and so cover the whole ground. Cobbin: "Such passages admit of translation in the future, and are rather predictions than imprecations." Morison also says that Psalm v. 10, "and all similar passages in the Psalms, will bear to be translated in the future tense. For the want of observing this circumstance, many have been stumbled at the apparent want of benevolence on the part of David. These words are a distinct but awful prophecy of the judgments which await the enemies of Christ and his Church."

The sense of the Christian world so far coincides with the idea that these seeming imprecations were mere predictions, that, with very limited exceptions, persons professing the Christian name have never been led to use similar forms of expression in their devotions. Those who form the exception have commonly been men heated with the intense malignity of partizans in political or theological controversy.

It should also be stated that such is the pious, benevolent spirit of the Psalms, that any one using these forms of speech to express real imprecations, would shock a Christian community. Alexander: "Such expressions in the Psalms have never really excited or encouraged a spirit of revenge in any reader, and are no more fitted to have that effect than the act of a judge who condemns a criminal to death or of the officer who executes the sentence." God will surely, by his very nature, be led to destroy the incorrigibly wicked. Nothing is more certain. Such truth should be proclaimed. The belief of it is eminently salutary.

Let us then not be surprised at these difficulties in ascertaining the sense of the Psalmists; in doubtful cases let us propose our views with unfeigned modesty; let us make reasonable allowance for human infirmity; and especially let us implore the guidance of the Holy Spirit. He is that unction which teacheth us all things. No wit, nor learning, nor study can ever render his teachings unnecessary. Let us thank God that so much is clear and intelligible. Let us also often cry, "Teach me thy statutes;" "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law." God is himself the great Teacher.

7. VARIOUS VERSIONS. THE ENGLISH GOOD.

Various translations of the Psalms are before the public. Many of them have much merit and preserve much of the heavenly savor of the original. All of them may occasionally afford a good hint. Of those made into English none can compare with the authorized version. Many devout persons have by long use become attached to the translation found in the prayer-book of the church of England. This version bears date from A. D. 1539. Their preference for this shows how precious God's word is in any translation, which is much used; but no competent scholar would agree that our authorized version has any successful rival. That just referred to is far more a translation of the Septuagint than of the Hebrew text. The Commentator Scott, who well deserves the epithet Judicious, says, "The Prayer-book translation is in no respect comparable to the Bible translation." Nearly all the translations now claiming public attention may be profitably consulted. The older English versions from quaintness, if not from elegance, do often give the sense in a very striking way. The Polyglot Bibles may with great advantage be consulted by those whose scholarship is sufficient. The author thinks proper here to record his high estimate of the value of the English Bible now in common use. It seems to him that his brethren, who seek to bring it into disrepute, might be much better employed. He gives it as his deliberate judgment that he has never seen even one chapter done into English so well anywhere else. The learning of the men, who made it, was vast, sound, and unquestionable. In this respect their little fingers were thicker than the loins of the men, who decry their labors. The common people ought to be told that they have God's word in a better translation than that of the Septuagint, which was freely quoted by Christ and his apostles. Nothing is inspired but the original; yet those learned and modest men, who have suggested improvements in the rendering of any text, should receive all due honor, and not be looked upon with suspicion. The old mode of paraphrasing Scripture had more serious objections to it than that of suggesting a new rendering.

For these reasons no new translation is presented in this work. One absolutely new, and paying any decent regard to the Hebrew text, is quite impossible, although it may be fairly original with its author. Yet the various translations, where they can cast any light on the text, or where candor requires the statement of views opposed to the sense conveyed by the common version, are freely given.

8. HOW FAR ARE THE PSALMS MESSIANIC?

The weightiest matter in controversy respecting the interpretation of the Psalms regards their application to Christ. How far are they Messianic? Has any portion of them a primary application to David or Solomon, and a secondary reference to Christ? Were these kings types of the Saviour? if so, how far may we go in regarding them as typical? In this matter there may have been rashness and folly on both sides. An unbridled fancy may find supposed analogies, where none were intended to be suggested. And a cold critical turn of mind may reject the most striking types. To say that nothing in the Old Testament is a type of Christ unless in the New Testament it is expressly declared to be so is as contrary to reason as to say that no prophecy of the Old Testament relates to Christ unless it is quoted as such in the New. The entire old dispensation was full of figures. So Paul teaches in Hebrews x. 1. On the other hand fanciful men will pervert anything. In explaining God's word we must exercise sobriety. The Scripture calls on men to use common sense. Lacking this, they will err whatever may be the rules of interpretation adopted by them. They must prove all things.

It has often been said that Cocceius carried the typical interpretation to an extreme, finding Christ everywhere. Both Christ and his apostles taught that the Old Testament was very full of Messiah and his kingdom. See Luke xxiv. 44 and Acts iii. 24. These passages are supported by Luke xxiv. 27; 2 Timothy iii. 15, and many others. If therefore Cocceius did find Christ "in all the prophets," inspired men did the same thousands of years ago. He may have erred in some of his views, but some examination of his work on the Psalms satisfies me that he is a far safer and sounder guide than any of his traducers. This great man wrote at a time when the world was far gone astray, and his attempt to recall mankind to the simple truths of Scripture provoked violent opposition, which covered his name with unmerited reproach. He laid down no rule of interpreting the Psalms more comprehensive than that of Horsley: "There is not a page of this Book of Psalms, in which the pious reader will not find his Saviour, if he read with a view of finding him." Henry: "In the Book of Psalms there is so much of CHRIST and his gospel, as well as of God and his law, that it has been called the abstract or summary of both Testaments. . . David was a type of Christ, who descended from him, not from Moses, because he came to take away sacrifice (the family of Moses was soon lost and extinct) but to establish and perpetuate joy and praise: for of the family of David in Christ there shall be no end."

The great key to the interpretation of the Psalms respecting David and Solomon is found in 2 Samuel vii. where God gives a clear promise that the seed of David should reign for ever. In no sense can that promise be made good except in Christ Jesus. Bishop Chandler very justly remarks that the Jews "must have understood David, their prince, to have been a figure of Messiah. They would not otherwise have made his Psalms a part of their daily worship, nor would David have delivered them to the church to be so employed, were it not to instruct and support them in the belief of this fundamental article. Was the Messiah not concerned in the Psalms, it were absurd to celebrate twice a day, in their public devotions, the events of one man's life, who was deceased so long ago as to have no relation now to the Jews, and the circumstances of their affairs; or to transcribe whole passages from them into their prayers for the coming of Messiah."

Bellarmino says, that in some of the Psalms the coming, the kingdom, the miracles, the sufferings, the resurrection, the ascension of Christ are so manifestly foretold, that one rather seems to be reading an evangelist than a prophet. Gill says, that "the subject-matter of the Psalms is exceeding great and excellent; many of the Psalms respect the person, offices and grace of Christ; his sufferings and death, resurrection, ascension, and session at the right hand of God; and so are exceeding suitable to the gospel dispensation." Dr. J. A. Alexander: "The chain of Messianic promises, which for ages had been broken, or concealed beneath the prophetic ritual, was now renewed by the addition of a new link in the great Messianic promise made to David (2 Sam. vii.) of perpetual succession in his family."

In discussing the question "whether all the Psalms should be applied to Christ or not," Scott says, "No doubt every pious mind will allow that each of them immediately points to him in his person, character, and offices; or may be so applied as to lead the believer's thoughts to Him who is the centre of all acceptable religion."

Leighton: "There are many things in the Psalms and other parts of the Old Testament applied by the apostles to Christ, which, but for their authority, perhaps no one would have considered as referring to him."

We might therefore agree with Morison, that we "perceive no infallible guide but in the comments and appropriations of Christ and his apostles;" and yet with consistency we might with him say, "That many of the Psalms have a double sense attached to them cannot be fairly disputed." And there is much truth in the remark of Dr. Allix, that "although the sense of near fifty Psalms be fixed and settled by divine authors, yet Christ and his apostles did not undertake to quote all the Psalms they could quote, but only to give a key to their hearers, by which they might apply to the same subjects the Psalms of the same composure and expression."

Nothing heretofore said was designed to oppose the rule of interpretation laid down by Melancthon, that we must always seek the grammatical sense of Scripture; nor that laid down by Hooker: "I hold it for a most infallible rule in expositions of sacred Scripture, that where a literal construction will stand, the farthest from the letter is commonly the worst." Let us then in all cases admit the literal or primary sense of Scripture. But this should not hinder us from also admitting in many cases the spiritual or secondary sense. A thing spoken of David may be literally true of him. Thus we have the primary sense. But David was a type of Christ, and what he says primarily of himself may have a secondary fulfilment in Christ, and so we get the spiritual sense. Without admitting thus much, how is it possible ever to apply the doctrine of types in persons to the antitype? When we have a figure, the first thing is to discover the foundation and sense of the figure; the next is to apply it to the matter in hand.

This is not giving unbridled license to the vagaries of men of no judgment. Vitrunga was right when he condemned what has often passed under the name of spiritualizing: "I do not deny that many men of uninstructed faculties and of shallow judgment have, in almost every age of the Church, commended to persons like themselves, under the name of allegorical interpretations of Scripture, certain weak and stupid fancies, in which there is neither unction, judgment, nor spiritual discernment: and have sought for those mysteries of theirs which spring from a most frigid invention, either in improper places, or promiscuously in every place, without any discrimination of circumstances, without any foundation in allegory, or in verisimilitude of language: so that I do not wonder that it has occurred to many sensible persons to doubt, whether it would not be better to abandon this study altogether, to the skilful use of which experience teaches us the abilities of but very few are adequate, than to expose Holy Scripture to the senseless experiments of the unskilful, so as to cause great injury to itself, and to excite the applause of the profane." The truth is that nothing is of more importance to the interpreter of Scripture than good common sense. A foolish or fanciful man will misapply the best rules of exposition. In vain do we expect wisdom from those who lack sobriety.

Martin Bucer: "It would be worth a great deal to the Church, if, forsaking allegories, and other frivolous devices, which are not only empty, but derogate very much from the majesty of the doctrine of Christ, we would all simply and soberly prosecute that which our Lord intends to say to us."

Nor can we rightly apply to Christ the penitential Psalms, or represent him as asking forgiveness. In himself he was holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, perfectly innocent, having nothing to repent of. And if sin imputed to him was to him forgiven, then it was not atoned for by him. Indeed, forgiveness is non-imputation. Nor can we ever apply to Christ those parts of the Psalter which plead for the subduing of corruptions. He had no corruptions to subdue. Yet the remark of Hilary is of great weight: "The key of the Psalms is the faith of Christ."

9. NAME OF THE PSALTER.

The name of this collection of songs in the Hebrew is Book of Praises, or Praise-songs. This is given because praise is a striking characteristic of these compositions. In them God is greatly exalted and extolled both for what he is and for what he does. According to all the teachings of this book, the Lord is a great God and King, greatly to be feared and greatly to be praised. Let men study the Book of Praises. From the Greek Testament we get the titles, PSALMS, and BOOK OF PSALMS. These names are chosen by inspiration. The word Psalm denotes a composition intended to be sung in connection with an instrument of music. The first men among the Levites were those who led the singing. They did not, like the rest of their tribe, fulfil their course and then retire to the villages and rural districts of Judea, but they made the holy city their home. 1 Chron. ix. 33, 34. This work of praise was a great matter among the ancient people of God. The instruments used were chiefly psalteries, and harps, and cymbals, 1 Chron. xv. 16-22; also trumpets, 1 Chron. xvi. 4-6. In 1 Chron.

xvi. 42, we read of "musical instruments of God." Those who led this part of public worship were divided into twenty-four classes or choirs. 1 Chron. xxv. Perhaps devotional music was never carried to greater perfection, nor shall be in this world, than when the thousands of trained Levites united in singing the Psalms. The music used is entirely lost, though Rabbi Benjamin says that in his time there were at Bagdad some Jews who knew how to sing the songs as the singers did when the temple was standing. There doubtless were men who so pretended, but they could hardly have retained this knowledge to so late a period.

10. INSCRIPTIONS.

The titles of the several Psalms (Hengstenberg calls them superscriptions; others, inscriptions) are as old as the Psalms themselves, being always found in the Hebrew. They were doubtless put there by divine authority. Tholuck: "The titles of the Psalms did not originate with the compilers, but with those who first wrote them down, or in the authors themselves." God, who would have all things done decently and in order, deigned to give minute directions for arranging the temple service, and especially respecting the public praise offered to his heavenly majesty. See 2 Chron. xxix. 25. He who did these things, also directed these inscriptions to be put to the Psalms, not always to give us the doctrine or matter therein contained, but to set up a memorial respecting events through which the writer had passed, or to give some general idea of the theme, or to address the piece to certain performers. The import of some of these titles may not be intelligible to us, though they may have been very clear when given. Many of them greatly aid us in giving a lively view of the state of things, in which the writer uttered his song. Where remark is called for in explanation of given titles it will be offered at the proper place. It is surprising that Fry should have ventured to say, "These titles are destitute of authority, as the careful reader of the Psalms will soon remark; they are to be regarded merely as marginal glosses of the Jews, but poor guides to the interpretation of Scripture." Even Morison says, "The authority of the several inscriptions is, to say the least, somewhat doubtful." And the annotator of Calvin quotes Fry's remark with approbation. But Alexander has well observed that "in all Hebrew manuscripts they bear the same relation to the body of the Psalm, that the inscriptions in the prophets or in Paul's epistles bear to the substance of the composition." This shows the great rashness of those, who boldly set aside the Hebrew heading. Jerome: "The titles of the Psalms are the keys, opening the door to a right understanding of them." Bossuet: "There can be no reason for expunging them, since they are found in the text and all the versions, and have been thought worthy of explanation by Jewish as well as Christian commentators. It is true, there are many who take these titles in different senses; but I cannot find one ancient interpreter who doubts of their authority."

11. THE PSALMS ARE ONE BOOK.

The very first remark of Hilary in his Prologue to the Psalms is that "the Book of Psalms is one, not five." He here refers to the fact that some of the Jews divided the Psalms into five books, corresponding to the five books of Moses. It is not necessary here to dwell on this matter. It is sufficient to inform the reader that such a division was a mere human invention, deriving no authority from God, and not even founded on the nature of the contents of these wondrous songs. In Luke xx. 42 and in Acts i. 20, we read of "The Book of Psalms," but nowhere do we read of "The Books of Psalms," nor of the first, second, third, fourth, or fifth Book of Psalms.

12. PAIRS OF PSALMS.

Some have asserted that in several instances the Psalms were in pairs. It may be so, but there is no proof of it contained in the text of Scripture. Nor would the reader be profited by a long inquiry into this matter. All truth is related, and is harmonious. In this sense, almost any one Psalm may well be put as the mate of more than one other Psalm. At least, there seems to be no reason from the contents of any two psalms; why a close affinity should be discovered between them, and not between either of them, and some other portions of these divine songs. The classification here spoken of is harmless, and if any think it is based in the nature of these compositions, such an opinion should give no offence. Alexander thinks that "we may trace not only pairs but trilogies and even more extensive systems of connected Psalms, each independent of the rest, and yet together forming beautiful and striking combinations." Any remark from such a source is entitled to respect.

13. ALPHABETICAL PSALMS.

A peculiarity of several Psalms is that they are alphabetical. That is "the successive sentences or paragraphs begin with the letters of the Hebrew alphabet in their order." Without extraordinary ingenuity this could not be made to appear in any translation. Thus it would not be easy to make the first eight verses of the 119th Psalm begin with the first letter of our alphabet, and the second eight verses begin with the second letter of our alphabet, and so on. Nor is it necessary that we should make such an attempt. The sense of Scripture is of infinite weight. But it is of no importance to us whether our translation should in this respect copy the original. The mind of the Spirit is what we should seek. The version which gives that is what we need.

14. HEBREW POETRY.

The reader need hardly be told that the Psalms are highly poetical, and that our knowledge of Hebrew Poetry is very limited. On all subjects of sacred criticism our utterances should be modest; but in relation to the poetical portions of God's word we should be doubly careful to say nothing rashly. At the same time we may very properly consult all sober writers on such subjects, and get the best lights within our reach. Nor can we judge of Hebrew odes by canons applicable to modern languages. "The poetry of the Psalms is formed, not like that of modern languages, by the response of answering syllables, but of answering thoughts."

15. SELAH.

The word, Selah, is found nowhere in Scripture but in thirty-nine of the Psalms and in the 3d chapter of Habakkuk—in the Psalms seventy-four times and in Habakkuk thrice. Our translators have left it as they found it. Bishop Jebb has devoted great attention to this word, and has reached the following safe conclusions, viz: that the word is an integral part of the sacred text; that it does not mean "amen," forever," "mark this well," or "nota bene;" that it never occurs in the alphabetical Psalms, nor in the Songs of degrees, nor in any Psalm composed after the Captivity; that the prayer of Habakkuk was composed at a time when the Temple service had been restored to great grandeur; that nothing can be confidently spoken respecting the etymological meaning of this word; that the Septuagint renders the word invariably by Diapsalma, which marks a division of some kind; and that the word is put as a musical notation. Many will doubt whether this writer has fairly maintained another view which had been formerly given by Burkius in his Gnomon Psalmorum, that Selah is a mark of division, discriminating one moral portion of a Psalm from another.

Without discussing at length this theory, which has been presented with some plausibility, it may be said that it does not seem to suit every case. The only ground yet taken, and successfully maintained is that Selah is a simple direction to the musicians, the precise force of which is not known to us. The word is not found "in the later editions of the Vulgate, nor in the Syriac, nor in the Arabic translations," nor does the church of England use it in her Psalter. Yet it is very properly retained in our authorized version of the Scriptures. And if any should feel disposed to pronounce it let none be offended. It is undoubtedly a part of the holy writings given to us. Patrick: "And here I must note once for all, that it cannot be certainly known what is meant by the word SELAH, which we meet withal thrice in this (the 3d) short Psalm. The most probable opinion is that it was a note in musick. . . . That musick being now lost, some interpreters have wholly omitted this word, Selah, as I shall also do." Calvin: "As the word Selah, from which Selah is derived, signifies to lift up, we incline to the opinion of those who think it denotes the lifting up of the voice in harmony in the exercise of singing." Venema thinks it calls for an elevation of the voice in singing the Psalm. Alting thinks it calls for a repetition of the words immediately preceding. The Chaldee renders it forever. It should be stated however that it is designed to fix the minds of the godly on the matter, which has just been spoken of in any given case, as well as to regulate the singing in such a manner as to make the music correspond to the words and the sentiment. Alexander also says, that Selah is "properly a musical term, but generally indicates a pause in the sense as well as the performance." A writer in the Bibliotheca Sacra says:

"Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical or rythmical note. Herder regarded it as indicating a change of note; Mathewson as a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence! Gesenius explains it to mean, "Let the instruments play and the singers stop." Wocher regards it as equivalent to sursum corda—up, my soul! Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case "an actual appeal or summons to Jehovah." They are calls for aid and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire directness, or if not in the imperative, "Hear, Jehovah!" or Awake, Jehovah! and the like still earnest addresses to God that he would remember and hear, etc. The word itself he regards as indicating a blast of the trumpets by the priests. Selah, itself, he thinks an abridged expression, used for Higgsaion Selah—Higgsaion indicating the sound of the stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets."

16. THE WORDS RENDERED MAN.

In the Psalter there are three Hebrew words rendered man, Adam, Ish and Enosh. The first and third of these occur in our Hebrew Bible more than five hundred times each, and the second more than fifteen hundred times. Each of these words is found in the Law, the Prophets, and the poetic books of Scripture. They are in the Pentateuch and in books written after the captivity. Adam is first found in Gen. i. 26, 27. In the 2d chapter of Genesis it occurs twelve times, where it is sometimes rendered man, and sometimes given as the proper name of the first man.

Ish is first found in Gen. ii. 23, 24, where it is rendered man. Enosh is first found in the plural at the close of Gen. vi. 4, and is rendered men of renown. By far the most common rendering of each of these words is man, or, in the plural, men. Indeed the first (Adam) is never otherwise translated except in seven cases (Num. xxxi. 28, 30, 35, 40, 46; Pr. vi. 12; Jon. iv. 11,) where it is rendered person or persons. The second (Ish) is also rendered simply man; very often to conform to English idiom, every man, every one, any man; sometimes one, any with a negative none, no man; sometimes that man, he or him; frequently one followed by the word another, sometimes person, or, in the plural, persons; sometimes, another, each, a certain, meaning man; a few times one followed by the word other; once or twice each one, one man, every, either, the good-man, champion (literally middle-man) fellow, people, applied to the male head of a family, often husband; once eloquent (literally man of words); a very few times whoso, whosoever; sometimes Canaanite, Egyptian, for man of Canaan, man of Egypt, reprover for man reproving, stranger, for man strange. It is but once rendered male, and then in application to brutes.

Enosh is but about thirty times rendered otherwise than man, or, in the plural, men, and then by such words as they or them, certain, divers, some, persons, fellows, counsellors for men of counsel, archers for men of bows, etc. These statements are made in view of a discussion of some importance respecting the import of these words. Some claim that at least at times each of these words is emphatic, and especially when preceded by the Hebrew word rendered son, or sons. Thus it is contended that in Ps. xlix. 2, where for sons of Adam our translators give the word low, and in Ps. lxii. 9, where they render the same words men of low degree, the original is emphatic; and yet in Ps. xlix. 12, 20 we read of man being in honor and of man that is in honor, and yet the word Adam is used in both these verses. It is also said to have the same meaning in Pr. viii. 4, where it is rendered literally sons of man, Adam. In Isa. ii. 9 the common version renders Adam, mean man. In like manner some contend that our translators render sons of Ish in Ps. iv. 2, sons of men, meaning great men; and certainly in Ps. xlix. 2 they render sons of Ish by the word high, and in Ps. lxii. 9 by men of high degree, and in Pr. viii. 4 the plural of Ish by simply men; but in Isa. ii. 9 the singular Ish by great man. The words sons of Enosh are never found in the Hebrew Bible, but son of Enosh occurs once, Ps. cxliv. 3. Yet it is contended that the word Enosh is itself sometimes emphatic as in Ps. viii. 4: ix. 19, 20, and in some other places. Indeed in Job iv. 17 it is rendered mortal man.

Patrick: "The son of man [Ben Adam] and the sons of men [Bene Ish] are phrases which often occur; which I have good ground to think belong in the Scripture language to Princes; and sometimes the greatest of Princes. So I have expounded that known place, Ps. lxxx. 17: The man [Ish] of thy right hand, the son of man [Ben Adam] whom thou madest strong for thyself; and Ps. iv. 2: O ye sons of men [Bene Ish], i. e., rulers of people; and Ps. viii. 4: What is man [Enosh] that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man [Ben Adam] (i. e., the greatest of men), that thou visitest him? Ps. cxvi. 3: Put not your confidence in princes, nor in the son of man [Ben Adam] (how great a prince, that is, soever he may be, though of never such dignity and power), in whom there is no help.

"And thus the counsellors of Saul are called the sons of men [Adam]. And so I understand these words in Isa. li. 12: Who art thou that thou shouldest be afraid of a man [Enosh] that shall die, and of the SON OF MAN [Ben Adam] (that is, a prince) who shall be as grass?" Having made some other statements, he adds: "As for Ben Enosh, which we also render son of man, (Ps. cxliv. 3,) it hath another signification; importing the wretchedness of any man's condition."

It is best here once for all to examine this theory of interpreting these terms. In Ps. iv. 2, we have sons of men [Bene Ish]. Some think this means strong and powerful men, or nobles, or persons of rank. Edwards renders it, Ye great ones. Calvin regards the title here given as "an ironical concession of what they claimed to themselves, by which he ridicules their presumption in esteeming themselves to be noble and wise, whereas it was only blind rage which impelled them to wicked enterprises." Hengstenberg asserts that the expression rendered sons of men is in many places unquestionably used in an emphatic sense." In proof he cites Ps. xlix. 2; lxii. 9; Pr. viii. 4. Let us look a little at Ps. viii. 4: What is man [Enosh], that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man [Ben Adam], that thou visitest him? Piscator and Edwards render Enosh a mortal. Calvin: "The Hebrew word, which we have rendered man, expresses the frailty of man, rather than any strength or power which he possesses." For man Venema reads miserable man; and Henry paraphrases it sinful, weak, miserable man. The words son of man [Ben Adam] are commented on in like manner. Ainsworth says, "As men are called Enosh for their doleful estate by sin, so are they called Adam, and sons of Adam, that is, earthy, to put them in mind of their original and end, who were made of Adamah, the earth, even of the dust, and to dust shall return again." Patrick regards the phrase son of man in this verse as equivalent to "the greatest of men." Anderson quotes Pye Smith as reading the words thus: "What is man, that thou art mindful of him? Even the [noblest] son of man, that thou visitest him?" and as saying, "Our language has no single terms to mark the distinction expressed" by these two words; and adding, "I have endeavored to approach the idea by one insertion of an epithet."

Patrick thinks that his theory gives us the key to the right understanding of the phrase, the son of man, so often found in the New Testament. But that title is sufficiently explained by simply saying that it declares the entire humanity of our Lord. No further meaning is required, or has been commonly accepted.

It may seem almost presumption to express a doubt whether this theory is correct. Yet candor and truth are always worth more than they cost. The author has studied the matter with some care, and is not satisfied that any Psalmist ever used either of the words, Adam, Ish, or Enosh, in an emphatic sense, or as conveying the ideas contended for, or that the primary meaning of the words is ever to be insisted on in any part of these sacred songs.

Besides the views already presented at the beginning of this section, it is proper to say that the words and phrases under consideration occur with great frequency, and if ever used emphatically, and in the senses contended for, it is very rarely indeed; and there is nothing requiring us so to regard them anywhere. As the words Adam, Ish, and Enosh occur so often, no collection of instances is here presented for comparison. Such a labor would be tedious. It is also quite unnecessary. But let any one compare the texts where the expression son of man [Adam] is found. See Num. xxiii. 19; Job xxv. 6; xxxv. 8; Ps. lxxx. 17; cxlvi. 3; Ecc. i. 13; Jer. xlix. 18; l. 40; li. 43; scores of times in Ezekiel, as an appellation of that prophet; and Dan. viii. 17.

Let him go further and compare the cases where the words sons of men [Adam] are found: Ps. xxxi. 19; xxxiii. 13; lvii. 4; lviii. 1; cxlv. 12; Pr. viii. 31; Ecc. i. 13; ii. 3, 8; iii. 10, 18, 19; viii. 11; ix. 3, 12; Is. lii. 14; Jer. xxxii. 19; Dan. x. 16; Mic. v. 7; Joel i. 12.

The phrase sons of man [Adam] occurs in Ps. xlix. 2; Pr. viii. 4. Besides those previously cited, these are the only cases where either of these phrases occurs in all the Hebrew Scriptures.

The expression son of man [Ish] is never found. That of sons of man [Ish] is found but once, Psalm lxii. 9, where our version reads men of high degree. That of sons of men is in but two places, in Psalm iv. 2 where it is rendered literally, and in Psalm xlix. 2 high. It is evident that any theory built on so small an induction as this must have a very slender foundation, unless there is something in the context or connection defining the word, or making it necessary to give it such a translation.

We never find the expression sons of man or sons of men, where Enosh is used.

And we but once find son of man [Enosh] in Psalm cxliv. 3. It can hardly be esteemed wise to build any doctrine of language on this one expression.

That these three Hebrew words are used so as to make it impossible to tell from any fair literal translation what the original word is in all ordinary cases may easily be made to appear by looking over the English concordance for the words man and men, trying to form an opinion of what the original is, and then turning to the Hebrew. Where memory gives no clue, it will be found to be mere guess-work. Let any one try his powers on these verses where man occurs, Ps. i. 1; xxxii. 2; xxxix. 11; lv. 13; civ. 15; cxii. 1; and on these where men occurs, Jud. xx. 17; Ps. xvii. 4; lxxvi. 5; 1 Sam. xxv. 13; Ps. lxi. 12; lxxxii. 7. He will often find it impossible to tell what the original is.

It is not at all here asserted that there is any impropriety in adverting at any time to the primary meaning of these or any other words of Scripture, if thereby the sense of any passage receives force. But it is simply denied that we have satisfactory evidence that these Hebrew words rendered man have an emphatic sense in the Psalms.

At the same time there is no impropriety in rendering two of these "men of low degree and men of high degree," because that phrase in English is equivalent to this, "men by whatever name called," or "men of all conditions."

17. AUTHORS CONSULTED.

It is not necessary here to give an extended list of authors consulted in preparing this work. Except in a very few instances due credit is formally given. Any exception to this remark is unintentional, or is found in those places where many writers without giving credit to each other say the same thing. In all branches of study there are things, which have become the common property of mankind. To quote would be mere pedantry, unless the very words of an author are copied. For instance, many things are said by every commentator on the first Psalm, because they obviously belong to the matter in hand, and not because they have been said by others at previous times.

Nearly a century ago Dodd stated that "the number of commentaries on the Book of Psalms was almost endless: above six hundred are enumerated, exclusive of those which have been written on the whole body of the Scriptures, and on particular Psalms." Since that time the number has been much increased.

18. OBJECT OF THIS WORK.

The great object of this work is the glory of God in the edification of his church. If it shall fail of practical usefulness and religious profit, it will gain no important end. The author has endeavored to embody all the most valuable suggestions of others together with his own reflections on this inspired book. And he begs his readers to remember that as it is in vain to light a candle to examine the sun-dial, so human wit will make no good progress in learning this or any other portion of God's word except as the Sun of Righteousness by his Holy Spirit shines upon the sacred page. All attempts to understand the spiritual import of God's word without divine teaching must ever prove failures. This fact and the reasons of it are clearly given in Scripture. Let every one, therefore, seek help from God in earnest fervent prayer. John Newton: "A few minutes of the Spirit's teaching will furnish us with more real useful knowledge, than toiling through whole folios of commentators and expositors, —they are useful in their places, and are not to be undervalued by those, who can perhaps in general do better without them: but it will be our wisdom to deal less with the streams, and be more close in applying to the fountainhead. The Scripture itself, and the Spirit of God are the best and the only sufficient expositors of Scripture. . . It is absurd to read or study the Scripture with any other view than to receive its doctrines, submit to its reproofs, and obey its precepts that we may be made wise unto salvation. All disquisitions and criticisms that stop short of this, that do not amend the heart as well as furnish the head, are empty and dangerous, at least to ourselves, of whatever use they may be to others. An experience of this caused a learned critic and eminent commentator (Grotius) to confess towards the close of his life, 'Alas! I have wasted my life in much labor to no purpose.'" Luther: "We must not simply read or sing the Psalms, as if they did not concern us; but we must read and sing them for this purpose, that we may be improved by them, may have our faith strengthened, and our hearts comforted amid all sorts of necessities. For the Psalter is nothing else than a school and exercise for our heart and mind, to the end, that we may have our thoughts and inclinations turned into the same channel. So that he reads the Psalter without spirit, who reads it without faith and understanding."

19. IGNORANCE OF SOME LANGUAGES QUOTED.

As the author is not acquainted with Ethiopic, Syriac and Arabic, and yet freely quotes them, he would state that he relies upon the Latin translation of those versions, found in Walton's Polyglot. In many cases too he finds those versions given in Latin or English by other commentators. So that he hopes the quotations will be found sufficiently accurate.

20. WHY THIS WORK WAS UNDERTAKEN.

If any ask why this work was undertaken the answer is, 1. The word of God is not bound. It is open to all. 2. The author had a mind to it. He has never felt more disposed to any work. He has always found it best to pursue that kind of literary labor, for which he had a strong inclination. 3. He saw no way in which he could more fitly spend a portion of the afternoon of his life than in the special study of this incomparable collection of sacred poems. 4. Others, who had devoted considerable time to the Psalms, uniformly testified that they were thereby great gainers. The author felt his own poverty and wished to be enriched. Archibald Symson in his preface to his work on the seven penitential Psalms says he undertook it; "Because this ocean is not dried up, and hee that commeth last may as well fill his bucket as hee that came first." Musculus on a like occasion said: "If the treasure of the holy Scriptures be such that it can be drawn so dry by the diligent searches of pious and learned men, as that nothing shall remain to exercise the studies of them that succeed them; if there be at any time such an effusion of God's Holy Spirit, that after that time it is in vain to labor in finding out its mind, in the holy Scriptures; if there have been in the church, after the prophets, Christ, and his Apostles, men of such perfect accomplishments, that to them was imparted such a universal fullness of divine knowledge, as to make their writings absolutely complete; so that we need do nothing, but night and day study them alone: then truly I refuse not the censure of folly, nay of madness, for attempting anything now in the holy Scriptures, after such absolute writers. But if that most rich fountain of the divine oracles be altogether inexhaustible; and no age can be assigned to which alone the grace of the Holy Spirit was confined; and there were never any doctors at any time in the church, after Christ, the apostles and prophets, of such esteem, that nothing is wanting in their writings, nothing can be rightly added to them; nothing is in them which can be rightly taken away, or changed for the better: then I do not see why we may not profitably travel in the same way that others have done; with hopes of adding more light to that which they have left us." 5. Many of the most valuable works on the Psalms are in Latin, or are very scarce and high-priced. The endeavor here is to aid the reader with the best suggestions of writers inaccessible to most, as well as to make original remarks, critical, explanatory, doctrinal and practical. 6. Several learned and judicious persons, who heard of the contemplated design and have examined parts of it after it was commenced, greatly encouraged the author to go on with his undertaking.

21. NAMES OF THE MOST HIGH.

It will be satisfactory to the plain reader and will save time here to note that the names of the Almighty occurring in the Psalter are significant, and are briefly explained in this work:

On Jehovah LORD, see on Ps. i. 2.

On Adonai Lord, see on Ps. ii. 4.

On Elohim God, see on Ps. iii. 2.

On El God, see on Ps. v. 4.

On Gel-yohn Most High, see on Ps. vii. 17.

On Eloah God, see on Ps. xviii. 31.

On Jah LORD,

On Shuddai The Almighty,

} See introduction to Psalm lxviii.

22. PUNCTUATION.

In punctuation the usual rules are observed, except where a single sentence or phrase is cited in the various renderings of a clause or of a verse, and the author's name is immediately prefixed. In that case the quotation marks are not given; but then the words cited do not go beyond one sentence or verse. In all other cases, the credit is given in the usual way.

PSALM I.

1 Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly, nor standeth in the way of sinners, nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

2 But his delight is in the law of the LORD; and in his law doth he meditate day and night.

3 And he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither; and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

4 The ungodly are not so: but are like the chaff which the wind driveth away.

5 Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment, nor sinners in the congregation of the righteous.

6 For the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous: but the way of the ungodly shall perish.

THE date of this Psalm is to be determined very much by its authorship. Two opinions have chiefly prevailed. One is that David wrote it. If so, it was written more than a thousand years before Christ. Those who hold David to have been the author, seem to be influenced by such considerations as the following. It seems proper that the author of the major part of the Psalms should be the author of the Introduction to the book. It is alleged that the style is that of David, or at least of his times. It is also said that the Jews uniformly united the first and second Psalms into one, and that David is confessedly the author of the second, and, if so, of the first also. Some say that in several copies of the New Testament, Acts xiii. 33, speaks of the first and not of the second Psalm, and that this shows David to have been the author of both the first and second in our arrangement. If these two are in fact but one Psalm, and if David wrote the first verse of the second Psalm, as we know he did, then none will deny that he wrote all that properly belongs to that composition.

The other opinion respecting the date of this Psalm is that it was written about four hundred and fifty years before Christ by Ezra, or by some one in his times, when he was arranging the canon of Scripture. The reasons given for this opinion are that such was the general belief for a long time, that it was peculiarly proper and very natural that the collector of the canon of Scripture, who also arranged the Psalms, should, after all the rest was written, prefix the first Psalm as a prologue to the book, and that there is nothing in the style of this Psalm rendering it improbable that Ezra was the author. Nevertheless the weight of opinion is in favor of David as the author. Williams: "We know nothing of Ezra as a poet."

This Psalm has no title. This is so remarkable, that some have contended that the first clause should be regarded as the inscription. But this view is not supported by the requisite proofs. The fact is that the Psalm needs no title, because it is so plain, and because it is itself a preface to all the great matters, which come after it. Basil says, "What the foundation is to a house, the keel to a ship, the heart to an animal, the same is this Psalm to the whole book. It is a preface to the Psalter." Athanasius and Theodoret give it this title, Blessedness. The Arabic has this title: "The beauty of piety and the hope of another state."

The sum of this Psalm is that the just and he alone is blessed. It incites us to the love of righteousness by presenting proper hopes. By pointing to the dreadful end of the wicked, it warns us to flee from all iniquity. It is a compend of all the Psalms, and indeed of all Scripture. In many of our Bibles the caption given is, "The happiness of the godly. The unhappiness of the ungodly." Let us consider each verse in order.

1. Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly. The word translated blessed is in the Hebrew plural, while the word rendered man is singular. Scholars are not agreed whether the plural form of the first word is used simply from a regard to the idiom of the original, or whether it announces the richness of the variety of blessings secured to the righteous. The latter view is perhaps preferable. It is well to give all the fulness of meaning, which the grammatical construction and the analogy of faith will allow. However tried and afflicted, every servant of God has vast treasures of good things in possession and in prospect. Both the Psalmist and the Saviour began their teachings with pronouncing blessedness to be the portion of God's people. The Chaldee and Arabic read the first clause thus, "A blessing on the man;" Piscator and Michaelis use this paraphrase, "Oh the right goings, happy progress, and good success of the man;" Morison says, "Oh the blessedness of this man;" Alexander would paraphrase it, "How completely happy is the man;" Mudge, Edwards, and Anderson render it, "Oh the blessednesses of the man." The catalogue of mercies secured to God's people is long.

We have next a negative description of the man, who is so blessed. He walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly. A man's walk is the course of his life. When the tenor of one's ways is like that of the wicked, he is wicked. Like Enoch, all the righteous walk with God. The counsel of the wicked is a term used to denote not merely his advice, but his aims, his maxims, his principles, his practices. In all these, saints and sinners are unlike. The righteous hates the thought of sin, and so walks not with the impious. It is next said that this blessed man standeth not in the way of sinners. He seeks no intimacy with them as his companions. If he mingles with them, they are a grief to him. And he sitteth not in the seat of the scornful. In Scripture, scorning expresses the indifference and hatred of the wicked towards divine things. They contemn God. Nor is anything more expressive of the deadly malice of the wicked towards the righteous than the cruel mockings, to which the latter are often exposed. The natural tendency of all sin is to lead to outbreking and deadly despite towards all that is good. Proud and haughty scorner is the name of all, who long resist divine calls and mercies. Bradley: "And in the habitation of scornors hath not dwelt." If this is an improvement on our version, it is not obvious.

2. The second verse describes the character of the righteous by two positive qualities. One is that his delight is in the law of the LORD. Here first occurs in the Psalms that great, dreadful, and incommunicable name of God, Jehovah. In Scripture no other name is nearly so often given to the Most High. It is expressive of self-existence, independence, unchangeableness, and eternity. It is never given to any but the true God. Our translators, following the Septuagint, commonly rendered this word LORD, printing it in small capitals. In all cases it might have been as well simply to transfer the word to our language. The law of Jehovah here spoken of embraces the whole word of God then written. A part is put for the whole. The law was a prominent part of the revelation of God's will in the days of the Psalmist. A good man loves the decalogue, because it is the transcript of God's moral character. He also loves all the law of the dispensation under which he lives. He cavils not at divine institutions, though they may be ceremonial. Christ would be baptized, and thus fulfil all righteousness. His piety caused him to obey every institution of God, which was then in force. This view of this clause shows that Rom. vii. 14-25, cannot describe the exercises of an unregenerate person. He never delights in the law of God after the inward man. If this were possible, the righteous and the wicked would be alike, and regeneration would make no difference in one's character, and so would be of no value. It is also clear that those who set aside any part of God's word, bring their souls into jeopardy. Our Saviour's warnings on this subject are awful. Matt. v. 19; Rev. xxii. 19. Let no man break one of the least commandments, or teach others to do so. Neither let men despise the doctrines of God's word. The spiritual man loves and embraces them. He is not a child of God who delights not in the Holy Scriptures.

Another positive sign of a renewed man is that he meditates in the law of the LORD day and night. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." Vain thoughts lodge in all ungodly men. But the righteous hate sinful imaginings. What the wicked would be ashamed to act or speak out, the righteous is ashamed to think or desire. Yet his mind is full of activity. He meditates. The power of reflection chiefly distinguishes a man from a brute. The habit of reflection chiefly distinguishes a wise man from a fool. Pious reflection on God's word greatly distinguishes a saint from a sinner. Without meditation grace never thrives, prayer is languid, praise dull, and religious duties unprofitable. Yet to flesh and blood without divine grace this is an impossible duty. It is easier to take a journey of a thousand miles than to spend an hour in close, devout, profitable thought on divine things. Like prayer, Luke xviii. 7, meditation is to be pursued day and night, not reluctantly, but joyously, not merely in God's house, or on the Lord's day, but whenever other duties do not forbid, "with such incessant study," says J. H. Michaelis, "that even when the act ceases, there is no abatement of the pious affection." Nor does the true child of God slight any part of divine truth. He loves it all. Bates says, "Habitual and delightful thoughts are the best discovery of our hearts and our spiritual state. Words and actions may be overruled and counterfeit for divers reasons, but thoughts are the invisible productions of the soul, and without fear or mask, without restraint or disguise, undissemblingly discover the disposition of the heart. Thoughts are the immediate offspring of the soul; and as the waters that immediately flow from the spring are strongest of the mineral, so the thoughts are most deeply tinctured with the affections. A saint is therefore described by his 'meditating in the law of God day and night,' which is the natural and necessary effect of his delight in it."

3. Such a man shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water. In Scripture a river means any running stream of water. Ps. cxix. 136. Lam. iii. 48. It may be natural as in 2 Kings v. 12, Ecc. i. 7, or artificial as in Pr. xxi. 1, Deut. xi. 10. In hot Eastern countries trees flourish most by the side of water courses. When all around is burnt up with heat and drought, they are fresh and green. Alexander says, "The original words properly denote canals or channels, as customary means of artificial irrigation. Hence the single tree is said to overhang more than one, because surrounded by them." The righteous is a tree planted. No man is by nature a friend of God, a tree of righteousness. The wild olive must be grafted before it will be fruitful. Rom. xi. 17-24. By nature we are all outcasts. It is grace that makes us the planting of the LORD. To be planted signifies also permanency of connection. The faith of a good man is not temporary, neither are any of his graces. He has taken root in a good place, and so his life is well maintained. "Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing; to show that the LORD is upright." So the righteous bringeth forth his fruit in his season. His blossoms are fair, but his mature fruit is better. It comes in the right time and is beautiful in its season. It has often been noticed in false professors that their acts and words are ill-timed, and that the high expectations sometimes raised by them are never realized. "'Tis the brand of a hypocrite to have devotion come by fits, to seem like an angel one day, and live like an atheist the next." Calvin thinks that the phrase, in his season, chiefly points to the maturity of the fruit produced. Street renders the passage thus, "It bringeth forth all its produce to maturity."

His leaf also shall not wither. The appearance of such a tree corresponds to its fruit. Applied to a child of God, the leaf has commonly been supposed to represent his religious profession. He will not fall away in time of temptation and persecution. He cannot forsake Christ. To whom else shall he go? Lot will be a good man even in Sodom. As a tree thus planted "exhibits all the fragrance and all the beauty of perpetual spring," so shall it be with the just man. Bellarmine's note on this passage is, that "there are some trees, which produce leaves only, and do not even long retain these. There are others, which produce leaves and long retain them, but their fruit is either ripe too soon to be full grown, or it is not ripe when it ought to be. Others put forth fruit at the right time, and are always covered with foliage, but sadly fail in bringing fruit to maturity. There are others, which alone can be said to be perfect in kind. These have both leaves and fruit, always retain their foliage, and always yield their ripe fruit in its season. Such trees are [Mediterranean] Pines, Palm-trees, and Olive-trees, to which the Scripture often compares righteous men. In this place the prophet says that the righteous are like these trees. The apostle says that the righteous are rooted and grounded in love. By a lasting friendship they are hard by the living fountain, whence they ever draw the nourishment of grace, and bring forth good works in the right time, and all things work together for their good, and they shall perpetually flourish in glory and honor."

And whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. Some have thought that there was a reference here to the tree of life. Gen. ii. 9. Rev. xxii. 2. But such a construction seems forced. The sense is complete without it. The just is blessed in his body and in his soul, in his basket and in his store; he is in covenant with God, and abides under the shadow of the Almighty; and so he cannot be a vain thing, he cannot beat the air, he cannot conceive wind and bring forth vanity. He shall have good success. He shall make progress and "do exploits" in the matters already noticed. As a religious man his course shall be upward and onward. "He shall run and not be weary, he shall walk and not faint." For a time his path may seem covered with darkness, and he may seem to be under the frown of God. But in the Mount it shall be seen. Enlargement and deliverance shall come at the right time and in the right way. God will teach all his people to walk by faith; and so he for a while may hedge up their way. But wait his time. Let him explain his own dealings with his people; and in all cases it shall be seen that the end of the Lord is wise, and that he is very pitiful and of tender mercy. It is often asserted that the New Testament far less clearly than the Old promises temporal blessings to the righteous. But is this so? Most respectable writers admit that temporal blessings are included in the promise made in Ps. xxxvii. 11, "The meek shall inherit the earth." Yet our Lord renews this promise in his sermon on the Mount. Matt. v. 5. If we exclude temporal blessings, how can we interpret Mark x. 29, 30? "Verily I say unto you that there is no man, that hath left house or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my sake, and the Gospel's, but he shall receive an hundred fold, now in this time, houses, and brethren, and sisters, and mothers, and children, and lands with persecutions; and in the world to come, eternal life." And thirty-five years after Christ's ascension, his blessed servant, Paul, tells us that "godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." 1 Tim. iv. 8. What more could we ask? It is true that in the case of his people God subordinates temporal to spiritual blessings. This is right. No wise man would have it otherwise. This was always so. In spiritual affairs this prosperity is great. The labor of the believer is not in vain in the Lord. All good works, pious desires, holy purposes shall in the end be found seeds of immortal bliss.

4. The ungodly are not so. There is a difference in character and prospects between the righteous and the wicked. The latter are not really blessed in anything. To such Jehovah says, "I will curse your blessings." Mal. ii. 2. They walk in the counsel of the ungodly, stand in the way of sinners, sit in the seat of the scornful; their delight is not in the law of the Lord, neither do they meditate in God's word day and night; nor are they like a well watered tree, bringing forth seasonable fruit, and covered with green foliage; and whatsoever they do shall in the end work their shame and overthrow. A sad and utter defeat of all their plans awaits the ungodly. For they are like the chaff which the wind driveth away. The chaff is nothing compared to the wheat. It is light, and when the wheat is winnowed, the chaff is carried by the wind from the threshing floor. Sudden removal awaits the worthless chaff. This is a figure often found in Scripture. John Baptist says that Christ "will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." The worthlessness of sinners for any purpose but to be burned is fearfully argued by an inspired prophet. Ezek. xv. The wicked are a lie. They are vanity. They shall soon and terribly disappear. They shall be driven away in their wickedness. When they cry, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh. Bloody and deceitful men do not live out half their days. If the enemies of God as a class were as long lived as his friends, the state of society would be well nigh intolerable. One pious man often outlives several generations of the violent, the dissipated, and the debauched. The death of many wicked men is appalling. The signals of distress held out by expiring nature show that all is lost. The wicked often boast in great swelling words what they will do; but the first breath of the divine displeasure makes them mourn sore like doves, yea, roar like bears. It is proof of dreadful blindness that the wicked do not see what the end will be. The sign of their coming defeat, the tokens of their approaching perdition are many, clear and alarming. Their reluctance to a removal from earth will not delay their departure. The wind will drive them away. One said, "O doctor, I will give you my plantation, if you will save my life." Voltaire offered a great sum to his physician, if he would prolong his life for a few months. A great monarch once said, "A world of wealth for an inch of time." No wonder Balaam was unwilling to die the death of the ungodly. It requires no grace, but only a little thought and common sense to make any man anxious to avoid such an end, as is coming on all the ungodly.

5. The death of the wicked is but the beginning of their overthrow. After death is the last account. The ungodly shall not stand in the judgment. To stand is to maintain one's cause, to hold one's own, to be unhurt and unterrified. But in the last day the wicked will have no confidence, no comfort, no support. Edwards: "They will not carry their cause." They will cry to the rocks and to the mountains to hide them from the face of the Judge and from the wrath of the Lamb. There is no evidence that the judgment here spoken of is the tribunal of man. Clearly the reference is to the judgment of God. Horne: "The judgment here intended is evidently the last judgment; the congregation of the righteous is their assembly at the judgment-seat of Christ."

Nor shall sinners stand in the congregation of the righteous. Now the people of God are dispersed all over the world. But a day is coming when they shall be congregated. Then shall be made an eternal separation between God's friends and God's foes. The general assembly and church of the First-born gathered in heaven is and ever shall be composed of all the choice spirits of the universe. Into the temple not made with hands shall enter nothing that defileth, or that loveth and maketh a lie. In this life the holy and the unholy are often found together at the Lord's table. The tares and wheat grow together until the harvest. The sheep and goats herd together till the Chief Shepherd shall appear. It is a blessed fact respecting the heavenly state, that there the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

6. The great difference between saints and sinners shall soon appear, for the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous. God has a perfect understanding of the real character of his people. His omniscience is their guaranty against their being at last confounded with the wicked. Charnock: "Without such a knowledge and discerning, men would not have their due; nay, a judgment just for the matter would be unjust in the manner, because unjustly passed, without an understanding of the merit of the cause. It is necessary, therefore, that the Supreme Judge of the world should not be thought to be blindfold when he distributes his rewards and punishments, and muffle his face when he passes his sentence. It is necessary to ascribe to him the knowledge of men's thoughts and intentions; the secret wills and aims; the hidden works of darkness in every man's conscience, because every man's work is to be measured by the will and inward frame. It is necessary that he should perpetually retain all those things in the indelible and plain records of his memory, that there may not be any work without a just proportion of what is due to it. This is the glory of God to discover the secrets of all hearts at last; as 1 Cor. iv. 5: The Lord shall bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of all hearts, and then shall every man have praise of God. This knowledge fits him to be a judge." The reason why the ungodly shall not stand in judgment, is because God knows their ways, which is implied in his knowing the way of the righteous. Hengstenberg: "The knowing here comprehends blessing in itself as its necessary consequence. If the way of the righteous, their lot, is known by God as the omniscient, it cannot but be blessed by him as the righteous." To know also signifies to approve, to love, to deal mercifully with. Amos iii. 2: Matt. vii. 23. Grotius renders it, approveth. Thus much the word often signifies. No love of man is comparable to the amazing tenderness of God to all his people. He pities like a God. He approves the graces implanted by his own Spirit, he loves his chosen with an everlasting love, he deals mercifully with all who put their trust in him. Bradley would read it, "The Lord shall cause the way of the righteous to be known." This is no improvement.

But the way of the ungodly shall perish, because God knows his folly and hardness of heart. Every divine perfection makes certain the ruin of wicked men. Their natural life shall cease, and with it all their pomp, and pride, and power, and plans, and pleasures, and hopes, and boastings. The rebels shall not always seem to have it their way. A full end will be made of their triumphing. Their way shall perish. Nothing is more certain, nothing is more dreadful. Some say that they do not believe their Maker will ever become their enemy, but they ought to take his word on that point: "He that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will show them no favor." Is. xxvii. 11. All the wicked are doing work for repentance—either for saving repentance in time, or for fruitless regrets in hell. "What the fool does in the end, the wise man does in the beginning."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It has ever been and will ever be true that if men would be saved, they must forsake bad company, v. 1. He who goes with a multitude to do evil, shall go with a multitude to suffer punishment. "The companion of fools shall be destroyed." He who persistently walks, and stands, and sits with the ungodly, shall lie down with them in hopeless sorrow. Bishop Hall: "I have often wondered how the fishes can retain their fresh taste, and yet live in salt waters, since everything partakes of the nature of the place where it abides, and of that which is around it. So it is with evil company, for besides that it blemisheth our reputation, and makes us thought evil of though we be good, it also inclines us insensibly to ill, and works in us, if not an approbation, yet a less dislike to those sins to which our eyes and ears are thus continually inured. For this reason, by the grace of God I will ever shun it. I may have a bad acquaintance, but I will never have a wicked companion."

2. All preaching and writing, which uniformly fail to draw a vigorous line between the friends and foes of God, cannot much profit men's souls. A discriminating statement of the truths of God's word is eminently scriptural. So we learn from the first Psalm and from all the sacred writers. Let the difference between sin and holiness, saints and sinners never be denied, never be forgotten. Eternity alone will show how great it is.

3. Wicked men naturally grow worse and worse. They first walk in evil courses; then they stand in the way of sinners; at length they sit in the scorner's chair. Ruffin: "To walk in the counsel of the ungodly is to consent to their wicked plots. To stand in the way of sinners is to persevere in evil works. To sit in the seat of the scornful is to teach others the evil which one practises himself." No one all of a sudden becomes very vile. There are crises in the lives of the wicked, but the approach to them is gradual. The unregenerate are very blind. The scorner thinks he is very philosophic, and free from whims and prejudices; but he is the dupe of his passions, the servant of sin, and the slave of the devil. Who has ever seen a candid infidel? Scorning is an old artifice to keep conscience quiet. Hengstenberg: "Religious mockery is as old as the fall." Beware of it and of all that leads to it. When a man commences a downward course, there is no telling where he will stop. Grace may arrest him at any stage in this life. Death may suddenly terminate his earthly career. Left to himself his eternal undoing is certain. Even scoffing alarms him not, for the further he goes, the blinder he is. All sin hardens the heart, stupefies the conscience, and shuts out the light of truth.

4. Let no man think himself safe, because others, who lead a similar life, are not alarmed at their condition, v. 1. There is often a peculiar stillness just before the earthquake. Probably the sun rose as fair on the morning of the overthrow of the cities of the plain as it ever had done. The ungodly all around us may be making merry at threatened judgments. But that will not avert them. The sneers of the ungodly prove wrath to be near at hand. Their "judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not." 2 Pet. ii. 3.

5. It is a great thing to have a heart for religion, and for spiritual truth, v. 2. To delight in divine things is as necessary as to see their importance, or to believe their reality. We must love as well as know. If we have spiritual discernment we will have our affections engaged. No man can really perceive beauty without being affected by it.

6. He, who would be truly blessed, must become a student of Scripture. There is no substitute for this. God's word is able to make men wise unto salvation. It is quick and powerful. Nothing so penetrates the heart of man. With a good man it has authority. Even devils know and to some extent feel its power. Matt. iv. 11.

7. Any religion which sets aside God's law, is spurious. It is not the religion of the Psalmist, v. 2. It is not the religion of Jesus Christ. Matt. v. 17, 18. It is not the religion of his apostles. Rom. iii. 31. Antinomianism is one of the worst forms of error. It makes Christ the minister of sin.

8. It is no wonder that the truly pious grow in purity. Their thoughts dwell on the most ennobling themes. They meditate on God's word, v. 2. This gives an amazing elevation to their characters. And the Sanctifier specially blesses revealed truth to the spiritual good of all the saints. By faith we lay hold of the promises, and God fulfils them. Great and glorious truths are well suited to refine our natures.

9. Though this is a wicked and suffering world, yet even here the righteous have real blessedness, vv. 1, 3, 6. It is not complete as it shall be after the resurrection, nor perfect as it shall be immediately after death; but it is solid, genuine, and enduring. It is from God. Their reliance is on him, who knows how to give graces and comforts in right measure and in due season. The frames of the righteous vary, but their state is stable. The saving gifts of God are without repentance. With the saints something is settled. Their peace is secured by an everlasting covenant. Their principles are made strong by divine grace. They are like Mount Zion which cannot be moved, but abideth for ever. Clarke: "The most momentous concern of man is the state he shall enter upon after this short and transitory life is ended; and in proportion as eternity is of greater importance than time, so ought men to be solicitous upon what grounds their expectations with regard to that durable state are built, and on what assurances their hopes or their fears stand." Even the wicked often admit that for the next world the righteous have chosen the good part, which shall not be taken from them. In this life things may often happen to the righteous hard to be borne. Cummings: "The man, who is born again, and seeks to be holy, as God is holy, is like the poor captive bird in the cage. The cage cannot kill the bird; the bird cannot free itself from the cage; it can only still wait, and persevere, and sing, and seek, and look till the hour of its freedom. Its perfect emancipation into brighter realms and better days draws near."

But those, who deny that piety affords delights even in this life, are ignorant of its nature. It presents the most glorious themes, inspires the most blessed hopes, and affords the most elevated employments. Nothing in the service of God's people is degrading. It teaches the soul to lean on the bosom of God. South: "The pleasure of the religious man is an easy and portable pleasure, such an one as he carries about in his bosom, without alarming either the eye or the envy of the world. A man putting all his pleasures into this one is like a traveller's putting all his goods into one jewel; the value is the same, and the convenience greater." If any ask, what are the foundations of the advantages of the righteous over the ungodly, it is easy to show some of them. First, the just man has truth on his side. His hopes and his cause are not based in falsehood, in error, in deception, in disguise, in fiction, in fancy. Truth will outlive all its opposites, though for a time it may fall in the streets. So that any wise man would accept a good title to an acre, rather than a spurious title to leagues of land, would rather be charged with a murder, of which he was innocent, than be guilty of a murder, of which he was unsuspected. A truthful claim to a penny is really worth more than a fictitious claim to a pound. The reason is that in the end the truth, even in this life, does commonly appear. In the next world it cannot be concealed. "For there is nothing hid, which shall not be manifested; neither was anything kept secret, but that it should come abroad." Mark iv. 22. "Some men's sins are open beforehand, going before to judgment: and some men they follow after. Likewise also the good works of some are manifest beforehand: and they that are otherwise cannot be hid." 1 Tim. v. 24, 25. Again, the righteous is on the side of duty. He honestly intends and endeavors to do what is right, because it is right and obligatory. In the main even here it is found that fidelity brings the best rewards. Neglect of duty sometimes brings apparent ease and profit. But who would not prefer Joseph's dutifulness to Ahithophel's treachery? When the master is on a long journey, the lazy and disobedient servants may think their faithful brethren needlessly careful; but in the day of reckoning saints and sinners will alike see that a life spent in God's service ends happily, while a wicked life leads to misery alone. Besides, the people of God have justice on their side; and the impression is both general and well-founded that nothing forms a more ample shield to any one than having the right on his side. And the saints know that "God is not unrighteous to forget their work and labor of love." Moreover God with all his attributes is on the side of the righteous. "And if God be for us, who can be against us?" That is inspired reasoning. It is also clear and level to the apprehension of the simple. Nor is this all. The righteous consults his best interests. He puts the soul above the body, eternity above time, and he is right. If his soul is refreshed, he remembers that man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. If a blessed eternity is before him, he well judges that it matters little how much he may suffer in this world. Nothing is of such moment as an eternal well-being. Nor are the righteous at war with their own consciences, or best feelings. Jesus Christ has often called his friends to sacrifice ease, fame, earthly goods, old friendships, and even life itself. But blessed be his name he never asked any man to defile his conscience, nor to tarnish his honor by an act of meanness. If Eugene Beauharnais will retain the imperial favor of his step-father Napoleon, he must publicly unite in approving the dishonor put on his own mother. But the Almighty never called one of his servants to do a base thing. God always leaves the good conscience and good principles intact; yea, he greatly strengthens them. How then can the righteous but be blessed?

Luther: "It is the practice of all men to inquire after blessedness, and there is no man on earth, who does not wish that it might go well with him, and would not feel sorrow if it went ill with him. But he, who speaks in this Psalm with a voice from heaven, beats down and condemns everything, which the thoughts of men might cogitate and devise in the matter, and brings forth the only true description of blessedness, of which the whole world knows nothing, declaring that he only is blessed and prosperous, whose love and desire are directed to the law of the Lord. This is a short description, and, indeed, one that goes against all sense and reason, especially against the reason of the worldly-wise and the high-minded. As if he had said, Why are ye so much in seeking counsel? why are ye ever in vain devising unprofitable things? There is but one precious pearl, and he has found it, whose love and desire is towards the law of the Lord, and who separates himself from the ungodly—all succeeds well with him. But whosoever does not find this pearl, though he should seek with ever so much pains and labor the way to blessedness, he shall never find it." The prophet Isaiah speaks to the same effect. Chap. lv. 2, 3.

10. Seldom do men forsake a wicked life, until they are convinced of its misery. Accordingly the Scriptures honestly tell them of their wretchedness, vv. 4, 5, 6. The prodigal never came to himself till he began to feed swine. Virtue does not indeed consist in merely seeking happiness; but it is useful to us to see that pain follows sinful pleasure, and that a just God will not permit a course of wickedness to triumph over all goodness. Hell follows close on the heels of transgression. The rivers do not more naturally run into the sea, than does iniquity tend to ruin. On this point the word of God is clear and emphatic. Let wicked men know that they are poor and miserable. Rom. iii. 16; Rev. iii. 17.

11. The ungodly, however moral, or amiable, or confident of their good estate, are yet destitute of spiritual life, of God's favor, of holy tempers, of well-grounded hopes, vv. 4, 5, 6. The fact is they have much to weep over, and nothing to rejoice in. The list of their wants is appalling. Paul sums up their case in the lack of five things; they are without God, without Christ, without the church, without the covenant, without hope, Eph. ii. 12. Is not this enough to fill any thoughtful man with alarm? A human arm separated from the body, of which it is a member, cannot live. It must perish. So a soul, separated from God, must lose all resources of permanent happiness and in the end be filled with all misery. Even that which the wicked seem to have, shall presently be taken away; all their works and expectations shall be driven away like chaff.

12. The doctrine of eternal judgment is no novelty, v. 5. It was preached with awful solemnity to the sinners of the old world. Jude 14, 15. It is clearly taught in the first Psalm. "Ewald justly refers the words [of verse 5] to the progression of the divine righteousness, which is perpetually advancing, though not every moment visible. All manifestations of punitive righteousness are comprehended in it. 'For God will bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil.'" Eccle. xii. 14. Let the wicked prepare to meet their God. There must be a judgment. God has said so. Justice requires it.

13. One of the most striking effects of the last judgment will be a perfect and eternal separation between the righteous and the wicked, v. 5. Thenceforth they can meet no more for ever. Here they often live together, protected by the same laws, inhabiting the same city, frequenting the same places of worship, of business and of recreation, members of the same family, or lying in the same bed; and yet when on the last day they shall part, their intercourse shall never be renewed, while eternity endures. The apparent confusion of things in this present state will all give way to a great and blessed clearing up and an eternal separation of the sheep from the goats.

14. What a blessed gathering of the righteous that shall be, when the doves shall all come to their windows, the sheep all be in the one fold far from the prowl of wild beasts, the children all be gathered to their Father's house with its many mansions, the exiles return to their own city in everlasting peace and with everlasting joy. The righteous have and shall have the opposite of the wicked, as is implied in v. 5. Nor is the rest of the righteous inconsistent with eternal activity, nor with the perfection of the communion of saints. The Scriptures often represent heaven as a social state. The church on earth is a type of the church above. Let us not hopelessly mourn our departed brethren in Christ. They are in the city of God. "There are our treasures, changeless and shining treasures. Let us look hopefully. They are not lost, but gone before; lost only like stars of the morning that have faded into the light of a brighter heaven: lost to the earth, but not to us."

15. The miseries of the wicked will in part be social, v. 5. They shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous; but they shall mingle with all the vile and malignant of fallen angels and incorrigible men. Isa. xiv. 9-19. Their doom and woes will be dreadful. Christ "will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." Matt. iii. 12. To denote eternal and irretrievable ruin God has employed a variety of speech indicating insufferable anguish. The way of the ungodly shall perish. And all the woe of the wicked shall be the fruit of their own doings. They shall reap what they have sowed, and not something else. Their way leads to hell and no where else.

16. It should be a great business of our lives to examine ourselves, whether we are righteous or ungodly. To this end in part this whole Psalm is given us. An aversion to this duty is no good sign. We have all much cause for noting the words of Luther: "When Scripture speaks of the ungodly, take heed that thou thinkest not, as the ungodly ever do, as if it referred to Jews and heathens, or, perhaps also to other persons; but present thyself also before this word, as what respects and concerns also thee. For a right-hearted and gracious man is jealous of himself, and trembles before every word of God." The truth will come out. No man will make his case worse by honestly looking into it. Some have escaped a dreadful overthrow by finding out in time that they were self-deceived. Amyrald: "Although the providence of God, whose ways are sometimes unsearchable, does not always place so remarkable a distinction between the righteous and the wicked, still the future life shall so distinguish them, that no one shall be longer able to doubt, who they are that follow the path of true prosperity." Of all the follies of men none can be worse than that of hiding from themselves their true condition and character.

17. Let us learn the art of applying God's word to our own cases. Whoever thus employs this Psalm shall be much profited. It is a poor thing to hide the truth from our hearts by a mere regard to the letter of Scripture. Criticism, when cold, is as likely to mislead us as anything else. We must have divine illumination and spiritual unction, else all our learning will but make us the greater fools. Many a man's knowledge, because unsanctified, serves but as a torch to light him to hell. He trusts in himself that he is in no danger, because he studies the Scriptures with taste and judgment, but forgets that spiritual discernment is essential to salvation. McCheyne's method of applying Scripture was to turn each verse into a prayer.

18. The plain and clear teachings of Scripture are the weighty matters, claiming immediate and universal attention. He, who rightly heeds such truths as are taught in the first Psalm will find himself led along till he shall apprehend enough of God's will to be infallibly saved. The great mysteries of salvation are best understood by those, who rightly receive the simplest teachings of God's word, and so reduce them to practical use.

19. In all our study of God's word we must have faith. Heb. iv. 2. This grace of the Spirit is of the greatest importance. Without it we always go astray, live in darkness, and are made miserable by the stings inflicted by our own minds. "Nothing greater can be said of faith, than that it is the only thing, which can bid defiance to the accusations of conscience." This it does by beholding the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world. Christ Jesus is the only hope of perishing sinners.

PSALM II.

- 1 Why do the heathen rage, and the people imagine a vain thing?
- 2 The kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his anointed saying,
- 3 Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us.
- 4 He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision.
- 5 Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure.
- 6 Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion.
- 7 I will declare the decree: the LORD hath said unto me, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee.
- 8 Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.
- 9 Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel.
- 10 Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed, ye judges of the earth.
- 11 Serve the LORD with fear, and rejoice with trembling.
- 12 Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.

INSPIRATION has determined that David was the author of this Psalm. Acts iv. 25. Knowing the authorship we are not very uncertain as to its probable date. The most probable view is that it is now (1866) two thousand nine hundred and six years old. That is, it was written ten hundred and forty years before Christ. Dodd thinks it certain that this Psalm was penned after the removal of the ark to Sion, because it expressly speaks of the hill of God's holiness. It was not such till the ark there rested, ten hundred and forty-eight years before Christ. Some think this Psalm was written ten hundred and forty-seven, B. C.

Like the first Psalm, this has no title, giving its theme, occasion, or author. The reason may be that the matter is so plain as to require no formal announcement. The great design of the Psalm is to foretell the hatred of men to the person and reign of Christ, the glories of Messiah, the triumphs of his kingdom, and the dreadful downfall of his foes, thus laying a proper ground for solemn exhortation to all men to yield themselves subjects of the Prince of life. Henry: "As the foregoing Psalm was moral, and showed us our duty, so this is evangelical, and shows us our Saviour." Alexander: "This is the first of those prophetic Psalms, in which the promise made to David, with respect to the Messiah (2 Sam. vii. 16, and 1 Chron. xvii. 11-14), is wrought into the lyrical devotions of the ancient church." Here is a great and glorious prophecy respecting our Lord Jesus Christ. Let us study it with earnestness, humility and reverence.

Rivet and others have noticed that the form of this Psalm is dramatic. Alexander: "Little as this Psalm may, at first sight, seem to resemble that before it, there is really a very strong affinity between them. Even in form they are related to each other. The number of verses and of stanzas is just double in the second, which moreover begins, as the first ends, with a threatening, and ends, as the first begins, with a beatitude. There is also a resemblance in their subject and contents. The contrast indicated in the first is carried out and rendered more distinct in the second. The first is in fact an introduction to the second, and the second to what follows." All divine truth is nearly related.

From three sources we are led to regard this Psalm as highly Messianic. 1. This view was so obvious that the old Jewish interpreters uniformly admitted its application to Christ. Jarchi, who flourished in the 12th century, says: "Our doctors have expounded this Psalm of the Messiah; but that we may answer the heretics (Christians) it is expedient to interpret it of David's person, as the words sound." Cocceius: "The ancient Hebrews with the Chaldee beyond a doubt take this Psalm as respecting Christ. Even Abenezra confesses that, if it is applied to Christ, it is far more clear and free from difficulty than if applied to David or some other king." Other interpreters follow the same train of thought. Bellarmine: "This whole Psalm is a most manifest prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ." Henry: "This Psalm, as the former, is very fitly prefixed to this book of devotions, because, as it is necessary to our acceptance with God, that we should be subject to the precepts of his law, so it is likewise, that we should be subject to the grace of his gospel, and come to him in the name of a Mediator." Pool expounds it of Christ, but does not deny that the reign of David was a type of the kingdom of Christ. Many others have expressed the same views. 2. The matter of this Psalm shows that it respects Messiah. There are in it things which no law of language allows us to apply to any but Christ. Such are expressions found in verses 7, 8, and 12: "Thou art my Son," "I will give thee the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession," "Kiss the Son," etc. Hengstenberg justly lays great stress on the fact that "two names of the Messiah, which were current in the time of Christ—the name of Messiah itself, the anointed—and the name, Son of God, applied by Nathaniel in his conversation with Christ, John i. 49, and also by the high-priest in Matt. xxvi. 63, owed their origin to this Psalm in its Messianic meaning." 3. We have various inspired expositions of this Psalm. All the apostles in Acts iv. 24–27, Paul in Acts xiii. 33, and in Heb. i. 5, 8, and v. 5, and John in Rev. ii. 27, xix. 15, have put the matter beyond all fair dispute. Fabritius fitly regards the last two reasons here given as "infallible arguments."

Still the question recurs, Is not David in this Psalm a type of Christ? or is the Psalm purely prophetic without a type? It is not well needlessly to make types. So it is best not to say that there is a type here. We can explain the grammatical construction of every clause, and clearly get the whole sense without supposing that David is here a type. If David had never existed and if some other prophet, as Samuel or Isaiah, had written this Psalm, its doctrines would have been precisely the same as they are now, without a shade of difference even in their force. Why then should we insist on regarding David as here set forth a type of Christ? Besides, it would be simply profane to apply to David some of the phrases here used. At the same time there is no objection to supposing that the imagery of this Psalm was drawn from events happening in the reign of David. The ancient games furnished forms of expression, and illustrations to the mind of Paul, but they were not types of what he taught. Although not fully concurring in this view, Rivet admits that "nearly all the orthodox take this Psalm as simply and immediately referring to Christ, and interpret it accordingly." Beveridge: "The whole Psalm is to be understood of Christ and of him only." Scott: "The occasion of this Psalm might be taken from David's advancement to the throne, and his expectation of triumphing over the opposition made to his authority both by disaffected Israelites and the surrounding nations, (Notes, 2 Sam. ii. 4–9 and v.,) but it is throughout an evident prophecy of Christ, and repeatedly quoted as such in the New Testament."

From what has been said of the contents of this Psalm the reader will not expect expressions of deep emotion. Elevation and majesty more become the topic treated by the prophet. In other places we shall find the most tender and pathetic expressions of feeling.

1. Why do the heathen rage? The Syriac reads, Wherefore are the nations agitated? The Arabic: Why are peoples disturbed? Calvin: Why do the nations rise tumultuously? church of England: Why do the heathen so furiously rage together? Edwards: Why do the heathen tumultuously bandy together? Fry, regarding the tense of the original: Why have the heathen raged? Alexander: Why do nations make a noise, tumultuate, or rage? The old marginal rendering of the verb is, Tumultuously assemble. Why is equivalent to, for what purpose? to what end? for what cause? That is, these madmen act without cause. Hengstenberg: "The why is an expression of astonishment and horror at the equally foolish and impious attempt of the revolters." Cocceius: "The form of interrogation concerning the cause points out the absurdity of the commotion, for Christ came not to take away the kingdoms of the world, but to bestow the kingdom of heaven on the nations. Why, therefore, are they in such commotion? And why do the people imagine a vain thing?" The Syriac: Why do peoples plan vanity? Pool properly renders the verb in this clause in the future tense. Opposition to Christ is both old and lasting. Men have raged, and men shall meditate a thing of nought as long as wickedness reigns in their hearts. Calvin renders it, Why do the peoples murmur in vain? Alexander: Why will peoples imagine vanity? Henry thinks the whole verse refers exclusively to the temper of the Jews towards Christ. Burder thinks it refers exclusively to the hostility of the Gentiles. But why confine the sense to so narrow limits? The hatred of all wicked men to Christ is of old and has long been notorious. It is not confined to any nation. When he was a stumbling-block to the Jews, he was foolishness to the Greeks. History is full of accounts of this enmity against Christ. Every government on earth has some anti-christian laws or usages. But we have an inspired interpretation, applying this verse to all sorts of unrenewed men. In a prayer, common to them all, the apostles quote this and the next succeeding verses, and immediately add, "For of a truth against thy holy child Jesus, whom thou hast anointed, both Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Gentiles and the people of Israel, were gathered together." Acts iv. 27.

2. By the kings of the earth the Psalmist points out those who have supreme power in the government of the world; and by the rulers, the princes, or chief persons under kings, men in power, senators, governors, privy counsellors. All these meet and plot. There is tumult and rage among them. This is followed on the part of the great ones by meetings, consultations, unions, confederations, and fixed purposes of hostility. Calvin renders it, The kings of the earth have confederated, and the princes have assembled together; Fabritius: The kings of earth convene and the princes consult together; Waterland: The kings of the earth rise up, and the rulers assemble together; Edwards makes the whole of the second verse like the first interrogative; Chandler: The kings of the earth set themselves in opposition, and instigate each other; Hengstenberg: The kings of the earth set themselves and the rulers sit with one another [for the purposes of counsel;] Alexander, following the tense of the original: (Why will) the kings of earth set themselves? or the kings of earth will set themselves, and rulers consult together. The word rendered assemble is probably to be taken in a military sense, rendezvous, post, or muster. So thinks Edwards. They do all this against the Lord [Jehovah] and against his anointed [Messiah.] Their quarrel, and mustering of forces, and laying of plots is "against all religion in general, and the Christian religion in particular." They are averse to true natural religion and to true revealed religion. The enemies of God are of two classes. Some know what they are doing, and their whole behaviour is in despite and malice and against much light. Others sin ignorantly, in unbelief, not knowing what they do, even when they commit the foulest deeds. Luke xxiii. 24; Acts iii. 17; 1 Cor. ii. 8; 1 Tim. i. 13. While such ignorance saves one from the fixed doom of the unpardon-able sin, it does by no means remove guilt. The ignorance is itself sinful. Paul never forgave himself for having murdered the saints. He always thought that he had hardly escaped damnation for his persecutions. Men may fully evince hostility contrary to their earnest protestations. The great mass of wicked men lose their souls without intending any such thing. It is also clear that Jehovah regards opposition to his Christ as opposition to himself. The reason is given in Scripture: "I and my Father are one." John x. 30. "The Father is in me, and I in him." John x. 38. "He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me." Matt. x. 40. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." John xiv. 9. "All things that the Father hath are mine." John xvi. 15. "And all mine are thine, and thine are mine." John xvii. 10. "He that believeth on me, believeth not on me, but on him that sent me, and he that seeth me, seeth him that sent me." John xii. 44, 45. See also John xiv. 20 and xv. 23. So that Jehovah and Messiah are one—one in nature—one in counsel—one in government. Therefore none can war against the Son without contending against the Father. Nor can any approach the Father but by the Son. John xiv. 6. The title Messiah, Christ, Anointed, here given to the Son of God, is very proper. Christ was anointed to his burial, but not to his office of Mediator, by any costly ointment prepared after the art of the apothecary. The oil of gladness poured on him was the Holy Ghost. Ps. xlv. 7; Heb. i. 9. This anointing of Christ is much spoken of. Luke iii. 22; iv. 1, 14, 16–21. Christ received the Spirit not by measure. John iii. 34. The fulness of the Godhead dwelt in him bodily. Jesus was the anointed of God beyond all others, or, as the Psalmist elsewhere expresses it, above his fellows. Ps. xlv. 7. He is the only anointed Saviour. All the enemies of Jehovah and of his Anointed thus expressed their hostility:

3. Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us. The bands and cords are those of Jehovah and of his Anointed. To be bound and to feel bound to the Father and to his Son cannot but distress the ungodly. Calvin: "All the enemies of Christ, when compelled to be subject to his authority, reckon it not less degrading than if the utmost disgrace were put upon them;" Alexander: "The form of the Hebrew verb in this verse may be expressive either of a proposition or of a fixed determination. We will break their bands, we are resolved to do it. . . And we will cast, or let us cast away from us their cords, twisted ropes, a stronger term than bands." The authority of Christ human wickedness greatly abhors. Had he taught the great principles of morality found in the Gospels, but done it as a pharisee or philosopher, merely proposing things, there had never been such an outcry against him. But he asserts his right to rule mankind, and so men rebel against him. The kingly office of our Saviour is cordially hated by the unrenewed. God says, "They will reverence my Son." They reply, "We will not have this man to reign over us." Horne: "Doctrines will be readily believed, if they involve in them no precepts; and the church may be tolerated by the world, if she will only give up her discipline." If one of the propositions of Euclid, instead of proving what it does, did with equal clearness prove that men ought to be subject to Christ, the wicked would claim to have found a flaw in the argument. The enmity of the human heart rises higher against Christ, his authority, and his salvation than against anything else. The old controversy between Cain and Abel respected the Saviour. The strife was continued throughout the patriarchal dispensation. Abraham saw Christ's day and rejoiced in it, but the great mass of his cotemporaries despised, and wondered, and perished. Before the exodus from Egypt the great cause of the contempt which covered the Israelites was "the reproach of Christ." They were despised for looking for a Deliverer. And when his birth was announced "Herod was troubled and all Jerusalem with him." The greatest test of character to which men were ever subjected, is Jesus Christ himself. Nothing so manifests their real dispositions towards God. Well did Simeon say, "This child is set for the fall and rising again of many in Israel; and for a sign, which shall be spoken against, . . . that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed." Luke ii. 34, 35. Soon and strangely did the Pharisees and Herodians take counsel, how they might destroy him. Mark iii. 6. In less than three years after the public ministry of our Lord commenced, his enemies compassed his death. How dreadful were the persecutions of the followers of Christ by Nero, who put Paul and many Christians to death; by Domitian, who banished John to Patmos, and practised many refined cruelties; by Trajan, who threw Ignatius to the wild beasts; by Commodus, Severus, Maximin, Decius, and Diocletian, and by the apostate Julian, who forbade the Christians to give their children the advantages of a liberal education, and by many others down even to our own times. Venema: "What insanity has possessed Jews and Gentiles, and what unaccountable rage moves them, that without reason or any hope of final success they should thus cruelly and violently oppose themselves to the true religion and to the propagation of the Gospel! On one side the people seditiously rush upon the Christians and with horrible clamors drag them to destruction. On the other hand kings and governors of provinces, and emperors, even the Cæsars, deliberately consult to destroy the church by the direst persecutions, laboring even to blot out the Christian name." Jews, Infidels, Mahomedans, Pagans, and nominally Christian powers and people have all in their turn poured out their cruel scorn against the friends of Christ. So it always has been, and so it always shall be till "the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign forever and ever." Rev. ii. 15.

4. But to put down the kingdom of Christ is impossible. All this rage and malice are to such an end impotent. The war is unequal. Rivet: "It is as if a fly should attack an elephant, or a man endeavor to snatch the sun from the firmament." Morison compares all this tumult to "the effort of an infant to stay the whirlwind, or the unavailing yell of the maniac to calm the raging of the sea." Henry: "The moon walks in brightness though the dogs bark at it." No marvel, then, that "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision." There is not an agreement in different copies respecting the original word, here rendered, Lord. In the best editions of our English Bible, Lord is not put in capitals, as it would be if it was regarded as a translation of Jehovah. In the Hebrew Bibles now in common use, the original word, rendered Lord, is Adonai. Yet Street tells us that "Sixty manuscripts of Dr. Kennicott's collection, and twenty-five of De Rossi's, have Jehovah here. And Dimock says, "Sixty-six manuscripts have Jehovah." The annotator of Calvin increases the difficulty when he informs us that in the Hebrew Bibles to which he had access, the original is Elohai. If this is the true reading, then we have a name which is supposed by many to be peculiarly appropriate in designating the object of religious worship. If Adonai is the right word, then we have the Ruler of the world pointed out. This is a name given sometimes to magistrates. Though the latter is perhaps the reading to be preferred, yet either gives a good sense, and either is applicable to the Sovereign of the universe, who puts no trust in his servants, who charges his angels with folly, before whom the moon shineth not, and in whose sight the stars are not pure, the nations are as a drop of a bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the balance. All nations are before him as nothing; and they are counted to him less than nothing and vanity. He sitteth upon the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers. But to whom does the word Lord refer? to the Father or to the Son? This cannot be determined by the original, as Jehovah, Adonai, and Elohai are alike proper to either the Father or the Son. The only ground for determining that it distinctly refers to the Son, is that the Psalmist had previously introduced both persons and spoken of their bands and their cords, that both are subsequently spoken of, and that the parallelism would suggest that both be mentioned in this verse. But, on the other hand, only one person is mentioned in the next verse, and this verse belongs to the same strophe as that. Nor is it necessary always rigidly to keep up the distinction between the divine persons, where acts or works common to them are spoken of. Creation and the resurrection are both specially ascribed to each person of the divine nature, yet it is proper to say that the world was made and that the dead shall be raised by God without specifying any one person of the Trinity. On this verse Hilary quotes John v. 21-23, and adds that "the distinction of honor or dishonor towards the persons of the Father and Son is not carefully preserved; that true piety equally respects both, and that contempt of one is a wrong to the other. He who despises either despises both. Both are one in divinity and glory. In true religion, both are one in honor. So that those who rise up against the Lord rise up also against his Christ. And those who are laughed at by him who sitteth in the heavens, those also the Lord holds in derision."

To laugh and have in derision are forms of expression borrowed from human emotions and actions. To let us know the divine mind and determination, God is said to repent, to be angry, to be pitiful, because these phrases are understood by us, and so we get some idea of our Maker. But God is without passions. He weeps not. He laughs not. In Job xli. 29, it is said that "Leviathan laugheth at the shaking of a spear." No one is thus led to suppose that this sea-monster has any emotion corresponding to laughter among men, but as men in a state of safety, and sure of a victory over their adversaries, may and sometimes do laugh them to scorn, even when they are in the height of their power, so God derides the assaults of his foes. Henry: "Sinners' follies are the just sport of God's infinite wisdom and power; and those attempts of the kingdom of Satan, which in our eyes are formidable, in his are despicable."

The incorrigibly wicked shall pass away from earth "into shame and everlasting contempt." Nothing but its wickedness can equal the folly of sin.

5. This silent contempt of God for his foes and their plots shall continue until the time chosen by infinite wisdom for a display of his glorious justice. Then, when their iniquity shall be full, when all men shall have seen his long-suffering towards them, and when it shall appear that they did but harden themselves in pride engendered by his mercies, Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. To speak unto them is to make known his will by his acts. In men, actions speak louder than words. God's doings are mighty. His acts are terrible. He made the heathen tremble by the mighty deeds he did for Israel. When God lets out his wrath, men are troubled, and even nature stands aghast. The very mountains melt at his presence, and the sea flees before him. Into the destruction of the wicked enters every element that can heighten their misery. It is just, and so they cannot blame any other being. Every mouth will be stopped. Every sinner will be speechless. It is unnecessary, and might have been avoided, if sin had not been loved. Nothing but iniquity makes the doom of the finally impenitent what it is. Every man would have been wiser, better, happier, more useful, if he had fled from the wrath to come. It is complete, involving soul and body. It is a total destruction. Then it is hopeless. On the darkness of that gloom, which envelops them, no star ever rises, no light ever breaks. And it comes with surprise. They were not looking for it. They did not intend it. They did not expect it. When they cry, Peace and safety, then it is just at hand. It is an eternal destruction. There is no end to it. There can be no bounds set to it. God will vex the wicked by turning all their plans upside down. The people, whom they cursed and tormented, shall yet be made to appear blessed and enter into rest. The religion which the wicked opposed shall yet triumph. The Saviour, whom they despised, shall yet see all knees bowing before him, and shall yet hear all tongues confessing to him. Jehovah, against whom they consulted, will exalt his Son and glorify himself transcendently. Dimock reads the last clause of this verse, The Lord shall strike them with a panic.

6. God will treat the wicked as they deserve: Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion. The Septuagint, Arabic, and Vulgate: But I have been made King by Him on Zion, his holy hill. Thus Christ is made the speaker here. But this is taking too large liberty with the original. Instead of yet, Pool would read for, or in the meantime. Alexander prefers and; as if it read, You pursue your course and I mine. You rage and I set my King on Zion. For set, the margin correctly reads anointed. Christ was anointed that he might be King. Scott: "When the priests and rulers prevailed on Pilate to crucify their anointed King, they eventually forwarded his exaltation." Luther: "Who thought, when Christ suffered and the Jews triumphed, that God was laughing all the time?" God says, I have set my king on Zion. Christ is God's equal, God's fellow, God's Son, God's first-born, God's only-begotten, and is by him chosen and set up as King forever. Luther's note is, "I have appointed a King as most closely related to me." Hengstenberg much prefers this to the modern expositions. Christ is set, anointed, constituted King in Zion. The gifts and calling of God even to his people are without repentance. Surely then he will never permit his Son, his elect, in whom his soul delighteth, to be dethroned. This point is so well settled in God's word and in the faith of his people, that saints are not even tempted to believe that Christ has ceased or shall cease to occupy the mediatorial throne. God is not a man, that he should repent.

7. For he acts according to a fixed plan, a holy purpose, a decree. If God should change his plan, it must be either for the better or the worse. If it could be changed for the better, then it is not now perfect. This is contrary to Scripture. Deut. xxxii. 4; 2 Sam. xxii. 22, 31; Ps. xviii. 30. If he should change for the worse, then who could have confidence in him? But his counsel shall stand. It is of old. It is faithfulness and truth. He does not say, I will form the decree. It had been formed in the counsels of eternity. But Christ, who is that Prophet, the great Teacher of the church, says, I will declare the decree, q. d., I will now make known and publish abroad God's free, sovereign, eternal purpose, and let my enemies know that his determination is fixed. He is the Lord, and changes not. The speaker in this verse is he, who has been set as King in Zion. The Lord [Jehovah] hath said unto me, Thou art my Son. The stability of Christ's kingdom, rendering certain the defeat of his enemies, rests on three things; 1. On the anointing and setting up of Christ as King, v. 6; 2. On the fixedness of God's purpose; 3. On the relation subsisting between Jehovah and Christ, Thou art my Son. What is the full import of this language? Angels are in one book thrice called "Sons of God." Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7. Adam is called "the Son of God," Luke iii. 38. Pious men are called "Sons of God," Gen. vi. 2; Rom. viii. 14; 1 John iii. 1. But Paul proves that in the highest sense the angels are never called sons. Heb. i. 5. "For unto which of the angels said he at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?"

Others may be God's sons inasmuch as he made them, or by his Spirit renewed them, and by his grace adopted them; but Christ is God's Son by an essential and eternal Sonship. Christ has the same nature and attributes with the Father, and his relation to him is rightly expressed by the name Son. In this sense he is the only-begotten of the Father. In nature and in all things he has the pre-eminence over all others ever called sons of God. The filiation of Christ is ineffable and unparalleled. Gill: "Christ is the true, proper, natural, and eternal Son of God, and as such declared, owned, and acknowledged by Jehovah the Father." This day have I begotten thee. The opposition to the Sonship of Christ has been strange and very determined. Even good men have often been led to make erroneous concessions on the subject, while the enemies of the doctrine have displayed great ingenuity in endeavoring to sap this foundation of hope. Some have contended that the words of v. 7 refer to his incarnation. Though his coming in the flesh was not his Sonship, nor the means of attaining his Sonship, yet it was an illustrious proof of it, and is so referred to in Scripture. The angel, who visited Mary said, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing, which shall be born of thee, shall be called the Son of God." Luke i. 35. Nor was his public entrance on his ministry the beginning, or the ground of his Sonship, though on that occasion God did publicly own him; for "lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Matt. iii. 17. The same happened at his transfiguration. Mark ix. 7. A modern author contends that in Rom. i. 4, declared means constituted. He labors to show that Christ was constituted the Son of God by his resurrection. But twice before Christ's death God publicly from heaven declared Christ to be his Son. And the word in Rom. i. 4, beyond all reasonable doubt is properly rendered declared, defined, marked out, distinguished from all others. Nor was any subsequent step in his exaltation his Sonship or the ground of it. For his Sonship is the ground of his exaltation. The inheritance follows Sonship; not Sonship the inheritance. See next verse. Samson: "Nor was the Sonship constituted by his exaltation; for the apostles conjointly apply the circumstances of this Psalm to the persecutions which Christ suffered prior to his resurrection (and therefore prior to his exaltation), beginning with the attempts of Herod to destroy him, and ending with his sufferings under Pilate. See Acts iv. 24-28. Nor may anything be inferred to the contrary from the use which Paul makes of Ps. ii. 7, in Acts xiii. 33, "God hath fulfilled the same unto us their children, in that he hath raised up Jesus again; as it is also written in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee;" for a careful examination of the apostle's speech on that occasion will show that he used the passage to prove the fulfilment of the promise made to the fathers. Compare verses 23 and 32. And this was a promise not of Christ's resurrection; but that he should be raised up as a Saviour to Israel. Our translators have there rendered the original word, "raised up again," gratuitously; for the meaning of the promise is, that God would rear a Saviour for Israel. In proof of this the apostle afterwards proceeds, in v. 34, to raise his resurrection as a separate point, and, to support it, quotes a passage altogether different but appropriate. When thus explained, Paul makes the same primary and special application of the second Psalm in Acts xiii. 33, which the other apostles do in Acts iv. 24-28, viz: to the period of the Son's incarnation; and the passage quoted proves the Sonship of Christ not only in, but previous to his incarnation." Some have harped much on the words this day in this verse, as implying that Christ's Sonship was of recent date, and not eternal. But let us remember that the speaker in this verse is He, that inhabiteth eternity and says, "Before the day was I am he." Is. xlii. 13 and lvii. 15. With him one day is as a thousand years and a thousand years as a day. 2 Pet. iii. 8. Owen: "To-day, being spoken of God, of him who is eternal, to whom all time is so present as that nothing is properly yesterday, nor to-day, does not denote necessarily such a proportion of time, as is intimated. But it is expressive of an act eternally present, nor past, nor future." Alexander has set this matter in a clear light: "This profound sense of the passage is no more excluded by the phrase this day, implying something recent, than the universality of Christ's dominion is excluded by the local reference to Zion. The point of time, like the point of space, is the centre of an infinite circle.

Besides, the mere form of the declaration is a part of the dramatic scenery or costume, with which the truth is here invested. The ideas of a king, a coronation, a hereditary succession, are all drawn from human and temporal associations. This day have I begotten thee may be considered therefore as referring only to the coronation of Messiah, which is an ideal one. The essential meaning of the phrase I have begotten thee is simply this, I am thy father. The antithesis is perfectly identical with that in 2 Sam. vii. 14, "I will be his father, and he shall be my son." Had the same form of expression been used here, this day am I thy father, no reader would have understood this day as limiting the mutual relation of the parties, however it might limit to a certain point of time the formal recognition of it. It must also be observed, that even if this day be referred to the inception of the filial relation, it is thrown indefinitely back by the form of reminiscence or narration in the first clause of the verse. Jehovah said to me, but when? If understood to mean from everlasting or eternity, the form of expression would be perfectly in keeping with the other figurative forms by which the Scriptures represent things really ineffable in human language." This view relieves the passage of the difficulty arising from the use of the term to-day, as stated by Venema, and makes all consistent throughout. Every other exposition of this verse arrays one inspired man against another.

8. The doctrine of the kingdom and sonship of Christ, is immediately followed by the doctrine of his priesthood, one branch of which office is intercession, and we are at once told of its prevalence with God. Here is Christ's "patent for his office of Advocate." True, the high priest under the law entered the holy of holies and interceded for the people. But here we have the doctrine of the pleading of our great high priest stated without a figure. If we can fairly build any doctrine on the intercession of Christ, we may be assured that there is no firmer pillar of truth. This secures the recovery of the regenerate from all their lapses. Luke xxii. 31, 32. Here is the ground of Christian steadfastness. Heb. iv. 14. This makes salvation certain to all believers. Heb. vii. 25. The intercession of Christ is always prevalent. John xi. 42. It secures the calling of the Gentiles, the success of missions, the final and complete triumph of the Gospel. Jehovah says to the Son, "Ask of me, and I shall give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession." The intercession of Christ is the hope of the world. John xvii. 20. Nothing can hinder the final triumph of the Gospel,

9. Because power is given to Christ to execute vengeance on irreconcilable opposers. The Father says to him, "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron; thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel." The Septuagint, Syriac, and Arabic: Thou shalt feed them with a rod of iron; The Vulgate reads, rule. Those, who favor the change of rendering, suppose the language to be ironical. Many give sceptre instead of rod. The sceptre is the sign or badge of sovereign power. This belongs to Christ, and he will use that power to crush all finally impenitent foes. The figure of a potter's vessel probably refers not to the little value so much as to the frail nature of the opposers of Christ. The objections made to the clear statements of this verse seem to arise not from the words used, but from a dislike to the exercise of divine authority in the punishment of the wicked. In other words, it is the doctrine and not any want of force in the manner of announcing it, that has given offence. But from the first promise to the last threatening of Scripture the same is taught or implied. He, who shall bruise the serpent's head, will not endure forever the venom and contempt of the children of the wicked one. He will surely banish from his presence those who persistently refuse his friendship on earth. The wrath of the Lamb will be most terrible. To reject such love and mercy as are now offered, and to incur such wrath as is now threatened, is the height of madness. All this is included in the decree declared in v. 7.

10. Be wise now therefore, O ye kings: be instructed ye judges of the earth. Instead of be wise, Hengstenberg has act wisely. For be instructed, Waterland has be reformed; Piscator, Be ye chastened (i. e., submit to chastisement and profit by it); several others, Be ye corrected; church of England, following the Septuagint, Be learned; Alexander, Be warned, be admonished of your danger and duty. The great error of the wicked is a total disregard of all the safe principles by which wise men are governed. If in temporal affairs any man should act as foolishly, as in spiritual affairs all the wicked act, he would have curators appointed over his estate, and be deprived of the power of making legal contracts. The great call on all the enemies of God is to learn wisdom. Oh that they were wise unto salvation. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

11. Then they would surely have those reverential sentiments, which invariably characterize true piety, and so would obey the call so solemnly and earnestly made, Serve the LORD with fear and rejoice with trembling. Though in these last three verses kings and rulers are by name addressed, yet it is as heads of the people, so that all are included in the call to obedience. In all acceptable service rendered to Jehovah several things must unite. It must be sincere. Without this God abhors all offerings, however decent or costly. A service known to be feigned is offensive to all right-minded men. Much more must it be so to God. In serving him we must confine ourselves to things which he has commanded. It is only when people draw near to God with their mouth, and honor him with their lips, but have removed their heart far from him, that their fear towards him is taught by the precepts of men. Is. xxix. 13. Christ says, Ye are my friends, if ye do whatsoever I have commanded you. John xv. 14. Nor may our religious service be reluctant; it must be willingly rendered. God hates a grudging giver. Love is the fulfilling of the law. If we love we will obey. Our service must also be faithful. We must not be double-minded. We cannot divide our hearts between God and the world. We cannot serve God and mammon. And we must serve God with fear. Our approaches to him must not be familiar, but reverent; not easy, but awful. God is indeed on a throne of grace, but that is no less glorious and suited to inspire reverence than a throne of judgment. It is a remarkable fact that all false and corrupt forms of religion either generate that fear which has torment—a servile fear—or degenerate into an irreverent presumption, leading men to come before God as the horse rusheth into the battle. Such do not keep their feet when they go to the house of God; but are less ready to hear than to offer the sacrifice of fools. We must also serve God with joy. "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness." Isa. lxiv. 5. A good master delights not in seeing his servants exhibiting dejection of spirit. Let kings and subjects, rulers and people all serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling. None is so high as not to need the friendship of God; none so low as to be beneath the divine notice. Henry: "Even kings themselves, whom others serve and fear, must serve and fear God; there is the same infinite distance between them and God, that there is between the meanest of their subjects and him."

12. And the approved method of serving God is by Jesus Christ. He is the way, the truth, and the life; no man cometh unto the Father but by him. Therefore, Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. There is considerable diversity in the rendering of this verse. The Septuagint reads the first words thus, Lay hold of instruction; Chaldee, Receive the doctrine; Vulgate, Avail yourselves of the discipline. The difference arises from the original using a word, which in pure Hebrew means one thing, and in the Chaldee dialect another. It may, however, be sufficient to advise the reader that after very full investigation the best scholars appear to adhere to the sense given in our common English translation, and render it, Kiss the Son. So Calvin, Jebb, Hengstenberg, and Alexander. Even the church of England departs from the Septuagint here and reads, Kiss the Son. Fry reads, Adore the Son. Here he gives the significance of the act, rather than the word to describe it. Kissing was an act of worship among idolators. See Job xxxi. 27; 1 Kings xix. 18; and Hos. xiii. 2. So God says, Cease to kiss the calves and the images of Baal and other false gods, and kiss my Son; serve idols no longer; serve the Son of God. We must honor the Son, even as we honor the Father. We must call Christ Lord. We must worship the Lamb. Rev. v. 12, 13. To kiss was also to profess loyalty and allegiance. See 1 Sam. x. 1. So to kiss the Son is the same as to submit to him, to accept him in all his offices, to yield our wills to his, and obey his laws, however made known to us. To kiss is also to express affection. We must love Christ, or terribly perish. 1 Cor. xvi. 22. If Christ is not precious to us, it is because we are unbelievers. 1 Pet. ii. 7. To kiss is also to declare reconciliation and to say that we are at peace. Jesus Christ is our peace. With him, and, through him, with his Father we are at one. Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way. Hare: Perish instantly or on the spot; Alexander: Lose the way or perish by the way, i. e., before you reach your destination; Calvin regards the words "as a denunciation against the ungodly, by which they are warned that the wrath of God will cut them off when they think themselves to be only in the middle of their race;" Fry: "Lest ye be cut off in your course." This is probably the best sense, although several versions read, Lest ye perish from the righteous way. In Ps. i. 6 we read, "The way of the ungodly shall perish." Let us remember that we may perish, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Patrick: When his wrath breaks out suddenly, like an unquenchable fire; Calvin: When his wrath is kindled in a moment; Fry: For yet a little, and his anger will blaze forth; Jebb: When there is a kindling, though but a little, of his wrath; Horsley: For, within a little, shall his wrath blaze forth; Hengstenberg: For soon will his wrath be kindled. However long the wicked may seem to prosper, their ruin will swiftly overtake them. The conclusion of the whole matter is that all those, who rely on the Son of God, and accept him as their Saviour, and none others, are truly happy. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him. Or, Oh the blessedness, etc. We may not trust in men, ourselves or others. In particular men may never put confidence in their own works, in their own merits, in their own strength, but must take Christ Jesus as their wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption, their Prophet, Priest and King, their all and in all. Life, death, judgment and eternity will prove all such men blessed. God pronounces them so. Fuller: "The command of God here given is of a spiritual nature, including unfeigned faith in the Messiah, and sincere obedience to his authority. To kiss the Son is to be reconciled to him, to embrace his word and ordinances, and bow to his sceptre. To serve him with fear and rejoice with trembling denote that they should not think meanly of him on the one hand, nor hypocritically cringe to him, from a mere apprehension of wrath, on the other; but sincerely embrace his government, and even rejoice that they had it to embrace. That which is here required of unbelievers is the very spirit which distinguishes believers, a holy fear of Christ's majesty, and an humble confidence in his mercy; taking his yoke upon them, and wearing it with delight."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. This Psalm shows us the nature of sin. It is rebellion the most wicked and daring, against the only perfect law and law-giver in the universe. It is rage and fury, vv. 1, 2, 3. If sin had its way, it would annihilate God's government. It seeks to dethrone him. This is true of all sin. It is true of unbelief towards Christ. Calvin: "Let it be held as a settled point, that all who do not submit themselves to the authority of Christ make war on God. Since it seems good to God to rule us by the hand of his own Son, those who refuse to obey Christ himself deny the authority of God, and it is in vain for them to profess otherwise. . . The Father will not be feared and worshipped but in the person of his Son." To attempt anything contrary is to attack the highest authority of the universe.

2. None can adequately express the folly of sin, v. 1. Truly sinners imagine a vain thing. Did any ever see or hear of one in whose heart God's Spirit was shedding the light of truth, and who did not pronounce all his past behaviour unreasonable? Did any dying sinner ever applaud a wicked life as proof of wisdom, or as the road to happiness?

3. Let us not be surprised at any developement of wickedness, v. 2. Strange as it may seem, even opposition to Jehovah and to his Christ is no new thing. Henry: "One would have expected that so great a blessing to this world as Christ's holy religion, should have been universally welcomed and embraced, and that every sheaf should have immediately bowed to that of Messiah, and all the crowns and sceptres on earth should have been laid at his feet; but it proves quite contrary."

4. The reasons, why wicked men oppose God and Christ, are first, they by nature have carnal minds, which are at enmity against God. Rom. viii. 7. Men naturally hate God and his Son. Being destitute of love to him, and the mind having an active nature, enmity is inevitable. Then men soon find that the restraints of divine law thwart their selfish schemes and sinful purposes, and so they oppose the Bible because the Bible opposes them, and reject God's authority because it is contrary to them, vv. 1, 2, 3. Dickson: "Though the law and ordinances of God be most holy, most equitable, most harmless, yea, also most profitable; yet the wicked esteem them, as they call them here, bands and cords, because they curb and cross their carnal wisdom and licentiousness of life." It is impossible that men without regeneration should love God. They are dead in trespasses and sins.

5. It is painful to contemplate the extent to which the governments of the world are to this day anti-Christian; and those who conduct them often love to have it so. It was so of old, v. 2. There is no earthly government that has not laws, principles, or usages directly in the teeth of Christianity. All of them to some extent sanction the desecration of the fourth commandment. It has always been so. It is painful to a pious mind to dwell on such themes. Dickson: "The chief instruments that Satan stirreth up against Christ, to be heads and leaders to heathen and godless people in opposing and persecuting Christ's kingdom and church, are the magistrates, rulers, and statesmen, that he may color his malice with the shadow of authority and law." This is just what is described in this Psalm. Kings and rulers set themselves in array against religion.

6. Yet let not the righteous be afraid. It is easy for God to restrain his and their foes, vv. 4, 5, 6. His fit title is, "King of kings, and Lord of lords." He does what he pleases among the armies of heaven, and the inhabitants of the earth. Long before his incarnation Isaiah saw his glory, and spoke of him. Newton: "He is Lord over those that hate him. He rules them with a rod of iron, and so disposes their designs as to make them (though against their wills) the means and instruments of promoting his own purposes and glory. They are his unwilling servants even when they rage most against him. He has a bridle in their mouths to check and turn them at his pleasure. He can and often does control them, when they seem most secure of success, and always sets them bounds, which they cannot pass." All his enemies shall be put under him. No ungodly foot shall be left on the necks of the righteous. For in the next place—

7. It is easy for God to destroy his foes, vv. 5, 9. One light stroke of his iron rod will break the potter's vessel. Yea, men are in their best earthly estate but potsherds. They are weak as water. He who spits against the wind spits in his own face. He who strives with his Maker makes certain his own ruin. Dickson: "The Lord hath his appointed time wherein he will arise, and vex the enemies of his church, partly by disappointing them of their hopes, and partly by inflicting sore plagues upon them; then shall he vex them in his sore displeasure." So he has always done. Behold Pharaoh, his wise men, his hosts, and his horses plouting, and plunging, and sinking like lead in the Red sea. Here is the end of one of the greatest plots ever formed against God's chosen. Of thirty Roman Emperors, governors of provinces and others high in office, who distinguished themselves by their zeal and bitterness in persecuting the early Christians, one became speedily deranged after some atrocious cruelty, one was slain by his own son, one became blind, the eyes of one started out of his head, one was drowned, one was strangled, one died in a miserable captivity, one fell dead in a manner that will not bear recital, one died of so loathsome a disease that several of his physicians were put to death because they could not abide the stench that filled his room, two committed suicide, a third attempted it, but had to call for help to finish the work, five were assassinated by their own people or servants, five others died the most miserable and excruciating deaths, several of them having an untold complication of diseases, and eight were killed in battle or after being taken prisoners. Among these was Julian the apostate. In the days of his prosperity he is said to have pointed his dagger to heaven defying the Son of God, whom he commonly called the Galilean. But when he was wounded in battle, he saw that all was over with him, and he gathered up his clotted blood, and threw it into the air, exclaiming, "Thou hast conquered, O thou Galilean." Voltaire has told us of the agonies of Charles IX. of France, which drove the blood through the pores of the skin of that miserable monarch after his cruelties and treachery to the Huguenots.

8. The Scripture cannot be broken, vv. 6, 7, 8. God's counsel must stand. The promises are confirmed by an oath. The threatenings are executed before our eyes every day. The precepts are heavenly and eternal truth. The prophecies are but God's free, sovereign, eternal, and unchangeable purposes revealed to us. Heaven and earth may pass away, but every jot and tittle of Scripture shall be fulfilled, just as this second Psalm has had and is having its accomplishment.

9. The kingdom of Christ shall surely triumph, v. 8. Nothing can resist its progress. Events, seemingly the most adverse, have but accelerated its march to perfect victory. The death of the Saviour was the signal for the fall of Satan's kingdom. The persecutions at Jerusalem filled surrounding nations with the tidings and the heralds of salvation. J. M. Mason: "Messiah's throne is not one of those airy fabrics which are reared by vanity and overthrown by time; it is fixed of old; it is stable and cannot be shaken, for it is the throne of God. He who sitteth on it is the Omnipotent. Universal being is in his hand. Revolution, force, fear, as applied to his kingdom, are words without meaning. Rise up in rebellion if thou hast courage. Associate with thee the whole mass of infernal power. Begin with the ruin of whatever is fair and good on this little globe. Pass from hence to pluck the sun out of his place, and roll the volume of desolation through the starry world. What hast thou done unto him? It is the puny menace of a worm against him whose frown is perdition. He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh." A drop of his wrath makes life intolerable. A smile of his face makes heaven.

10. Prophecy, history, their own want of perfection, the example of Christ, and the enmity of the wicked, should all lead Christians to expect trials. Why should they not? If they are not tried otherwise, the conduct of wicked men will fill them with sorrow. No good man can witness such conduct as is described in vv. 1, 2, 3, or such judgments as are mentioned in vv. 4, 5, 9, without distress. I beheld the transgressors and was grieved, is a chapter in the history of all who love the Saviour. Or if for a time the enemies of God should seem to be still, corruption within will distress the pious. "Ever since man was driven from Paradise, he has been trying to find or make another," but he has never succeeded, and he never shall. There is a need be for all that comes on the righteous. "God doth not at any time put off his people, because he is not in a capacity to give; but doth many times put them off because they are not in a capacity to receive a mercy." Luther: "Every one who is a sound Christian, especially if he teaches the word of Christ, must suffer his Herod, his Pilate, his Jews and heathens, who rage against him, to speak much in vain, to lift themselves up and take counsel against him."

11. But let not the child of God be much moved by all his trials, however contrary to flesh and blood they may be. They can never affect his relations to God. He abideth faithful, vv. 6, 7. Nor can anything disturb his eternal tranquillity. Luther: "He who cares for us sitteth in the heavens, dwells quite secure, apart from all fear, and if we are involved in trouble and contention, he fixes his regard upon us; we move and fluctuate here and there, but he stands fast, and will order it so, that the righteous shall not continue forever in trouble. Ps. lv. 22. But all this proceeds so secretly that thou canst not well perceive it, thou shouldst then need to be in heaven thyself. Thou must suffer by land and sea, and among all creatures; thou must hope for no consolation in thy sufferings and troubles, till thou canst rise through faith and hope above all, and longest for Him who dwelleth in the heavens, then thou also dwellest in the heavens, but only in faith and hope."

12. The manhood of Messiah is generally held and believed. In former times some denied it. Were it in danger now, the pious would wonderfully rally to its defence. Nor ought errorists to marvel that the orthodox show like zeal in defending the doctrine of Christ's true and proper divinity. The Bible is full of it, vv. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, as expounded by inspired men. It was to a God-man Mediator that all the regenerate committed their souls in the day of their espousals to Christ. J. M. Mason: "The doctrine of our Lord's divinity is not, as a fact, more interesting to our faith, than, as a principle, it is essential to our hope. If he were not the true God, he could not be eternal life. When pressed down by guilt and languishing for happiness, I look around for a deliverer such as my conscience and my heart and the word of God assure me I need, insult not my agony by directing me to a creature—to a man, a mere man like myself! A creature! a man! My Redeemer owns my person. My immortal spirit is his property. When I come to die, I must commit it into his hands. My soul! my infinitely precious soul committed to a mere man! become the property of a mere man! I would not thus intrust my body to the highest angel that burns in the temple above. It is only the Father of spirits that can have property in spirits, and be their refuge in the hour of transition from the present to the approaching world." If there is a title, attribute, or degree of honor ascribed to the Father, and proving his divinity, which is not also ascribed to the Son, the enemies of Christ's essential divinity have failed to point it out. The vital use of this doctrine is clearly taught in Scripture. "Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" 1 John v. 5.

13. Bishop Beveridge has a sermon on Ps. ii. 11, the object of which is to show "the obligations of superiors to promote religion." He has clearly made out his argument, but when he comes to point out the way in which the duty is to be performed, he presents views quite at war with ideas entertained by pious people in our country, and by the great mass of Dissenters in England. Still he is right in insisting, and we must insist, that no man is exempt from the obligation to make known the salvation of the gospel, and to take up stumbling-blocks, and remove hindrances to the spread of truth. In this matter each one must use all the influence entrusted to him by God. Especially is he bound by a pious example to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour.

14. It is greatly to be regretted that so many, in authority and out of it, not only refuse their aid in diffusing the gospel, but do much to hinder that good work. No one has told us how men can be more fearfully occupied than in opposing the spread of the knowledge of salvation, vv. 9, 12. Paul says of certain Jews of his day that they "are contrary to all men: forbidding us to speak to the Gentiles that they might be saved, to fill up their sins always: for the wrath is come upon them to the uttermost." 1 Thess. ii. 15, 16. Ye bitter enemies of the spread of the gospel, the tokens of perdition are now upon you. Your puny efforts to put down the work of God are powerless. J. M. Mason: "The missionary cause must ultimately succeed. It is the cause of God, and shall prevail. The days roll rapidly on, when the shout of the isles shall swell the thunder of the Continent; when the Thames and the Danube, when the Tiber and the Rhine shall call upon Euphrates, the Ganges, and the Nile; and the loud concert shall be joined by the Hudson, the Mississippi, and the Amazon, singing with one heart and one voice, Alleluiah! Salvation! The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth!"

15. It is also clear from this Psalm that men are fitly addressed in a pointed and particular way, v. 10. Not that the heralds of the cross are in promiscuous assemblies to hold up particular living persons before an audience. But God's word must be preached with discrimination. Every man ought to have his portion of meat in due season. Magistrates, senators, rich, poor, all must be rightly dealt with by the ministers. Men will not learn their duty or their sins by mere hints, and allusions, but only by an honest declaration, a fearless and tender announcement of the truth. God's servants must proclaim that "it is no disparagement to the greatest monarchs to be subject to Christ Jesus, to stand in awe of him, to submit themselves to him, and to promote his service to the extent of their power; for the command to all, and to them in particular, is, serve the Lord in fear."

16. There is a consanguinity between all the graces of the Christian, v. 11. His faith agrees with humility, and so is not presumptuous. His zeal is kind, gentle and benevolent, so it degenerates not into bigotry and rage. His penitence has hope in it and so it is free from despair. His fear has joy in it and so it does not bring distress. His joy has fear in it and so it does not pass into levity. Bates: "This fear of God qualifies our joy. If you abstract fear from joy, joy will become light and wanton; and if you abstract joy from fear, fear then will become slavish." There is symmetry, and there is harmony in the Christian character. It is not a jumble, it is not a contradiction, it is one.

17. Men must trust as well as obey, and obey as well as trust. Piety without confidence in God is impossible, v. 12.

18. If in the work of redemption there is room for Christ's intercession, even after his exaltation, v. 8, surely it is no strange thing that Christians in this life of trial should find a resort to prayer necessary.

19. None, who hear the Gospel, can give any solid reason for perishing, v. 12. One question the wicked can never answer, Why will ye die? Their sin is that after their hardness and impenitent hearts they treasure up unto themselves wrath against the day of wrath, Rom. ii. 5. Everything is against them. O reader, be wise; turn and live. Newton: "My heart wishes you the possession of those principles which would support you in all the changes of life, and make your dying pillow comfortable. Are you unwilling to be happy? Or can you be happy too soon? Many persons are now looking upon you, who once were as you now are. And I doubt not, they are praying that you may be as they now are. Try to pray for yourself; our God is assuredly in the midst of us. His gracious ear is attentive to every supplicant. Seek him while he is to be found. Jesus died for sinners, and he has said, 'Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out.' He is likewise the author of that faith, by which alone you can come rightly to him. If you ask it of him, he will give it you; if you seek it, in the means of his appointment, you shall assuredly find. If you refuse this there remaineth no other sacrifice for sin. If you are not saved by faith in his blood, you are lost forever. O 'kiss the Son lest he be angry, and you perish from the way, if his wrath be kindled, yea, but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.'"

20. "Unspeakable must the wrath of God be, when it is kindled fully, since perdition may come upon the kindling of it but a little," v. 12.

21. "Remission of sin, delivery from wrath, communion with God, and life everlasting are the fruits of embracing Christ, of closing in covenant with Christ, and resting on Christ; for blessed are all they that put their trust in him," v. 12.

PSALM III.

A Psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son.

- 1 LORD, how are they increased that trouble me! many are they that rise up against me.
- 2 Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah.
- 3 But thou, O LORD, art a shield for me; my glory, and the lifter up of mine head.
- 4 I cried unto the LORD with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah.
- 5 I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the LORD sustained me.
- 6 I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about.
- 7 Arise, O LORD; save me, O my God: for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek-bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly.
- 8 Salvation belongeth unto the LORD: thy blessing is upon thy people. Selah.

THIS is the first Psalm having a title. The word rendered Psalm is not from the word giving a name to the whole collection. That signifies Praises; this, song, or Psalm, to be used with music. It is a Psalm of David, or to David, pertaining to him. He is its author. The title determines both the author and the occasion of the composition. Thus it is certain that the Psalm was not composed earlier than ten hundred and twenty-one years before Christ. It may have been still later, as we shall see. The objections urged by some of the German commentators against the accuracy and authority of this title are of no validity. Those claiming the least notice are sufficiently refuted by Hengstenberg. That the Psalm suits the occasion of David's flight in Absalom's rebellion is clear from the historic account of that event in 2 Samuel xv. xvi. xvii. xviii. Sad must have been the hour when "David said unto all his servants that were with him at Jerusalem, Arise, and let us flee; for we shall not else escape from Absalom: make speed to depart, lest he overtake us suddenly, and bring evil upon us, and smite the city with the edge of the sword. And David went up by the ascent of Mount Olivet, and wept as he went up, and had his head covered, and he went barefoot: and all the people that was with him covered every man his head, and they went up, weeping as they went up." 2 Sam. xv. 14, 30. Never had Jerusalem witnessed such a scene. The sweet singer of Israel in the dress of a mourner is fleeing from his own capital to escape the sword of a rebellious son, is mocked at and stoned by the vilest of his subjects (2 Sam. xvi. 5-13). Soon Jerusalem is swarming with rebels, so that it is proposed by their wily statesman (2 Sam. xvi. 23) to send that very night an army of twelve thousand men in pursuit of the royal fugitive. 2 Sam. xvii. 1. The saddest thing in all this tumult and civil war was that it was the punishment sent by God, according to prophecy, on David for his sin in the matter of Uriah: "Behold I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house." 2 Sam. xii. 11. And here it is already.

The title is, A Psalm of David, when he fled from Absalom his son. Does this teach that David actually wrote the Psalm in the midst of the confusion of his flight? or did he afterwards write it concerning his flight? We may supply a word or two so as to give either sense, for the title is clearly elliptical. Thus we may read, "A Psalm of David written when he fled," etc., or, "A Psalm of David concerning the time when he fled," etc. The latter is the more probable, as we may infer from the circumstances of the case, and from the internal evidence of this composition. Every clause will thus suit the events noticed and the time of writing. Thus the songs of Moses and Miriam were composed after the escape of Israel from the Egyptians. Exod. xv. So also we have the writing (a poem) of Hezekiah, King of Judah, when he had been sick, and was recovered of his sickness. Is. xxxviii. 9-20. It is not arrogance to dissent from those pious and learned men who think that this Psalm was actually composed in the time of flight. The view here taken seems so natural and so free from difficulties in considering the whole composition, that it is adopted with some confidence. Nor is it unsupported by respectable commentators. Luther: "It is not probable that David should have composed it at the time of his flight and distress. For the Holy Spirit will have a calm, happy, cheerful, select instrument, whether for preaching or for singing. In the conflict, also, man has not understanding, but becomes capable of this only after the conflict is over—reflects then aright upon what has occurred to him under it. Therefore it is most likely that David composed this Psalm long after, when he came to quiet reflection, and obtained an understanding of his life and history, which had variously happened to him." Hengstenberg: "It is very probable that the conception and birth of the Psalm were separated from each other—that David did not immediately express in manifold forms what he had personally received in those moments of pressing danger, that he only afterwards, and by degrees, coined for the Church the gold bestowed upon himself in such moments." Dodd, following Chandler: "When David was resettled on his throne, he penned this Psalm, to commemorate both his danger and his deliverance."

In all the Scriptures we first find the word Selah in this Psalm. See Introduction, § 15.

Wherever the word LORD is found in our version of this Psalm, it is a translation of the word Jehovah. See above on Ps. i. 2.

Some have endeavored to show a close unity of subject in this Psalm. No doubt all that is said was very pertinent to the occasion. But in times of deep trouble the mind studies not logical unity. It is more apt to give vent to its emotions in broken sentences, yet really pertinent. A world of thought passes before it. It would therefore be easy to show that much matter is omitted in his summary of this Psalm, when Hengstenberg says that it "falls quite naturally into four strophes, each consisting of two verses, the first of which describes the necessity, the second, the ground of hope, while the third discloses the hope itself, and the fourth contains the prayer prompted by the hope." The fifth and sixth verses say much more of the strength and effects of the hope than of the hope itself, as is obvious at a glance.

This learned man is much more happy in representing the state of David's mind as calm and confident of final victory and of a restoration of his kingdom, even in the height of the rebellion. The contents of the Psalm clearly show this. Every verse, from the third to the end, evinces a strong confidence. The passages relied on to prove that David was in great uncertainty are these: "The king said unto Zadok, Carry back the ark of God into the city: if I shall find favor in the eyes of the LORD, he will bring me again, and show me both it and his habitation: but if he thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let him do to me as seemeth good unto him." "It may be that the LORD will look on mine affliction, and that the LORD will requite me good for his cursing this day." 2 Sam. xv. 25, 26; and xvi. 12. But surely the apostle did not wish Christians to lose confidence in God when he exhorted them to say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that." Jas. iv. 15. Hengstenberg well says of the passages just quoted from Samuel, that they "by no means indicate a complete uncertainty, and are mainly to be regarded as a simple expression of the humility which scarcely ventures to declare, with perfect confidence, the still never extinguished hope of deliverance, because feeling itself to be utterly unworthy of it." No doubt David had such a sense of his weakness, as to cut off all expectation of doing anything by his own power. His view of his own sinfulness showed him the justice of God in sending these, and even worse afflictions. But all his acts and plans manifest the hope that prevailed. In the midst of his flight he confiscates the property of Mephibosheth, and gives it to Ziba. 2 Sam. xvi. 4. His calmness under the insults of Shimei evinces the same state of mind. 2 Sam. xvi. 5-13. His sending back to the city the ark of God, Zadok, Abiathar, and Hushai, manifests great composure and wisdom. 2 Sam. xv. 24-30; and 32-37. David also knew the worth of prayer, and now he tries its efficacy. "O LORD, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness." 2 Sam. xv. 31. The conduct of David and his people mentioned in 2 Sam. xvi. 14, shows anything but a timid or dispirited heart. His state of mind seems to have been much the same as that of Paul and his coadjutors. "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." 2 Cor. iv. 8, 9.

1. LORD, how are they increased that trouble me! many are they that rise up against me. The Arabic: O my LORD, wherefore are they multiplied, who make me sad?" etc. Calvin: O LORD, how are my oppressors multiplied! many rise up against me; Venema: Jehovah, how many and how great are my foes; Fry: O JEHOVAH, how many are mine adversaries! etc.; Hengstenberg: O LORD, how are mine enemies so many! etc.; Jebb: LORD, how many are they that trouble me, etc.; Alexander: O LORD, how many, or how multiplied, are my foes! many rising up against me. For his translation Venema argues from the original word, and in proof he refers to Job xxxii. 9 and Jer. xli. 1. If the original word means great ones, it can hardly mean many also, and then there need be no repetition in v. 1. But we may read it, How the great men are my enemies, and the many rise up against me. All classes joined in Absalom's rebellion, and this in formidable numbers. The revolt also gave a fair opportunity for all old grudges and secret animosities, which had been growing up in his kingdom, to manifest themselves against David. From some things said in the history of this affair it is clear that Absalom had an alarming majority of the people on his side. He had long been at work. When David fled he had six hundred men with him, and that very night it was proposed to send an army of twelve thousand in pursuit of him. Henry says, David "speaks of Absalom's faction as one amazed; and well he might, that a people he had so many ways obliged, should almost generally rebel against him, and choose for their head such a foolish and giddy young man as Absalom was." He was not only giddy and foolish, but his moral character was very bad. He had filled the heart of his father with grief and of his brothers with terror by his treacherous and malicious fratricide. 2 Sam. xiii. 23-36.

2. This host of opposers did not keep silence but spoke insolently. They were full of contempt. Many there be which say of my soul, There is no help for him in God. Selah. The sense is that the soul, the feelings are involved in the saying; Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Calvin, Jebb, and Hengstenberg: Many there be which say to my soul; Venema: Many utter the scoff against me, to my very face; Alexander: There are many saying, or, how many are there saying, to my soul, i. e., so as to affect my heart, though really said of him, not directly addressed to him; Calvin: "The word soul, in my opinion, signifies the seat of the affections, . . . David meant to say that his heart was in a manner pierced by the mockery of his enemies." If many openly insulted David to his face we have no account of it in history, though we are told of the personal scoffs of Shimei. But the language of his foes was doubtless reported to him, and so our common version well conveys the sense of the original. Some suppose the words, there is no help for him in God, were the utterances of timid and despondent friends, not given in scorn but in unbelief. Doubtless there were not a few of this class of persons in the kingdom. They despaired of seeing David's cause successful. Indeed they considered him a ruined man. Nehemiah was annoyed with a set of men, who advised him to play the coward. Even beyond those engaged in active hostilities, these may have tempted David to despair, than which bold enterprises and a holy life have no worse foe. Despair is the perfection of unbelief. "'Tis the offspring of fear, of laziness and impatience." Whoever may have uttered the words there is no help for him in God, doubtless intended to say he was ruined forever, temporally and spiritually. The word rendered help means salvation; Chaldee: There is no redemption for him in God forever; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Fry, Jebb and Alexander: There is no salvation. There is hardly a sweeter thought of heaven than that there we shall be done with temptation. And of all temptations none are more dangerous than those which incline us to despair. Thus Saul and Judas fell forever. • Luther supposes David to understand them as saying: "They not merely speak as if I were abandoned and trodden upon by all creatures, but as if God also would no longer help me, who, while he assists all things, sustains all, cares for all, for me alone of all things has no care, and ministers to me no support. Though every possible assault, the assaults of a whole world, and of all hell beside, were concentrated upon one head, it were still nothing to the thought, that God is thrusting at a man—for preservation from which Jeremiah tremblingly begs and prays, xvii. 17, 'Be not a terror unto me, O thou my Hope in the day of evil.'" For in God some would read in his God. This is the first place in the Psalms where we meet that name of God, ELOIHM. Next to Jehovah it is by far the most common name given to God. It occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures considerably more than two thousand times. In form it is plural, though it is construed with singular verbs. Some have asserted that it is found in the plural because it was borrowed from those who believed in many gods. Some say it is used only as a majestic mode of speech. But others suppose it is employed on account of the doctrine of plurality of persons in the Godhead. This is probably correct. It has plural pronouns referring to it. Gen. i. 26; iii. 22. Havernick regards it as having special reference to God as Creator. It expresses the excellence of the divine nature and authority.

3. But true courage is not easily disheartened. Divine grace can give us the victory in the worst times. So David says, But thou, O LORD, art a shield for me. The Chaldee, Arabic, Calvin, Hengstenberg and Alexander have And at the beginning of the verse instead of But. Yet Calvin says, "The copulative and should be resolved into the disjunctive particle but." Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Thou art he, who undertakes for me; Syriac and Arabic: Thou art my helper. But this is paraphrase, not translation. The shield was a piece of defensive armor. It was often made very large so as to protect the whole body. The shield of Goliath was borne by another person. This was probably not unusual. Abimelech had his armor-bearer. David once filled that office to Saul. So far as we know, the shield would, more than any other piece of armor, require the help of another. When it was very large it was a complete defence. Hence the beauty of the figure, comparing God to a shield, used by Moses and adopted by David. And truly God is the very shield his people need. O how he hides them from evil, covers their head in the day of battle, and brings them off conquerors, yea, more than conquerors. All that can be understood by conservation, protection and defence is secured to us, when God becomes our shield. To every genuine child of grace, Jehovah says, "Fear not: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." Gen. xv. 1. That this is no misapplication of Scripture is clear from Rom. xv. 4. God is both willing and able to defend his people. Our version reads, Thou art a shield for me. Although this gives the general sense, yet the original word corresponds entirely with the English word about. And Jebb has, Thou art a shield about me. The Chaldee and Hengstenberg support this rendering. Alexander: A shield about me, or around me, i. e., covering my whole body, not merely a part of it, as ordinary shields do.

David also says, Thou art my glory, and the lifter up of mine head. Some of the versions for glory give honor. But honor and glory are nearly the same thing. Perhaps glory is commonly the stronger word. God was his glory as he was the cause and author of all his honors, of all wherein he might glory. Venema well says there is nothing unusual in this sense of the phrase. Cobbin: "My glory, the author of my greatness." David's meaning is that God had defended and maintained his cause and all, wherein he might rejoice up to this time, and would not now desert him. And the lifter up of mine head. When shame, or dejection or languor come upon men, they bow the head. It falls of itself. Yet God would so be the glory of David that as Calvin expresses it, "he became so bold that he declares he would walk with unabashed brow." But mere freedom from shame is not all. Joy is included, as is evident from Luke xxi. 28, "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up, and lift up your heads: for your redemption draweth nigh." And with these come strength and courage. God was the author of all these. When he thus lifts up the head, who can bow it down?

4. All these blessings are connected with prayer, which has always been—a part of the religion of sinners. I cried unto the LORD with my voice, and he heard me out of his holy hill. Selah. The chief variations in rendering this verse respect the tense of the verbs, cry and hear. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Calvin, and Jebb use the past tense as in our English Bible. Fry and Hengstenberg prefer the present tense, I cry and he heareth. Alexander has cry in the future and hear in the present. In the Hebrew both verbs are future. On these variations see Introduction, § 6. Whichever tense is employed the doctrine taught is the same. But if we use the past tense, we make David encourage himself from former experiences of the divine kindness. If we use the present, we make him speak of exercises and mercies now his own. If we employ the future, then we make him express his confidence in God for days to come. It seems proper that both verbs should be given in the same tense. How wonderful a means is prayer. The cry of a worm enters the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, and he sends deliverance. With God hearing is answering. Alexander: The second verb is not the usual verb to hear, but one especially appropriated to the gracious hearing or answering of prayer." By the Jews prayer was addressed to God in his holy temple, which was for many ages on Mount Zion. Several elevations noticed in Scripture possess great interest. Of these special notice is due to Nebo, which is called the mount of God; the mount of Olives, where our Saviour often was, and the mount of transfiguration, expressly called the holy mount by Peter 2 Epis. i. 18. But commonly by the holy mountain or hill is to be understood mount Zion, which God chose as a place that he would make glorious. To the Jews this above all others was God's hill of holiness. Here God manifested himself of old by Urim and Thummim, by Shechinah, by holy fire, by the spirit of prophecy, and in Gospel days by miraculous influences and the abundant effusion of the Holy Ghost.

5. Prayer is a good preparation for sleep. After David had cried unto the LORD, he says, I laid me down and slept; I awaked; for the LORD sustained me. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate, Calvin, and Jebb all here use the past tense for each verb. Fry employs the past tense for the first three verbs, but puts the last in the present, sustaineth. The Arabic puts the first three verbs in the past tense, but the last in the present thus, for Jehovah is my helper. Alexander uses the past tense in all but the last verb, which he renders in the future, will sustain. In this he follows the original. Hengstenberg puts all the verbs in the present tense. Venema would render it, I have been accustomed to lie down, and sleep, and awake, because Jehovah sustained me. Perhaps our English version is as good as any. Hengstenberg thinks this Psalm was an evening hymn. Alexander thinks that if any such distinctions are admissible or necessary, it may be regarded as a morning rather than an evening hymn. The fact is, it is fit for morning, noon, or night. The world is often amazed at the composure of God's people. But the marvel ceases when we know that God is with them, sustains them, props them up, as Chandler renders it, and that their confidence in his protection is strong and well-founded. The wicked are not so. They are in peril asleep or awake, 1 Sam. xxvi. 7-15. But to the righteous God saith, "When thou liest down, thou shalt not be afraid; yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet." Pr. iii. 24. The same is promised in Lev. xxvi. 6, and in Ezek. xxxiv. 25.

The Italian proverb is, To serve and not to please, to expect a friend and have him fail to come, to lie in bed and not to sleep are three things bad enough to run a man mad. The great fountain of peace, tranquility and security is confidence in God. He will sustain his servants at all times. The preserving care of God over us when asleep is truly wonderful. Sleep is a striking emblem of death. Sometimes indeed men fall asleep and never awake in this world, but commonly they awake again. In the case of the righteous, no time is more apt to bring a deep sense of the divine goodness than their earliest waking moments. The opinion of some that verse 5 relates to the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ is fanciful, or, as Venema says, without any reason.

6. He whose mind was thus stayed on God might well dismiss tormenting fears. Accordingly he says, I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people, that have set themselves against me round about. There is no reason for supposing that special reference is here made to the proposal of Ahithophel to send twelve thousand men after David at the beginning of his flight. 2 Sam. xvii. 1. For we have no evidence that David was then informed of Ahithophel's counsel, nor were the twelve thousand sent. Hushai's counsel prevented them from marching. But the whole country was agitated, and David knew his enemies to be very numerous. The translations of this verse are considerably varied. Septuagint and Ethiopic: I will not be afraid of myriads encircling me, or rushing upon me in a circle; The Syriac fixes the numbers at ten thousand; The Arabic: I will not fear myriads of nations encompassing me, insurgent against me; The Vulgate: I will not be afraid of thousands, etc.; Jebb: I will not be afraid for ten thousands of the people, which round about have set themselves against me; Calvin: I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people who have set their camps against me on all sides; Muller: I will not be afraid of the many thousands, etc.; Fry: I fear not the multitudes of people that have beset me around; Hengstenberg: I will not be afraid of ten thousands of people which they have set against me round about; Alexander: I will not be afraid of myriads or multitudes of people whom they have set round about against me. The reason of some of these various renderings is that in Hebrew the numeral for ten thousand may signify that precise number, or a countless multitude. The same is true in Greek and in English. Our word myriad, derived from the Greek, if taken definitely, signifies ten thousand; if indefinitely, any vast number. For the Greek usage, see Acts xxi. 20, where our version gives thousands for the original myriads. Venema thinks the phrase has respect to the time when it was sung in Israel, David has slain his ten thousands. The enemies of David set themselves, i. e., in hostile military array; they posted themselves. But all to no purpose. Numbers are nothing where God is. He is the LORD of hosts. Omnipotence as easily disposes of millions as of tens, or units. Strong confidence in Divine protection is therefore as wise as it is pious and comforting.

7. This trust naturally leads to hearty and renewed prayer. Arise, O LORD; save me, O my God. The word arise describes the act of one who has sat still for a while beholding what was going on. At last he resolves to be quiet no longer and comes to the rescue. So David asks Jehovah to interfere and settle this civil war. And he pleads his covenant relation to him, calling him my God. He asks him to save, to help, to redeem, to rescue him. To make me safe is a signification given in several old translations to the word save. David was thus encouraged to pray by reason of his past experience, or possibly by what he had heard of the defeat of Ahithophel's counsel. And so he says, for thou hast smitten all mine enemies upon the cheek bone; thou hast broken the teeth of the ungodly. To smite on the cheek bone and break the teeth is sorely to plague and effectually to disable. Chandler: "A wild beast is disabled from devouring its prey when its jaws are broken and its teeth dashed out." The figure is drawn from the hunting of wild and ferocious animals, which are rendered harmless when their jaws are broken, or their teeth mashed in. In many respects David's foes were like wild beasts, thirsting for his blood, fierce and merciless; but God had already put it out of their power to do real harm. Their evil dispositions were still manifest, but their ability was already as nothing. David had a pious confidence that God was against his treacherous enemies. Though the verbs rendered hast smitten and hast broken are in the past tense, yet Hengstenberg following Luther seems to prefer the present, thou smitest and thou breakest. So that he makes the Psalmist tell what God is doing at the time the Psalm was conceived. Whether this is a better sense or not, it is true as he says, quoting Ewald, that the preterite not unfrequently denotes a past, reaching down to the present. Though God holds all his enemies in derision, yet there seems to be no reason for supposing that the smiting spoken of in this verse respects blows on the face to express contempt, as Morison thinks. We do not smite wild beasts to show them an indignity, but to disable them, or, as Morison adds, to deprive them of the power of inflicting pain and misery.

8. Such deliverances as God vouchsafed to David called for thanksgiving. Therefore he says that he had not escaped by any created power or skill, but solely by the LORD, Jehovah. Salvation belongeth unto the LORD. Hengstenberg: Salvation is the Lord's. Calvin considers the natural and obvious meaning to be simply this, that salvation or deliverance is in the hands of God only. Venema: Salvation belongs unto thee, Jehovah; Dodd: Salvation be unto the Lord, i. e., let it be ascribed unto him. But he gives no reason for this rendering, although the sense thus given is pious and consistent with the analogy of Scriptural teaching. If this is the right rendering it makes the passage strongly eucharistic. Let God be adored. Let him be praised. Nor does David confine his thoughts to his own case alone, but remembers his people also. Thy blessing is upon thy people. In the Hebrew of the eighth verse we find no verb, belongeth and is having been supplied by the translators. Fry, Hengstenberg, and Alexander, therefore prefer to make the clause read, Thy blessing be upon thy people. If this is right, the last clause is intercessory. And if by thy people is to be understood those to whom David was king, the passage presents him as praying for mercies on his foes. But why may we not regard him as forgetting himself and asking for the Divine blessing on all the genuine servants of Jehovah, the true Israel of God? Calvin: "David affirms that deliverance was vouchsafed, not so much to him as an individual, as to the whole people, that the universal church, whose welfare depended on the safety and prosperity of his kingdom, might be preserved from destruction." The whole verse then has this import, God alone can save and deliver, and thus God gives his enriching blessing to all his people, his true church.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Every one has his own troubles. The king is as liable to the alternations of joy and sorrow as any of his subjects. Thus this whole Psalm teaches. At times David was probably the most afflicted man in Israel, v. 1. Perhaps too there is a much more equal distribution of happiness and misery than we are sometimes ready to admit. Before repining at our lot as peculiarly severe, let us look into the state of some around us, and we shall find a very reasonable demand for sympathy made on us both by those above us and by those below us in social position.

2. The best of parents may have the worst of children. David had his Absalom. This is not common, but it is possible. The effects of a pious education are often not manifest until the heart of parents is nearly broken by the wickedness of their offspring. In some cases indeed those who have had the best examples and instructions live and die in sin. Grace is not hereditary. God is a sovereign.

3. How foolish are they who rely for happiness on popular favor. Nothing is more fickle. David may long reign and do good, but when the rebellion comes, the masses turn against him, v. 1. It was always so. One while Israel says there is none like Moses. Very soon trouble comes; then they murmur against him. The very people, who one moment pronounce Paul a murderer pursued by divine vengeance, the next moment say he is a God. The very crowd who cry, Hosanna to the son of David, in three days clamor for his crucifixion. Popular breath is as fickle as the wind, and as light as vanity. The want of it is proof against no man's worth. The possession of it confirms no man's title to esteem.

4. Great crimes ordinarily cannot be concealed. It seems to be God's plan to bring to light foul deeds, even when committed by great and good men. Our saying is, Murder will out. God can summon so many witnesses that exposure may follow at any moment. The chattering of a nest of birds made one confess parricide. The distress of Joseph's brethren made them acknowledge their guilt concerning their brother. Absalom seems to have been David's favorite son. 2 Sam. xiii. 39. Yet he was the sharpest thorn that ever pierced the side of his father. Thus God brings out the evil deeds of David and punishes them before the sun. He knows how to make the iron enter into the soul of his erring people.

5. If you would know things perfectly, go to school to experience. How its lessons sober the mind, expel folly, and bring before us the things of salvation. In this Psalm David speaks as one who knew whereof he affirmed. He had been taught some painful lessons, but they had been amongst the most profitable of his whole life.

6. God may greatly afflict his chosen even after they have truly repented of their sins, v. 2. It was so with David here. The Lord often sees it good for us to have the past in sad remembrance. When he does thus try us, let us fall into the arms of him, who chastises us. Henry: "Perils and frights should drive us to God, not from him." As soon as David's trouble comes, he goes to God. Blessed words are these: "We are chastened of the Lord, that we should not be condemned with the world."

7. When affliction comes, let us seek for the cause. "Wherefore contendest thou with me?" Nor let us cease our search, till we make thorough work. And when we find the cause of our troubles, let us deeply repent before God. We never receive from God a stroke more than we both deserve and need either for our purification or usefulness. And we never repent too frequently or too humbly for our sins. They are more hateful than we have ever felt them to be. True repentance is not a fit; it is a habit.

8. But let God's servants beware of despair. Let them cling to him the more closely, the sharper their sorrows are. Despair may do a prodigious deed of valor; it never performed a great work of faith or of patience. Let every child of God often say to his soul, Hope thou in God. Let the saints never believe the tempter when he says, There is no help for them in God. Humble and obedient trust in God is always safe and wise, vv. 2, 3.

9. We never act more wisely than when we do right and rely on God for protection of our lives and persons, and for the defence of our good names. He is our shield, and defends us. He is our glory, and our honor is safe in his hands, v. 3. God is himself the hope of Israel.

10. How sad is the state of men, when God no longer helps them. What had David to rely on in this affliction but God alone? Nor was his trial as great as we are all subject to. It might have been more severe. And if, when the day of sadness comes, God shall refuse his aid, are we not undone? Why do not the wicked see that they are working their own ruin, just as Absalom was steadily progressing to his own overthrow?

11. We are always safe in following the line of God's will clearly made known to us either in his word or in his providence. David well knew how God had called him to the throne and would secure it to him, and so he sees how others are warring against the Almighty. Calvin: "If our enemies in persecuting us, rather fight against God than against us, let the consideration of their doing so be immediately followed by the confident persuasion of our safety under the protection of him, whose grace, which he has promised to us, they despise and trample under foot." "If the whole world should unite its voice to drive us to despair, God alone is to be obeyed, and hope of promised deliverance from God is always to be cherished," v. 3.

12. We readily abuse everything. Even our past experience of God's mercies may, through the hardness of our hearts, lead us to seek for no further attainments in knowledge and grace. On the other hand, some derive but little comfort from the most marvellous deliverances of former days. In each new trouble they behave as much like children as they did in their earliest trials. Here is error on both extremes. We ought not so to think of the past as to say that we have felt or learned enough; but when tried, we ought to plead with God his former kindnesses, and to encourage ourselves in the remembrance of them, v. 4.

13. Prayer is efficacious. Mortals never wield any other weapon so mighty, v. 4. Oh that we all had hearts to resort to God in strong crying, as we ought. Henry: "Care and grief do us good and no hurt, when they set us a praying, and engage us, not only to speak to God, but to cry to him as those that are in earnest."

14. The calming power of piety is wonderful, v. 5. Clarke: "He who knows that he has God for his protector, may go quietly and confidently to his bed, not fearing the violence of the fire, the edge of the sword, the designs of wicked men, nor the influence of evil spirits." There is living a man who has lain down at the root of a tree in Africa, with a tiger near him on one side, and a jackal on the other. To flee from them was impossible. He left them to watch each other, committed himself to God, fell asleep, and awaked the next morning, finding the sun risen and both the beasts of prey gone. Leave all with God and fear nothing. Henry: "True Christian fortitude consists more in a gracious security and serenity of mind, in patient bearing, and patient waiting, than in daring enterprises, sword in hand."

15. When God upholds one's "spirit, his person, and his cause," what is more reasonable than that he should be of good courage? v. 5.

16. The war of the wicked on the Church of God is utterly hopeless. The very prayers of the saints of all ages form around her a bulwark of impregnable strength, vv. 4, 7.

17. So sure is the final victory, that it may be celebrated before it is crowned, v. 7. Morison: "So delightful is that confidence which the spirit of believing prayer inspires, that the Psalmist speaks of victory over his enemies as if actually established."

18. However oppressed, despised, persecuted, forsaken, let the servants of God betake themselves to his mercy and rely on his grace, v. 8. The Lord has pleasure in such. We can in no way put so abundant honor on God as by magnifying his grace and relying on his love.

19. How small a thing fatally depresses the wicked. David in flight is confident. Ahithophel at court is in despair and hangs himself.

20. David was a pattern of suffering. He was also a type of Christ. But whether in this Psalm he was designed to be regarded as typical is not entirely clear. Dr. Gill urgently favors the typical character of David here. But many will not regard his statements as conclusive. There is a sense in which all Christ's people suffer with him, and in some things like him; but that does not make them types of their Redeemer. Nor is there any error taught by alluding to any portion of sacred history, and thence drawing light by comparisons or analogies to explain any other part, provided always that it be done with sound judgment and in good taste. Thus Scott, without here finding any type, simply says, "We shall cease to wonder at the troubles of the king of Israel, and almost cease to think of our own light afflictions, if we duly look unto Jesus, and contrast his glory and his grace with the contempt and cruelty with which he was treated. Having yielded himself to death, he sanctified the grave, and became the first-fruits of the resurrection; his head was then lifted up above his enemies, and thus he has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. His enemies therefore will surely be disappointed and perish; but his people may go down to the grave, as to their beds, in hope and comfort; for the same God watches over them in both, and they will at length awake to everlasting happiness." Alexander: "The expressions are so chosen as to make the Psalm appropriate to its main design, that of furnishing a vehicle of pious feeling to the Church at large and to its individual members in their own emergencies."

21. The strifes and perils of war are a striking though inadequate representation of the terrible contests and enemies that rage within the heart of God's suffering people in all their earthly rejoicings. How they are deceived, betrayed, opposed, wounded, and brought nigh unto death by their sins and temptations, so that the best of them are scarcely saved. Luther: "This Psalm is profitable to us for comforting weak and straitened consciences, if we understand in a spiritual sense, by the enemies and teeth of the ungodly, the temptations of sin and the conscience of an ill-spent life. For there indeed is the heart of the sinner vexed, there alone is it weak and forsaken; and when men are not accustomed to lift their eyes above themselves, against the floods of sin, and know to make God their refuge against an evil conscience, there is great danger; and it is to be feared lest the evil spirits, who, in such a case, are ready to seize upon poor souls, may at last swallow them up, and lead them through distress into doubt."

22. How strangely the Christian's blessings come to him. His strength comes out of weakness, his fulness out of emptiness, his joy out of sorrow, his life out of death. Apollinarius calls the third Psalm a mournful song, and so it is; yet where will you find higher confidence expressed than in portions of this wailing composition?

23. This Psalm shows that in a very short act of devotion, even when the mind is much exercised on one thing, there may be a rich variety of imagery and of topic employed. In devotion logical connection is of far less importance than fervor, humility, faith and the spirit of submission and importunity.

PSALM IV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm of David.

1 Hear me when I call, O God of my righteousness: thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress; have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer.

2 O ye sons of men, how long will ye turn my glory into shame? how long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? Selah.

3 But know that the LORD hath set apart him that is godly for himself: the LORD will hear when I call unto him.

4 Stand in awe, and sin not: commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. Selah.

5 Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, and put your trust in the LORD.

6 There be many that say, Who will shew us any good? LORD, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us.

7 Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased.

8 I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, LORD, only makest me dwell in safety.

THE title of this Psalm has brought out a great diversity of views. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway render it, Unto the end, in verses, a Psalm of David. The sense of the phrase, Unto the end, is supposed to be that this Psalm is to be sung always, perpetually, or very frequently, thus declaring this composition of great value and utility; or that it is to be sung in honor of Christ, who is the end of the law. This view rests for its authority solely on the Septuagint, the others merely copying from it. It derives no countenance from the Hebrew according to any understanding of the words, which we can reach. It is certainly true that in the Chaldee, as in the versions just quoted there is no intimation that it should read, To the chief musician. Jerome: Unto the conqueror; Horsley: To the giver of victory, meaning thereby, the Lord of hosts, the God of battles; Morison would read it, a Psalm of David, dedicated to the God of victory, and to be performed on the stringed instruments of the sanctuary; but Calvin well says, "I do not approve of rendering the word, conqueror; for although it answers to the subject-matter of the present Psalm, yet it does not at all suit other places where we shall find the same Hebrew word used." The translators of the English Bible were probably correct in their rendering of the whole, addressing the Psalm to the leader of the music, on Neginoth, i. e. on the stringed instruments. Scott thinks that Neginoth may either mean the instruments with which the Psalm was to be sung, or the tune to which it was set, but he does not give us his reason for so thinking. The chief musician here was the overseer of the music. The word signifies any superintendent or foreman. It here designates the leader of the band, which used stringed instruments. Fifty-three of the Psalms and the third chapter of Habakkuk are inscribed to the chief musician. The musicians and singers were divided into classes. They all prophesied according to the order of the king. 1 Chron. xxv. 2. Some prophesied with the harp, to give thanks, and to praise the Lord, v. 3. Others lifted up the horn, v. 5. All of them were for song in the house of the Lord, and were instructed in the songs of the Lord, vv. 6, 7. The word Neginoth is found also in Habakkuk iii. 19, and is the general name for all stringed instruments. Addressing the Psalm to one of the leaders of public worship shows that it was for the whole church and not for one man. It is public property.

Hengstenberg thinks that "in Psalms iii., iv. we have a pair inseparably united by the inspired writer himself." But his argument in favor of this position will probably carry conviction to few minds. As close a resemblance may be discovered between Psalms widely separated from each other. Yet if any think they find evidence of such relationship between these compositions, such an opinion is quite harmless.

That this Psalm was designed as an evening hymn or prayer is a more probable opinion. Yet it is suitable for any part of the day. It was sung in the temple in day-light. All God's word is fit for meditation day or night, morning or evening.

Those who insist on its being regarded as an evening hymn generally, if not invariably, regard it as composed on the same occasion as Psalm iii. But this cannot be proved. Indeed it is hardly probable. It is true that much in this Psalm would suit the occasion of Absalom's rebellion. It is no less true that it would well suit a long period of persecution under Saul. Nor are other events in the life of David wanting to make such a Psalm appropriate. Lightfoot refers its origin to the affair of Sheba, 2 Sam. xx., and Venema to the destruction of Ziklag, 1 Sam. xxx. But all is rather conjectural. There is throughout the Psalm a remarkable "absence of personal and local allusions." The reasons for not regarding this as having its origin in the tumult excited by Absalom are that that sad event had been duly noticed in the third Psalm, that no hint to that effect is given in the title or contents of this, and that at least one phrase in it ill suits that time of trial, but is well adapted to David's history in the time of Saul. That phrase is, How long will ye turn my glory into shame? etc. Calvin: "How long (verse 2) indicates that he had a lengthened struggle." The rebellion of Absalom was soon put down. Yet Calvin says, If any should refer it to the revolt under Absalom let us not greatly contend about the matter. The sense may be much the same on either supposition. There is no evidence that nearly all the Psalms were written for any particular occasion, though some of them were. Hengstenberg: "How much the peculiar phraseology of the Psalms fits them for the general use of the church is easily perceived. Only glance for a moment at this Psalm. How much less edifying should it have been had David, in place of glory, which can be taken in the most extended sense, so that the very least can possess and lose it, put his kingly honor and supremacy; or in place of vanity and lies, under which every one can think, according to his situation, of that kind of calumny and deception, to which he may be peculiarly exposed, had substituted the foolish counsels of Absalom and his companions in particular!" The style of this and many other Psalms is such as to adapt it to almost every occasion of distress in the life of God's people. For remarks on the words Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Hear me when I call, O God of my righteousness. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic and Vulgate put both verbs hear and call, in the past tense, so as to read When I called, the God of my righteousness heard me. But the Chaldee, our translators, Calvin, Venema, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander correctly give us the present tense. To hear is graciously to hear, so to hear as to answer. God of my righteousness, expresses confidence in God as just and righteous. All admit thus much. The appeal is to God, the righteous Judge between David and his foes. We are always safe in asking God to do that which is consistent with his infinite, eternal and unchangeable rectitude. He is a God of holiness. He will not deny himself. In the sight of God we are all sinners, and so deserve no good thing from him. Yet we may be very much wronged and injured by the opinions, words and actions of men. In such case we may plead our integrity, and ask God to defend the right, because he is righteous. But the phrase God of my righteousness means more. It teaches that God is the author and source of my righteousness, both justifying and purifying. Some learned men decline to favor this sense, but it is held by others no less entitled to respect. The God of my life is the God, who gives and sustains my life. That is, he is its sole author. The God of my salvation is the author of my salvation. This is a better sense than my salvation—God. We might as well read, My life—God. Let us not fritter away the sense of Scripture. How strong the argument in this case is. Those who have received righteousness from God to justify and to sanctify them may very safely confide in God to save them from wicked foes. He, who has done the greater will surely do the less. It is strange enough to see some of our modern Protestant commentators higgling about this interpretation and then turn to Bellarmine and find him saying that God of my righteousness signifies God, from whom is all my righteousness, that is, by whose grace I am made just. Morison paraphrases it thus, "O God to whose distinguishing mercy I owe all that I possess or anticipate." In thus appealing to God the Psalmist strengthened himself by referring to his own past experience: Thou hast enlarged me when I was in distress. Luther and Hengstenberg read this verb in the present tense, but our translation is to be preferred on two accounts. 1. The argument is thus more complete. 2. The old versions invariably so render it. Thou hast enlarged me. To be in straits is to be in distress. To be set in a large place is to be made joyful by success or deliverance. The pressure is then removed and the soul walks at liberty. Often it is all the child of God can do to call to mind the former days, when God was with him, and to hope for better days to come. Those are blessed times, when it is manifest that God alone has been our deliverer. It is sweet to receive all at his hand. Thus one is encouraged to cry, Have mercy upon me, and hear my prayer. What God has done, he can do again. What he has wrought for one of his people, we may confidently ask him to do whenever we are in similar need. Instead of Have mercy upon me, Fry prefers, Be gracious unto me. This does not materially vary the sense. Mercy to sinners is grace, or unmerited kindness. Here is the sole ground of hope for the perishing. Morison: "It is sin that stands in the way of the answer of our prayers; but when sin is pardoned, and the sinner is accepted, then our prayers, in themselves feeble and imperfect, ascend as incense, and the lifting up of our hands as the evening sacrifice."

2. O ye sons of men. This translation is the same as the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic and Vulgate; Venema gives it simply, Men; De Wette takes the same view; but the Chaldee gives it sons of man. This is the literal rendering. For remarks on the words, sons of man, see Introduction, § 16. It cannot perhaps be shown that any particular class of men is here exclusively addressed. But if the view expressed by Calvin, Patrick and others is correct, then the meaning of the Psalmist is, O ye, who think yourselves mighty and wise and great, who regard yourselves as model men, be ye ever so great, let me ask, How long will ye turn my glory into shame? The Italian reads, Your chief men. John Rogers' translation reads, O ye sonnes of men how long wyll ye blaspheme myne honor? The Bishop's Bible and church of England use the same words. The words, will ye turn, are not in the original, but are supplied by the translators. But the Septuagint, Ethiopic, and Vulgate render it, How long will ye be dull of heart? i. e. how long will ye have a heart like a stone, hard, and inclined to the earth, literally a heavy heart? It requires but a slight change in the Hebrew to make this rendering proper. Nor is this a bad sense, but very pertinent to the matter in hand. Still we have no right to alter the Hebrew text. It is best therefore to leave the words glory and shame and supply what may be necessary to give the sense. Morison renders it, How long shall my glory be for a shame? It has always been sufficient to awaken the deepest enmity of the wicked to find one of their race honored of God in a way counter to their inclinations. Abel's acceptance drew down Cain's indignation. David's success against the champion of the Philistines brought against him the jealousy and rage of Saul. The glory mentioned in this verse was, as some think, God himself. In proof they cite Psalm iii. 3, where David expressly calls Jehovah, My glory. Other parallel texts are also adduced. If this is the sense then the passage should read, How long will ye blaspheme God, who is my glory, or How long will ye esteem or speak of him, who is my highest honor, as though ye would make me ashamed of him? By a slight change of the Hebrew, Dimock proposes to read this clause thus, How long will ye be hardened in heart? He quotes Muis, Houbigant, and Lowth as approving this rendering. Although this gives a good sense, yet it is no better than that of the common version, and requires a change in the reading of the original.

Others think that by glory David refers to all the honor that God had bestowed on him, as a man, a king, or a prophet. His enemies did all they could to take it away and cover him with reproach. Wicked men hate stable and just governments, especially when so administered by pious men, as that God's fear is thereby promoted. Hengstenberg thinks the words How long might fitly be used at the very commencement of open hostilities under Absalom. Calvin with more reason supposes that reference is had to the perverse obstinacy of David's enemies, who were not stirred up against him merely by some sudden impulse, but that the stubborn purpose of injuring him was deeply fixed in their hearts. Yet David was confident. He knew who had given him the throne, granted him plenary inspiration, and made him a glorious type of the Saviour of the world. He therefore would not yield any of his claims. Indeed he dared not by cowardice and unbelief help on the work of God's enemies. He saw their impatience. He knew their folly, and boldly said, How long will ye love vanity, and seek after leasing? The entire career of David's enemies had no other foundation than their foolish conceits and settled malice. From first to last the whole opposition might, but for the wickedness and guilt of his foes, have been regarded as a farce. Their conduct might justly have been ridiculed. The vanity here mentioned points to the idle course they were pursuing. They were beating the air. They were in pursuit of a thing of no value. Their hopes would never be realized. The leasing spoken of is by some referred to the falsehoods with which opposition to David was uniformly conducted. Hengstenberg specially refers to 2 Sam. xv. 7, 8. It is a remarkable fact that many, who ordinarily pay some decent regard to truth, seem to feel quite at liberty to lie and slander in political affairs. Their ordinary defence is that the characters of public men are public property. But what right has any man to burn down the legislative and judicial halls of a country, or otherwise to damage them on the ground that they are public property? And are not the good names of useful public men of far more value than any public buildings? The terms vanity and lies are often found in Scripture. They designate the deceit, folly, corruption and certain overthrow of every bad cause. Leasing is an old Saxon word signifying falsehood. It was in some of the early translations of the Bible and was retained in the common version. Truly if the vanity and leasing of their foes could have ruined the cause of the righteous, not one of the servants of God would ever have held his own, or entered into rest. God never goes over to the side of deceit, folly and malice; therefore it always ultimately fails. A good cause and a good conscience always have infinite wisdom and power to help them forward. The more stupendous the fabric of falsehood and wickedness, the more terrible the crash, when it shall come tumbling down on those, who have reared it. Amazingly glorious will be the characters and illustrious the positions of the people of God, when the dust and smoke of calumny shall all be blown away, and their right and righteousness amply vindicated. Fry applies this whole Psalm to Christ, and makes him the speaker throughout. Whether this is or is not the correct view, yet his humiliation and his complete victory are an index and a pledge of the certain victory of all the saints over all their foes. None did ever trust in God and was confounded. The sure foundation, on which the final deliverance of God's people rests, is the fixed and gracious purpose of Jehovah, which is next brought forward.

3. But know that the LORD hath set apart him that is godly for himself. There is very considerable variety in the rendering of these words. For set apart Fry reads distinguished, and Horsley distinguished, or bestowed peculiar honor upon. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Patrick, Gejerus, Moller, Ainsworth, Pool, and Gill, all favor the idea that the act of separation was wonderful, that the setting apart was such as to call for admiration. Concerning the persons separated three opinions have been advanced. The first is that set forth by Cocceius who supposes the church is meant, and that the separation here spoken of consists in taking the kingdom of God from the Jews and giving it to the Gentiles. But there is no satisfactory evidence that the church in her collective capacity is here spoken of. Yet it is remarkable how well the most of this Psalm suits the varied trials and experience of the whole body of believers. The history of one servant of God well written is in substance, though not in detail, the history of the whole church. The communion of saints extends to their sufferings and victories as well as to their sympathies and privileges. The second opinion is that the person thus separated is the Lord Jesus Christ, God's Elect, in whom his soul delighteth. Fry thinks that none but Jesus Christ the righteous can be considered as the speaker throughout this Psalm. No doubt Messiah is here foreshadowed. It is not necessary for any to contend that the whole sense and scope of the Psalm is exhausted in the literal David. He may be the subject of a Psalm, and yet what is fulfilled in him may be but a sample of what happens to the people of God in every age; yea, it may have a far more glorious fulfilment in the spiritual David, the great deliverer of God's people. And this is the third view which may be taken of this Psalm. It records the struggles and conflicts of God's anointed to the throne of Israel. But in so doing nothing hinders that it should disclose the higher matters pertaining to David's greater Son. The whole of the old dispensation was a shadow of Gospel times. Heb. x. 1. David is also a striking type of Christ, and often so declared to be. Very considerable scope is left for the exercise of a sober judgment on the question whether Christ is prefigured in any particular Psalm not expressly declared to be typical. Some may go further than others and yet no fatal mistake be committed on either side. But the first thing is to ascertain the grammatical sense of the words. Then we may afterwards make any lawful use of them in their varied applications. It is said: The Lord hath set apart. These words point to a divine ordination. David was chosen of God to be king of all Israel. The narrative of the first disclosure of this choice is given in 1 Sam. xvi. 1-13. It was done in a very striking manner. God refused all the other sons of Jesse, saying to Samuel respecting Eliab, "Look not on his countenance or on the height of his stature; because I have refused him: for the LORD seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." v. 7. To set apart implies more than mere election. It includes, in David's case, his anointing to his office by God's command, and the consequent presence and power of God's Spirit, v. 13, qualifying him for his office as the earthly head of the Theocracy. Thus God showed his sovereignty when "he chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheep-folds; from following the ewes great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance." Ps. lxxviii. 70, 71. For godly in this verse Calvin reads merciful or bountiful. David was "a man after God's own heart." It is expressly said by Samuel to Saul, "The Lord hath rent the kingdom of Israel from thee this day, and hath given it to a neighbor of thine, that is better than thou." 1 Sam. xv. 28. Venema: God chose David "as one whom he knew to be well affected both toward himself and toward men." The Arabic: The Lord hath marvellously chosen his elect; church of England: The Lord hath chosen to himself the man that is godly; For godly, Fry reads BELOVED, and applies it directly to Christ. Others would render it beloved, but apply it to David. The objection to this rendering is briefly stated by Calvin: "I meet with no examples of this signification of the word in Scripture." This first clause of v. 3 may be taken either as a reason why his enemies should desist from persecuting David, or as a reason why they should become godly. If the former is the right view, then he reminds them that they are engaged in a perilous undertaking, for they are fighting against God. His people are the apple of his eye. It is very dangerous to offend one of the least of God's children. But David would not merely warn them of peril. He would invite them to a new and better life. He virtually says, You have tried vanity and lies. All has failed. Come and I will show you a more excellent way. If you wish to be truly blessed here is the great secret. The Lord blesses the godly, the truly merciful. Come and get that blessing for yourselves. You shall never perish if God sets you apart to himself. He saves his people because they are his. Nor is this all, for the prayers of such are efficacious. The Lord will hear when I call unto him. Every child of God may say so. He has blessed promises, examples, and experiences all to that effect. This view of verse 3 is the more to be considered because it agrees with the essential benevolence of true piety, and because verse 2 is confessedly an exhortation or earnest remonstrance. Having shown the folly of sinners it is kind and proper for the prophet to call on them to seek true wisdom in embracing the service of God, and in securing the blessings vouchsafed to the godly, the merciful, the upright. Therefore, or by grief. In proof Alexander quotes Isa. xxxii. 11; 2 Sam. xviii. 33; and Pr. xxix. 9. The Commentators are no better agreed than the Lexicons and Concordances. We must therefore look elsewhere. It may clear the question of some difficulty to inquire whether a man can be angry and not commit sin. The answer is that he may. Formerly the church of Rome in her catechisms put down anger among the deadly sins. But of late at least in some cases she substitutes some other word as malice or hatred, both of which are always sinful. The Scriptures clearly teach that anger is sinful in either of the following cases; when it is without a cause, Matt. v. 22; when it is unreasonable and bears no proportion to the offence given, Pr. xxvii. 4; when it is sudden and gives no time for reflection on our part, or for explanation on the part of others, Pr. xv. 18; xvi. 32; Jas. i. 19; or when it is long continued, and settles down into hatred or malice, Eph. iv. 26. It is possible to be angry, and not sin, to feel and express a righteous and reasonable displeasure at wickedness without malice against any one. In this sense Jesus Christ himself was angry, Mark iii. 5. Augustine and Luther both think the sense to be substantially this, Be angry, if you please, but go not so far as to let your anger become sinful. The doctrine thus taught is good; but where is the pertinence of introducing such words in this place? This exhortation in Eph. iv. 26 is quite to the point. But is it so in the verse under consideration? To avoid the obvious difficulties of the case, Hengstenberg insists that the phrase, Be angry and sin not, is substantially the same as, Sin not through anger. Though this is a proper sentiment, yet the exposition has not perhaps any parallel in Hebrew, and the paraphrase based upon it makes David consent to their wrongs against him except for the wickedness of them: "I would indeed permit your anger if the only effect were the injury which might thereby alight upon me, but since you cannot be angry without sinning, I must warn you to abstain from it;" Alexander: "Rage and sin not, i. e., do not sin by raging, as you have done, against me the Lord's anointed, and indirectly therefore against himself." Yet he admits that this construction is "not the most obvious or agreeable to usage." In this state of case the following suggestion is offered with diffidence, but as involving less difficulty than any other explanation. It is to render the words in this Psalm as our version does, Stand in awe and sin not. This is admitted to be a good rendering of the Hebrew. It also makes the exhortation very pertinent to the matter in hand. It is a call to sobriety, seriousness, solemnity, reflection, reverence, repentance. Then let it be noted that in Eph. iv. 26, Paul does not give the words, Be ye angry and sin not, as a formal quotation, but introduces them just as if they were his own. Henry seems to incline to the opinion that they are his own. Calvin thinks Paul may have no more than alluded to the sentiment. Even if he quotes these words, he was aware of the familiar use of the Septuagint version, and in quoting it, he was using words well known to at least some of his readers. He surely might with propriety introduce any words without formal notice of authorship, provided they were true and he approved them as pertinent. He elsewhere quotes heathen poets both with and without formal notice, Acts xvii. 28; and 1 Cor. xv. 33. He surely might without fault quote even an erroneous translation of a part of a Psalm, provided the sentiment borrowed was correct and expressed his precise idea. Inspired writers do at times certainly quote the mere words of older prophets, where they suit their turn, without a strict regard to the sense, in which they were originally used. Compare Hos. xi. 1; and Matt. ii. 15; also Ps. xix. 4; and Rom. x. 18. It is not necessary for us to understand Paul as endorsing the correctness of the Septuagint rendering of these words by employing them in his epistle. He merely found in a celebrated, but uninspired and often erroneous translation of the Old Testament words which precisely suited his argument or purpose, and he inserted them without preface or apology. Since writing the foregoing, the author has examined Hodge on Ephesians iv. 26. The comment there given is confirmatory of the interpretation here given. He says, "It is not necessary to assume that the apostle uses these words in the precise sense of the original text; for the New Testament writers often give the sense of an Old Testament passage with a modification of the words, or they use the same words with a modification of the sense. This is not properly a quotation; it is not cited as something the Psalmist said, but the words are used to express Paul's own idea. . . It is certain that all anger is not sinful." He says more to the same effect. M'Ghee thinks the right interpretation of Eph. iv. 26 is, that "there are circumstances in which you may be provoked to be angry, and can be angry without sin. . . There is a righteous anger, a just anger." If these views are admissible, we may render the clause, Stand in awe and sin not; Calvin: Tremble then, and sin not; Fry: Tremble ye, and sin not. Surely men, who love vanity and seek lies, may in the most solemn and earnest manner be called to trembling, like the Jailor, Acts xvi. 29; Isa. xxxiii. 14; Jer. xxxi. 19; Luke vi. 24-26; James v. 1-5. Nor are very outrageous sinners likely to be arrested and turn from their sins but in some way suited to produce violent commotion in their feelings. There was great excitement on the day of Pentecost. So it was prophesied there should be under the preaching of the Gospel. Zech. xii. 10-14. If these things are so, then preaching is not to be condemned, because it greatly alarms the wicked, and even agitates their whole nature, soul and body. In order further to warn and invite his enemies to repentance and holiness, David calls them to the secret duties of religion, and says, Commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. John Rogers' translation: Comen wyth youre awn hertes upon youre beddes, and remembre youre selves; Bishops' Bible: Commune with your owne hart, and in your chamber, and be still; the Genevan translation: Examine your owne heart upon your bed, and be still. For be still Fry reads reflect. For Commune with your own heart Jebb reads, Speak to your own heart. Hengstenberg: Say it in your heart upon your bed; and Alexander: Say in your heart. There seems to be no good ground for misunderstanding the import of this clause. Its aim is to bring those addressed to calm, serious, silent reflection, and so to genuine repentance. The great difficulty with wrong-doers is that they will not consider. This is the complaint God often makes against them. Andrew Fuller has an admirable treatise on self-communion founded on this clause; Cobbin paraphrases it, Ask your conscience if you are doing right. If we would be wise we must not only commune with ourselves, but also be still or be silent. Silence is often a duty as well as a privilege. He who tells all he thinks may be a good prater, but he will make no progress in the heavenly life. His worship will be irreverent and unprofitable. His tree will bear no fruit upwards, because it takes not root downwards. But he that reflects long and silently feels strongly. While he muses the fire burns. The Chaldee paraphrases this clause: Say the prayer that is in your mouth, or say your prayer with your lips, and offer the petition that is in your heart, and pray upon your bed, and always remember the day of your death. He who would enjoy and profit by public worship must not neglect meditation, prayer, and self-examination. He who loves and practises these will be ready for all acts of public worship and will receive in a right spirit the command,

4. Stand in awe, and sin not. This clause is not without difficulty. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic and Vulgate all read, Be ye angry and sin not; John Rogers' translation: Be angrye, but sinne not. Nor does the difficulty end here. Paul quotes literally the Septuagint version, Be ye angry, and sin not. Eph. iv. 26; on the other hand the Chaldee has, Tremble and sin not; The Bishops' Bible, the Genevan translation and even the church of England agree with our version. Which then is the right rendering? The Lexicons and Concordances show that the verb rendered, Stand in awe, or Be ye angry, may signify any great agitation produced by fear, by anger,

5. Offer the sacrifices of righteousness. Sacrifices of righteousness is a phrase found in the Pentateuch. Deut. xxxiii. 19. Some have supposed that the Psalmist was exhorting them not to imitate the hypocritical services of Absalom mentioned in 2 Sam. xv. 7, 8. No doubt he would warn them against all mockery of God. Moses did the same when he used the same phrase. But what are sacrifices of righteousness? Fry regards the phrase as equivalent to "the due sacrifices." Doubtless the due sacrifices were all sacrifices of righteousness, but does the phrase mean no more than

"the proper sacrifices appointed by the ceremonial law?" These were indeed means of grace to those who lived under the Mosaic Institute, and rightly observed them. They did all point to Christ as the end of the law for righteousness to them who believe. But a sacrifice of righteousness is not only something due, because commanded, but it is something offered in a right frame of mind, in humility, with godly fear, and with an eye of faith directed to Jesus Christ, the one great sacrifice for sins. Under the old dispensation the sacrifices were of two kinds, material and spiritual. The material consisted of thank-offerings dedicated to religion, and of sacrifices for atonement. The spiritual consisted in prayer, in praise, in alms-giving, in penitence, in an entire devotion to God's cause. Ps. cxli. 2; Ps. cvii. 22; Jer. xvii. 26; Ps. li. 17; Heb. xiii. 15, 16; Hos. vi. 6. This latter class of sacrifices belongs to all dispensations, is obligatory under the gospel, 1 Pet. ii. 5, and was always by God preferred above all others. Ps. l. 8-15. Venema: The sacrifices of righteousness are true spiritual sacrifices, the opposite of those which are external and typical. Isa. i. 11-17, and Mark xii. 33, 34; Chaldee: Subdue your lusts, and it shall be counted to you for a sacrifice of righteousness. Waterland reads true sacrifices, and in justification refers to Vitringa on Isaiah. The substance of the command then is, Worship God in the way of his appointment by making all the offerings required by the ceremonial dispensation under which you live and in the manner required, bringing nothing maimed, torn, lame, sick, mean, blemished, stolen, or obtained by fraud. Mal. i. 13, 14; Deut. xxiii. 18; and Isa. lxi. 8. Also offer to God all that spiritual service required by him as a part of true religion under all dispensations. Berleberg Bible: "Offer the sacrifices of righteousness, therefore must ye desist from your sin and anger, and fulfil your obligations. For otherwise your faith will be vain, and your whole service unprofitable, even though ye sacrifice ever so much. It is not enough to bring sacrifices; they must also be offered in a right way. Whosoever hates his brother can bring to the altar no acceptable gift. His very prayer is sin. The Lord hates the religious services which are connected with unrighteousness, enmity, injury to neighbors, and renunciation of dutiful obedience. A penitent and contrite heart is required to a right sacrifice, Ps. li. 17, and an humble and thankful faith, Ps. l. 14, 23, that one may present himself to God as a living sacrifice, and his members as instruments of righteousness. Rom. vi. 13, and xii. 1. That the great duty here enjoined is spiritual is further manifest from the parallel clause, And put your trust in the LORD. The Jehovah here spoken of is Jehovah-jireh (the LORD will provide) known to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 14; Jehovah-nissi (the Lord is my banner) known to that great prophet Moses, Ex. xvii. 15; Jehovah-shalom (the Lord send peace) known to Gideon, Judges vi. 24; Jehovah-tsdkenu (the Lord our righteousness) foretold by the weeping prophet, Jer. xxiii. 6, and xxxiii. 16; Jehovah-shamah (the Lord is there) of the eloquent Ezekiel, Ezk. xlvi. 35; and Jehovah-rophi, the LORD that healeth thee, Ex. xv. 26. This trust in Jehovah must exclude reliance on all other beings and resources. It must be in God alone. It must be cheerful and not reluctant, constant and not temporary, firm and not wavering, obedient and not self-willed, from the heart and not feigned. For trust some read hope in the Lord. Such piety and such trust will satisfy the soul and cause it to cease its eager quest after merely earthly good, as is the custom of the multitude; for,

6. There be many that say, Who will shew us any good? Morison: Who will show us good? Edwards: The world saith, etc. There were many such in David's days. There always have been many such. Centuries ago a writer enumerated two hundred and eighty-eight opinions of philosophers and founders of sects or schools respecting the chief good. The confusion of tongues reigns over the earth on this subject. The whole unbelieving world is on this matter a Babel. Nor are men becoming any wiser as the world advances, except as revelation and God's Spirit give them understanding. The great mass of men are still gaping after they know not what. What shall we eat? what shall we drink? wherewithal shall we be clothed? how shall we rise in worldly honor? where is perfect, or even real happiness? are questions, which have lost none of their interest to the masses. The answers and modifications of answers are endless. But carnal men feed on husks. They spend their strength for naught. Such is the sense if the Psalmist is addressing the wicked, as he probably is. But some think he is addressing his desponding followers, who ask, Whence shall deliverance come to us? who will show us any good? our cause seems desperate, or at least very discouraging. It is amazing to what extent God's intrepid servants having a righteous cause are annoyed by the unbelief of those around them. Nehemiah had such pests. Henry Martyn tells us that he had in his employment a man, who was continually saying to him, It is of no use to teach your religion to Hindoos. There seems to be no good cause for the rendering of Boothroyd: Who will show kindness unto us? To both friends and foes David may pertinently disclose the secret of true happiness, which is the favor of Jehovah: LORD, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. This is what we all need, and this is what we may through God's mercy all attain. The import of the prayer may be gathered from the opposite phrase, which represents God as hiding his face, i. e. withdrawing his favor, refusing his protection. To countenance any one is to stand by him, or express kindness towards him. To discountenance is to frown upon, discourage, or withdraw from a man or a measure. Some suppose the figure to be taken from the Shechinah, whose bright side was towards Israel at the Red sea, but the dark side towards the Egyptians, and whose radiance till the destruction of the first temple often gladdened the hearts of God's people. Morison: In the expression, "the light of thy countenance," I have no doubt allusion is made to the bright symbol of Jehovah's presence, which stood on the mercy-seat between the cherubims of glory. The form of expression in the text is first found in Numbers vi. 25, 26, where it is made a part of the blessing pronounced on the people by the priests. The phrase granting the light of the countenance doubtless includes also the favorable aspects of Providence. The petition here presented by David, like the four last petitions in the Lord's prayer, is not for himself alone but also for others; Alexander: "Upon us extends the prayer to his companions in misfortune, or to all God's people, or to men in general, as if he had said, this is the only hope of our lost race. The plural form may indicate the expansive, comprehensive spirit of true piety." Several of the old versions put the verb in this clause in the indicative mood, so as to read, The light of thy countenance is sealed, or is extended, or shines upon us. Although the authorized version is preferable, yet either rendering shows the contrast between the state of God's friends and that of his enemies, and points out the true source of blessedness. Calvin gives this as the purport of the whole: "The greater number of men greedily seek after present pleasures and advantages; but I maintain that perfect felicity is only to be found in the favor of God." Great is God's mercy to his chosen. Rich is the inheritance of his poorest and most afflicted servants, whereof David and every experienced child of God can bear witness, and say,

7. Thou hast put gladness in my heart, more than in the time that their corn and their wine increased. Situations and conditions are happy or otherwise as God grants or denies his presence and blessing. Several of the ancient versions much vary the rendering of this verse. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic and Vulgate put in oil as well as corn and wine.

The Septuagint, Ethiopic, and Vulgate read: Thou hast put gladness into my heart. They are multiplied by the increase of corn, of wine, and of oil; The Chaldee and Syriac make David to have gladness from the time that others had these good things, while the Arabic makes him simply to rejoice over these things whenever they are given. On this rendering Gill says, it is as if David had said concerning his enemies, "I never envied their prosperity, I always rejoiced when they had a good harvest, or vintage, and still do, and yet they have risen up and rebelled against me, and requited me evil for good." Jarchi, Abenezra and Kimchi all give this sense. Bellarmine admits that oil is not found in the Hebrew text, but says it may have originally been there and been dropped by mistake, or that the authors of the Septuagint may have added it by way of explication. He also observes that the Scripture usually speaks of corn, wine and oil in the same connection. But none of these reasons is valid. The first would have weight, if there was evidence that it was founded in truth. The rendering given by the Vulgate of the latter part of the verse admits of a good sense. Respecting it Bellarmine says, The prophet adds another argument, from which men may understand that God is the author of all good things, to wit, that it is he, who multiplies the products of the earth and all its fruits. He then cites the words of Paul in Acts xiv. 17. Let us not tamper with the Hebrew text. Instead of Thou hast put, Hengstenberg employs the present tense, Thou givest; Jebb: Thou hast given gladness to my heart; Alexander: Thou hast given gladness in my heart, not to my heart, but to me in my heart, i. e. a real, inward, heartfelt gladness; Grotius thus connects this with the preceding verse; "If thou, LORD, wilt lift the light of thy countenance upon us, thou wilt put a greater gladness in my heart, than is generally expressed at a plentiful harvest of corn, or a great increase of wine." One thus blessed and happy surely may be calm and quiet when all the world is up in arms and agitated with commotions, and may with good reason say,

8. I will both lay me down in peace, and sleep: for thou, LORD, only makest me dwell in safety. Calvin: "He concludes by stating that as he is protected by the power of God, he enjoys as much security and quiet as if he had been defended by all the garrisons on earth." Truly blessed is the man that is free from all those fears which have torment, from all those cares which corrode, from all those vexations which belong to men, whose hope is in the things of earth. Our English version well expresses the force of the first two verbs. The rendering of the Doway and of the versions which it follows is awkward: In peace in the self-same I will sleep, and I will rest; Hengstenberg gives the full sense when he says, In peace I will both or at the same time lay me down to sleep, and I shall go to sleep. The word rendered both is by many correctly rendered at the same time, or at once. The meaning is that being at peace with God, having benevolent feelings towards men, and possessing a mind quiet and undisturbed by evil passions, he would assume the posture of rest, and would not fail to be refreshed by sleep. The reason is that God is his protector. Our version makes the word rendered only or alone to qualify the word Jehovah. God alone efficiently protects us, whether he does it directly by himself, or by the ministry of angels, or by the instrumentality of men, or by the use of other means. Perhaps the meaning is that the Psalmist had despaired of aid from all creatures, that his reliance was solely on God, and that he found this exclusive trust the most consoling and quieting, the small number of his adherents being quite inadequate to do anything for his defence without special aid from God. But the Psalmist was most probably consoling himself by the word of God, and applying to himself a promise long before made to the church in her collective capacity. For the use of the word here rendered alone is in the sacred writings rather peculiar and striking. It occurs eleven times in the Hebrew Scriptures. It is once rendered solitary, Lam. i. 1; once, solitarily, Mic. vii. 14; once desolate, Isa. xxvii. 10; seven times, alone. This verse contains the only place where it is rendered, only. It first occurs in Lev. xiii. 46, where it is said, The leper shall dwell alone. It next occurs in the prophecy of Balaam where he says of Israel, Lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. It next occurs in Deut. xxxii. 12, The LORD alone did lead him. But the passage, which was doubtless before the mind of the Psalmist is in Deut. xxxiii. 28, Israel then shall dwell in safety alone; the fountain of Jacob shall be upon a land of corn and wine, etc. Here we have corn and wine as in the verse under consideration, and we also have the very words, originally spoken of the whole church, applied by David to himself. If this is the sense here, then David intends to say, that although he is forsaken by the great mass of mankind, so that he is made to dwell almost alone, yet he dwells in safety, or he declares how completely and safely he is separated and delivered from his enemies and all by the good hand of God upon him. Hengstenberg proposes "a sort of double sense" to the word alone: Thou only, O LORD, makest me dwell alone and in safety. The objection to this is not that it teaches any error, but where is the rule of grammar for making a word, which occurs but once in a sentence, signify both only and alone and at the same time qualify two words remote from each other? In Lev. xxv. 18, 19 the promise to Israel of dwelling safely is twice repeated. Hengstenberg thus impressively concludes his commentary on this Psalm: "With right does the Psalmist appropriate to himself the promises which originally referred to Israel. What is true of the whole is true also of the individual, in whom the idea of the whole is become vividly realized; so that we may again ascend from the individual to the whole."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The praises of God in the sanctuary should be conducted with so much skill as to be edifying. The subject of church music is worthy of attention from God's people and ministers. The Gospel neither prescribes nor forbids any particular mode of conducting this part of worship, provided only it be decent and edifying. Whether there shall be a "chief musician," or a band of musicians in each congregation, God has not decided, but in all places we should edify the church with psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. The people should sing.

2. How simple are the remedies provided for God's people in all their diversified trials. Dickson: "Though there be many and diverse troubles of the godly, yet there is but one God to give comfort, and but one way to draw it from God; to wit, by prayer in faith: hear me when I call, v. 1."

3. The great foundation of Christian hope is in justification by the righteousness of God, which is the righteousness of Christ, v. 1. This opens access to God.

4. How blessed is the doctrine of the divine mercy. It is all our hope, v. 1.

5. What an advantage the tried servant of God has over the young convert, vv. 1, 7. No teacher so impresses his lessons on us, as experience. Were we not very unbelieving, all older Christians would long since have had boundless confidence in God. He has so often appeared for us that we should never distrust him again. Great deliverances should excite great gratitude and inspire great calmness in new trials.

6. Let no man be surprised at having bitter and inveterate enemies, v. 2. Even old friends often turn against the godly. Venema: "The esteem and favor of men is very deceitful and variable." Let us not revile our slanderers, but warn them and call them to repentance. Calvin: "While nothing is more painful to us than to be falsely condemned, and to endure at one and the same time, wrongful violence and slander; yet to be ill spoken of for doing well is an affliction, which daily befalls the saints. And it becomes them to be so exercised under it as to turn away from all the enticements of the world, and to depend wholly upon God alone." Our duty is done when we see to it that evil reports respecting ourselves are false, or, if true, that we heartily repent of the matter of them.

7. Let those who live under good governments set an example of contentment, moderation and obedience to the laws, and not unite with brawlers in railing against rulers and laws, which secure to them all the blessings they may reasonably expect. He, who resists a lawful government, resists God. He, who rails at it, rails at him who established it, v. 2.

8. It is a small matter to be judged of man's judgment. Those who love vanity and lies, rather commend than condemn us by their censures, v. 2. We must make it our business by holy lives to prove their calumnies false.

9. The wicked know not what they do when they annoy and persecute God's servants, vv. 2, 3. Not only of widows in Israel but of all his people on earth God is the avenger. Dickson: "The cause of the world's despising piety in the persons of God's afflicted children is the gross ignorance of the precious privileges of the Lord's sincere servants."

10. The wicked are always practising deception on themselves. They are false to all their own best interests. All they do is against them. Every error involves others. Their great difficulty is they are sensual, having not the Spirit. Dickson: "Mere natural men cannot be made wise, neither by the word of God, nor by experience in their own or others' persons, to consider that things of this earth, as temporal riches, honor and pleasure, are nothing but vanity and deceiving lies, which promise something and pay nothing but vexation of spirit, because of guiltiness and misery following upon the abuse of them."

11. The people of God never act more wisely than when they trust and hope in him, even in the darkest times, vv. 3, 5. Reliance on God is as safe for us as it is honorable to him. Venema: "The highest excellence and glory of man is to enjoy the favor and grace of God; and to have a hope of being heard, when we cry to him." "In the midst of perils and evils nothing is more safe than to make God our refuge."

12. How happy all God's servants are, v. 3. They are set apart to God as vessels of honor, 1, by a free, eternal, holy, unchangeable choice in Christ Jesus; 2, by a powerful, internal, spiritual regeneration; 3, by a perfect, irrevocable justification; 4, by a kind, wise, watchful providence, ordering everything in their lot, and distinguishing them in this, that all things work together for their good, making their sorrows more blessed than are the joys of the wicked, and giving them the victory even in death; 5, such shall be openly and gloriously owned and set apart in the last day. They are set apart to God's service and honor and enjoyment here and hereafter. The service and enjoyment are both imperfect here. In the next world saints shall love and rejoice in perfection. With all their imperfections they are God's jewels, and shall at last be so owned, Mal. iii. 17. The highest enjoyment on earth is found in communion with God. Dickson: "The comfort of God's Spirit, and sense of man's reconciliation with God in Christ, is greater than any worldly joy can be, and is able to supply the want of riches, honors, and pleasures worldly, and to season, yea, to swallow up the sense of poverty, disgrace, and whatsoever other evil," v. 7.

13. True faith is never at a loss for arguments to strengthen itself. It reasons from God's righteousness, from his past favors, from one's present distress, from God's mercy, v. 1, from his purposes, from his providence, v. 3. Indeed faith always has some good plea to urge. It is the unbelieving who have nothing to urge.

14. Let us learn to judge righteous judgment. How often the wicked judge by outward appearances. With many success and prosperity are the test of a righteous cause. Outward calamities never prove any one out of God's favor, though many wicked men think otherwise.

15. The views respecting anger presented in the exposition of v. 4, show the great importance of not holding any rule of moral conduct, which is beyond or beside the Scriptures. Whenever men try to be holier than God's law, they fall into confusion.

16. True religion is ready to make sacrifices, v. 5. It brings its offerings with a willing mind and an unsparing hand. To the grudging and reluctant it may be said, You will never get to heaven at such a rate. Henry: "Serve God without any diffidence of him, or any fear of losing by him. Honor him by trusting in him only, and not in your own wealth, nor in an arm of flesh; trust in his providence, and lean not to your own understanding; trust in his grace, and go not about to establish your own righteousness or sufficiency." Never dole out a small pittance. Give him all you have and are and hope for.

17. To do our whole known duty; and then to feel that we deserve nothing good, and are but unprofitable servants, needing all God's mercy in Christ, is the height of earthly wisdom, v. 5.

18. There is no piety without trust in God, v. 5. If we have no confidence in him, how can we have piety? Great deliverances should inspire strong trust in God.

19. Trust is an element of faith, and we know that without faith it is impossible to please God. The heathen delighted in worshipping objects of sense but "we must worship an unseen God, and seek an unseen good. 2 Cor. iv. 18. We look with an eye of faith further than we can see with an eye of sense."

20. Let all beware of deluding themselves with a reliance on the future of this life as likely to afford more enjoyment than their experience of the past would lead them to expect, v. 6. Bickersteth: "The young expect to find it when grown up and their own masters. Parents, when their children are settled and provided for. The merchant, when wealth is acquired, and independence secured. The laborer, when his day's or week's toil is ended. The ambitious, in gaining power and reputation. The covetous, in gaining money to supply all his wants. The lover of pleasure in earthly enjoyment. The sick, in health. The student, in gaining knowledge. The self-righteous, Rom. x. 2, 3."

21. Great perils commonly precede great preferments. David found it so. The way to any great attainment is usually steep and rough. This is true in everything. It is especially true in moral attainments. Let not the children of God be discouraged through the greatness of their way. No strange thing has happened to them.

22. Those are the sweetest consolations which succeed sore and terrible conflicts and afflictions, vv. 6, 7.

23. In v. 7 there is an allusion to the happy life of the agriculturist. It was a great mercy when for his sins man was sentenced to hard labor, God permitted that labor commonly to be in the open air, under the light of the sun, and generally on each man's own premises. Of all the innocent temporary joys of earth, few exceed those of the farmer. No life is more independent.

24. God's people have no grief beyond the reach of divine control and comfort, v. 7. Morison: "O happy religion of the cross! Thou canst irradiate the darkest scene by the bright rays of celestial peace! Thy joys are unearthly and unfading! They fill up the soul, in which they dwell."

25. Nearly the whole of this Psalm shows the value of a good conscience. How could David have ever borne himself as he did but for being free from a condemning heart?

26. The state of God's people is never desperate. Moller: "Hope in God remains to them when stript of all human aid and protection."

27. The people of God unquestionably possess a very remarkable secret of turning evil into good—something far more valuable than the fabled alchymist's stone, which was to turn everything into gold.

28. When God puts us at any post we need fear nothing. He, who called us, can sustain us. David found it so. Payson said, if God should call him to rule half a dozen worlds, it would be quite safe to go forward, and humbly do his best; but that he would not feel it safe to attempt unbidden to govern as many sheep.

29. If we would secure God's blessing we must plead his promises. The unbelieving are fitly classed with the abominable. Nor should we forget that a promise made to the whole body of believers is valid to secure the interests of each one, and that a promise made to any one believer is of force for the good of all other believers to the end of the world.

30. Let us use all proper efforts, and then not rely on means but on him, who has ordained them. David fled before his enemies, but he expected his safety in God, not in flight.

31. Self-examination is a duty of true religion under all dispensations. Were men not very insensible to the value of eternal things, they would be more engaged in this duty. No doubt, some "are afraid and unwilling to look into their hearts, lest they should be convinced and overargued by conscience of their woful condition. Home is too hot for them." But surely a wise man will deal honestly with himself before the day of final trial shall come. Every evening specially invites to this duty. Then silence reigns; the world is absent; sleep, the very image of death, summons us to think of eternal things, v. 8. Even some of the heathen practised a nightly review of their moral conduct during the day.

32. In writing on this Psalm the author has with high satisfaction read not a few expositions and treatises on this portion of Scripture. On the other hand he may say that he has never been more impressed with the danger of drivelling, or of trying to make little of Scripture than in reading some others. When a preacher or writer undertakes to make as little as possible out of any part of God's word, he has reason to fear that he has quite missed its import.

33. How pleasant it is to walk with God and to have his comforts poured into the soul for refreshment, vv. 6, 7. Bates: "Communion with God is the beginning of heaven, and differs from the fulness of joy that is in the divine presence above, only in the degree and manner of fruition. As the blushes of the morning are the same light with the glorious brightness of the sun at noon-day."

34. If the literal David was so safe and if he so completely triumphed, how puny is all the array against him, who is both the root and offspring of David. His rest is indeed glorious.

35. Just as either David's adherents or his foes were surely wrong on a great public question, so now either saints or sinners are sadly playing the fool. One or the other will surely be put down. If sinners are right, saints are of all men most miserable. If the saints are pleasing God, sinners are madmen.

PSALM V.

To the chief Musician upon Nehiloth, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Give ear to my words, O LORD; consider my meditation.
- 2 Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God: for unto thee will I pray.
- 3 My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.
- 4 For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness: neither shall evil dwell with thee.
- 5 The foolish shall not stand in thy sight: thou hatest all workers of iniquity.
- 6 Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing: the LORD will abhor the bloody and deceitful man.
- 7 But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy; and in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple.
- 8 Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness because of mine enemies; make thy way straight before my face.
- 9 For there is no faithfulness in their mouth; their inward part is very wickedness; their throat is an open sepulchre; they flatter with their tongue.
- 10 Destroy thou them, O God; let them fall by their own counsels; cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against thee.
- 11 But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice: let them ever shout for joy, because thou defendest them: let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee.
- 12 For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous; with favour wilt thou compass him as with a shield.

FOR an explanation of the words, To the chief musician, in the title of this Psalm see above on Psalm iv. Nehiloth is explained in several ways. Some think it signifies armies. These would render the preceding word not upon, but against, so as to read, To the chief musician against the armies, i. e., a hymn to be sung against the hostile bands that arose in the country or invaded it. This view rests upon very slender grounds. Indeed it is quite conjectural. The second renders Nehiloth by the word heritages. This supposes that David here calls the twelve tribes the heritages, and that this Psalm is a prayer for the nation of Israel. Although this view is sanctioned by the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Vulgate, yet it is not well supported by reasons. Even those who introduce the word heritages are not agreed as to the sense in which it is to be taken. Some think Nehiloth is the first word of some song, to the tune of which this Psalm is to be sung. So Abenezra, Luther, Hengstenberg and Alexander are inclined to the opinion that Nehiloth points to the subject of the Psalm as being the lots of the righteous and the wicked. Other views, hardly demanding a statement, have been set forth. But the more probable opinion is that Nehiloth signifies wind instruments, as Neginoth in the preceding Psalm signified stringed instruments. Venema, Gill, Morison, Cobbin, Dimock, Fry, and Clarke agree in this rendering. The flute, horn, pipe, cornet, hautboy and organ are all wind instruments. Patrick selects the organ as the instrument chiefly designed; Calvin: "I adopt the opinion of those who hold that it was either a musical instrument or a tune; but of what particular kind I consider it of little importance to ascertain." One great difficulty in settling the question is that Nehiloth occurs nowhere else in Scripture. This precludes a comparison and leaves us very much to conjecture. This inscription in the Syriac reads, "A prayer in the person of the church when she comes early in the morning to the house of the Lord." But this is interpretation, not translation. Yet the idea that this was a morning hymn is favored by respectable writers. For other matters relating to the title see above on Psalm iv.

As to the occasion or precise date of the Psalm there is considerable diversity. Some think it refers to the events respecting Sheba noticed in 2 Sam. xx. Others think it refers to the rebellion of Absalom. Others suppose it is a Psalm composed by David after his long troubles with Saul. In the absence of light to guide us in this matter, any opinion must be purely conjectural. The occasion, if there was any, of its writing is concealed from us. We are not bound to hold that David wrote all the Psalms to suit particular times and events. Horsley entitles this Psalm, "A prayer of Messiah, in the character of a priest, coming at an early hour to prepare the altar of burnt-offering for the morning sacrifice." His view of the whole Psalm corresponds with this idea. But it cannot be shown that the Messiah is primarily spoken of in this Psalm. The names of God in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and El God. On the first two see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. The third is explained in v. 4.

1. Give ear to my words, O LORD. The appeal is directly to Jehovah. Open a prayer-book of the church of Rome and you will see the devotee first directing his cries to Paul and Peter and a long list of beings considered more approachable than the great I AM. But such worship derives no countenance from God's word. Inspired men teach us to come to God directly through Jesus Christ. It is worthy of notice that the Psalmist in this and in the next verse does not say what his prayer was. He knew that God saw his heart: "Thou understandest my thought afar off." God's omniscience is a source of great comfort to the pious. They know that he will do not only up to what they think, but exceeding abundantly above all they can think. Therefore they cry, Consider my meditation. The Chaldee, Syriac, and Hengstenberg also read my meditation; Alexander: My thought; Horne: My dove-like mournings; Waterland and Horsley: My sighing; Fry: My rising thoughts; the Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: My cry; Venema: My earnest desire; Gill: Understand my moan; Cocceius: My breathing, meaning the inmost desires of my heart. For consider some read understand, perceive. He asks God to think upon the things which now fill his own soul with thought. The Most High knows the language of a sigh. He has heard many a cry that was never sent forth. Blessed be his name he hears "the groanings which cannot be uttered." Rom. viii. 26, 27. Both Calvin and Hengstenberg properly notice that the last clause of the first verse and the first clause of the second verse are not a mere repetition of the first clause of the first verse. Calvin says that David divides his words "into two kinds, calling the one obscure or indistinct moanings, and the other loud crying." When Horne speaks of dove-like mournings he is not fanciful, but his reference is to Isaiah xxxviii. 14, where the same word is used. Blessed be God, who knows all the soul-troubles of his servants, and hides not his face from their inexpressible groanings, their unutterable sighs. God's people can often do no more than say to him, "I am shut up, I cannot come forth, I have no words, I am in distress, I know not what to pray for." As Luther said on a great public occasion, "I can do nothing else. God help me." What a blessed truth that God often regards us as praying in faith when we have said nothing. He acknowledged Moses' prayer when that prophet had not spoken a word. Ex. xiv. 15. God heard also the prayer of Hannah when "she spake in her heart; only her lips moved, but her voice was not heard." 1 Sam. i. 13. Yet ordinarily when the heart is duly inflamed with desire sooner or later words will be found, and the feelings find vent. Therefore David says:

2. Hearken unto the voice of my cry, my King, and my God. Calvin says, David "expresses one thing in three different ways; and this repetition denotes the strength of his affection, and his long perseverance in prayer. For he was not so fond of many words as to employ different forms of expression, which had no meaning; but being deeply engaged in prayer, he represented by these various expressions [give ear to my words—consider my meditation—hearken unto the voice of my cry] the variety of his complaints. It therefore signifies, that he prayed neither coldly nor only in few words, but that, according as the vehemence of his grief urged him, he was earnest in bewailing his calamities before God; and that since it did not immediately appear what would be their issue, he persevered in repeating the same complaints." The cry here is emphatic. It is a piercing utterance of the heart in articulate sounds. Waterland does not strengthen the force when for cry he reads supplication. The address to My King and my God is a taking hold of the covenant, claiming the protection of a subject of him, whose kingdom is over all, and the loving-kindness of him who is over all God blessed forever. True faith will expel despondency. It will give hope, and enable the child of sorrow to say, MY God and my King, for unto thee will I pray. Gill: "This is the boldness, freedom of speech, which the Scriptures speak of, Heb. iv. 16 and x. 19, and the saints are allowed to use in prayer before God; when they may pour out their souls unto him, and freely tell him all their mind." What would suffering believers do without access to the throne of grace? But with a mercy-seat always accessible, what can they lack? No marvel that the saints, though diverse in many things, are alike in the reality of their attachment to closet duties and to public worship. David was not alone in saying,

3. My voice shalt thou hear in the morning, O LORD; in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up. He declares that he is determined to give himself to prayer, and that with heartiness. When one is very intent on doing his work well, and abundantly, he rises betimes and prosecutes it diligently. To seek God early is to seek him earnestly. The man, who gives his first waking thoughts to God, will not be indisposed to acts of devotion at later hours of the day. Some think that in the morning signifies every morning, so that David declares what should be the habit of his future life. If men expect to maintain habits of devotion, it will be well to form strong resolutions on the subject. A good purpose is a good thing. But some think the Psalmist in this verse rather expresses his wish than his determination. So Calvin: Oh that thou wouldst hear my voice in the morning; and Hengstenberg: My voice mayest thou hear in the morning. In their comment both express a preference for the optative form. A good man asks for a spirit of prayer. He begs that he may not be left to wander on without any right desires after God. Some think that the stress is to be laid on the word hear, and that the import of the whole is, Do not turn away from my prayer, when in the morning I cry to thee. Either mode of explanation gives a good sense, but the latter seems preferable. The chief objection arises from the fact that putting the first clause in the optative destroys the parallelism in the verse, for even Calvin and Hengstenberg admit that the latter clause is to be rendered in the future, In the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee. The Arabic reads, In the morning I will stand before thee; Syriac: I will appear to [or before] thee; Dimock: I will prepare for thee; Mudge, Horsley and Morison prefer: I will set everything in order before thee. The words my prayer are not in the Hebrew. The English reader may see that they are supplied by our translators as they are in Italics. But herein they follow the old Jewish commentators. The word rendered direct, or set in order, is the word used to express the arranging of the wood and shew-bread, etc., on the altar. See Gill and Hengstenberg on the place. David adds, And I will look up; i. e., look up with confidence, as not ashamed. Some render it, I will look out. So Montanus, Michaelis, Piscator, Gill and others; Calvin: And I will keep watch; Owen: "It is diligently to look out after that which is coming towards us, and looking out after the accomplishment of our expectation. This is a part of our waiting for God;" Horsley: I will watch for thee. The imagery is taken from placing one in a watch-tower to announce the approach of a returning messenger or any one else. This state of mind is elsewhere described by the prophets. Thus Habakkuk ii. 1, "I will stand upon my watch, and set me upon the tower, and will watch to see what he will say unto me;" and Micah vii. 7: "There I will look [or look out] unto the LORD; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me." When we send a letter or a message asking a favor, we look out for an answer. This looking is an act of confidence, of reliance on the love and power of God. The suppliant would not be restless and impatient, though he would be eager to catch the first sign of coming relief, as the watchman is to catch the first ray of morning. Well may he wait and hope.

4. For thou art not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness. To him that has righteousness on his side, it is for an anchor of hope that God is righteous and abhors iniquity. The Lord not only has no pleasure in any wickedness, but he has great delight in all goodness. Morison says the negative form gives emphasis to the words used in this clause. The nature of God determines the course of providence. He will at length check wickedness. The word EL, here rendered God, signifies strong or mighty when used as an adjective, and might or power when used as an abstract term. It here means God, the mighty God, the Almighty. As a name of God standing alone it is chiefly, if not exclusively, found in the poetic parts of Scripture. It occurs about two hundred and forty times in the Hebrew Bible, and in a majority of cases refers to the true God. This God hates sin. "If all sin were punished here, men would despair of mercy, but if no sin were punished here, men would deny a providence." For wickedness Fry reads, an ungodly man, and Horsley, a wicked person. This does not change the doctrine taught. Neither shall evil dwell with thee. For evil Waterland and Fry read, The wicked; and Horsley, An evil one. Fenwick thinks the evil one, the devil, is intended; but that is a sense remote from the scope of the Psalm. To dwell is to sojourn, or to be entertained as a guest. Some have thought that the language is borrowed from the fact that strangers, who were determined to retain idolatry, were not permitted to reside in the land of Canaan, though they might pass through it. To the renewed soul it is a great comfort that in the next world neither evil itself nor wicked beings shall dwell with or near God's redeemed ones. For,

5. The foolish shall not stand in thy sight. Fry, Hengstenberg, and Alexander, for foolish read proud; Horne: mad; Ainsworth: insane boasters; Dimock: the profane; Cobbin: the madly profane; the Septuagint: transgressors of the law; several ancient versions, bad; others, malignant; John Rogers' translation reads, Soche as be cruell may not stande in thy syght. All sin is folly and madness. On this point all rational beings will at last come to the same conclusion. There will be no diversity of judgment on this matter in the last day. All sin is in its own nature malignant and mischievous. Its natural tendency is to ruin and wretchedness. It would produce far more misery on earth than it does, were it not for the restraints put upon it by the Lord. All sin is cruelty to one's soul, to one's race, to a bleeding Saviour. All sin is proud and insolent. It affects independence of God. It swells and struts. It exalts itself against God. It is fond of high looks and proud imaginations. It trades in self-conceit, self-deception and fearful presumption. All sin is utterly opposed to God. As fire and water resist each other, as light and darkness are utterly diverse, so God resists the proud. His nature is wholly opposed to it. He cannot cease to abhor it, without ceasing to be God. No creature has any adequate conception of the evil of sin. None but God comprehends it. Because it is so vile, those who love it shall not stand in God's sight. They shall not be owned as servants; they shall not be heard in their petitions; they shall not accomplish their designs; they shall fall before terrible judgments; they shall fall in the great day of trial. The overflowing scourge shall sweep them away. The reason is found in the divine purity. Thou hatest all workers of iniquity. Those do greatly slander God, who teach that he will punish sin only because it is opposed to his law or his will, and not because it is opposed to his infinite, eternal, unchangeable rectitude. So repugnant to God's nature is iniquity, that he would not save even his elect, except in a way that should fully and forever put away both the guilt and stain of sin, and bring all conceivable odium on transgression. God would not even spare his Son, when he stood in the place of sinners, lest he might seem to spare sin. Could he cease to hate it, he would cease to be worthy of love and confidence. Nor is it merely some forms of sin that God abhors, but he hates all workers of iniquity. Nor does he hate sin in general, as some men profess to do, but countenance it in detail. For,

6. Thou shalt destroy them that speak leasing. On leasing, see on Psalm iv. 2. It is a proof of the divine benevolence that in all the Scriptures God has set himself so terribly against falsehood. If the malignity of a sin may be learned from the temporal miseries it produces, then can nothing be more opposed to God than the various forms of untruth, known among men. Some are satisfied with an insincere practice of the true religion, while others content themselves with a sincere practice of a false religion. The religion of some is all a lie. The profession of others is hypocritical. Let those who indulge in any species of untruthfulness remember the dreadful examples made of Gehazi, Ananias and Sapphira. Let them read the many terrible woes denounced in Scripture against falsehood, noting even the dreadful sayings of the last chapter in the Bible, Rev. xxii. 15. Truly God's face is set against those who invent, retail, or willingly believe falsehood. The Psalmist here says God shall destroy such. The dreadfulness of the destruction threatened against these wicked men is elsewhere described. When God destroys the ruin is utter, the wrath is terrible. God also marks for punishment the murderer. The Lord will abhor the bloody man; Gill and Horsley render it: The man of blood; Calvin and Horne: The blood-thirsty; The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Anderson and Morison: The man of bloods; several ancient versions, The shedder of blood; for man of blood, Jebb suggests man of blood-shed; some think that the plural form, bloods, in the Hebrew, points to the fact that men who once shed innocent blood are commonly ready to do it again; others suppose it is merely the Hebrew idiom, expressing no more than a bloody man; Mudge and Dodd think that a man of blood is one "whose blood, for any capital crime, is due to justice; on whom is blood, or the debt of blood;" i. e., he is a man who ought to be put to death. That God's anger burns terribly against every form of murder is certain. No sentence of human law is more accordant with the revealed will of God than this, that the murderer should be capitally punished. The Lord abhors such men. In most cases his providence so orders it that those guilty of blood are detected and punished in this world. In the world to come they must, without repentance, meet a dreadful doom. The LORD also abhors the deceitful man, or as Horsley renders it, The man of guile; Fry: The man of fraud. Men may attempt to practise fraud on God, may be full of guile in all their apparent devotions, may be hypocrites and so lose their souls. Or they may flatter, slander, backbite, cheat, or deceive their neighbors. In either case God's abhorrence is against them. If the only thing in the way of the deliverance of God's people is that it involves the destruction of the men of falsehood, of blood, of deceit and of fraud, God will not stand at that. He would destroy a world of sinners rather than permit one of his people to be finally overthrown. He is righteous. Therefore each of his people may say,

7. But as for me, I will come into thy house in the multitude of thy mercy. Commentators are not agreed whether the Psalmist here expresses a determination as to what he will do, or merely a persuasion of what he shall be able to do. The form, but as for me, seems to make it parallel to Joshua xxiv. 15, where that pious man says: "As for me and my house we will serve the LORD." In this place it is clear that a purpose of the mind is expressed. Others think that David merely expresses a strong hope of what he shall through God's great mercy be able to accomplish, viz., that though now driven far from the tabernacle (the temple was not yet built) he should in due time be allowed to visit the place, where God gloriously manifested himself. Both senses are good, and both may be intended, so that he may be regarded as saying, "Though I am driven from my own house and from the house of God also, I am not in despair, nor is my purpose to serve the Lord at all shaken. This shall all be shown as soon as God through his abundant mercy opens the way for my return, as I am confidently expecting him to do. Then one of my first acts shall be a public, solemn acknowledgment that he is my Deliverer." This is the view Calvin seems to favor: "The primary object of David was to encourage himself in the assured hope of preservation by the mercy of God; but at the same time he shows that upon obtaining deliverance, he will be grateful to God for it, and keep it in remembrance." Morison holds the same view: "He expresses his conviction, that this exile will not be of long duration, and declares his determination to embrace the earliest opportunity of entering into the house of God." Yet in all this David was humble. He relied not on the number of his adherents, nor on his own merits or wisdom, but solely on the abundance of God's mercy. Men never rest upon anything so safely as on God's undeserved favor, his unmerited kindness. He delights to give grace to all that hope in his mercy. Nor does a pious reliance on God beget presumption or irreverence, for the Psalmist says, And in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple. All worship, which is destitute of godly fear is not accepted. Where there is no fear, there is no scriptural piety. The word rendered worship, might be translated, bow down. The posture of worship should be decent and reverent. Some suppose that the time for this reverent worship is the same as that mentioned in the first clause of the verse, viz.: the time of deliverance from his enemies, and so they make toward thy holy temple to signify "towards the holy of holies, the ark, the mercy-seat, the Shechinah, the cherubims of glory." The word temple may easily be shown to designate not only the house of God built by Solomon, or the holy of holies, but also the whole tabernacle. Some think David's meaning to be that as soon as deliverance should come, he would reverently worship in the court towards the holy place. But why may we not supply a word, and so get a yet better sense, and at the same time retain the natural use of the word toward, so as to read the clause thus, And now in thy fear will I worship toward thy holy temple? q. d., I will not wait till the day of my full deliverance. I will now begin this blessed work, and as I cannot worship in thy house, I will worship toward it. This form, I will, is found in many cases where it expresses an action to be begun very soon, although not now begun. This bowing and worshiping towards the temple was practised by the Jews wherever they might be. 1 Kings viii. 35, 44; Dan. vi. 10. Venema and Gill think that by thy holy temple David points to heaven, itself. If so, it makes it the more proper to regard the last clause as declaring what the Psalmist would do even before his deliverance from persecuting foes. Instead of toward Fry reads at, but this is not sustained. Beginning his worship at once he prays:

8. Lead me, O LORD, in thy righteousness, because of mine enemies. What a prayer! how suitable to every member of the church militant! How fitting to the occasion are these words! Instead of enemies, Morison is inclined to read, Lookers on; Horsley reads, Them that watch me; and several, My observers. Every servant of God is a spectacle to angels and men. He is watched over by angels, and he is watched by wicked men, who hope to see him commit some great error. Every good man knows something of the plague of his own heart, and knows it is not to be trusted. But at this time, besides his spiritual foes, David had many personal and perhaps national enemies, whose hatred was deadly. One error on his part might blight all his prospects. And so he says, Lead me. If God guide us, we shall be safe. If he forsake us, we shall all go astray. Divine conduct is the only sure preservative against superlative folly. In thy righteousness is another appeal to God to judge between him and his foes, and a prayer to God for preservation in the way of righteousness, which includes two things, the spirit of submission to God's method of saving sinners by imputed righteousness and of obedience to God's righteous precepts. If the words of Habakkuk ii. 4, The just shall live by faith, refer to the Gospel method of saving sinners, as Paul shows, by what rule can we properly exclude from the word righteousness in this place the idea of something beyond simply administrative justice? If the leading here spoken of is to end in David's standing accepted before God in his temple, then how can this be but through the merits of Christ? There is no righteousness but that of the Redeemer, in which any mere man since the fall could ever appear before God with acceptance. The ingenious, learned and pious men, who have labored to make it appear that we have here a mere appeal to the divine rectitude, have not made out their case. Even Calvin does not take the word righteousness in an evangelical sense, yet he is evidently dissatisfied with so narrow a view, and adds, "The righteousness of God, in this passage, as in many others, is to be understood of his faithfulness and mercy which he shows in defending and preserving his people." But God's saving mercy and faithfulness are bestowed on sinners through Christ alone. Hengstenberg: "The righteousness here spoken of is the property of God, according to which he gives to every one his own—befriends the pious, who confide in his promises, and destroys the ungodly." But that attribute of God, by which he is led to give to every one his own, would, without Christ's righteousness imputed to us, save none of us but would send us all to endless ruin. For mine enemies Jebb reads thine enemies; but this is evidently an error in his printer, or is brought in from some erroneous edition of the Hebrew text. The next clause reads, Make thy way straight before my face. Fry following the Syriac and Arabic connects the words because of mine enemies with this part of the verse. The vigilance of his enemies was good cause for offering both petitions, but there is no good reason for dividing the clauses otherwise than as in the English text. Fry also reads the clause, Make plain my way before me; and in his commentary Morison reads my way before my face. This reading is probably to be accounted for as that of Jebb just noticed. No reason is given for this change. It does not even follow the Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, which read, Direct my way in thy sight. This is a very good prayer. It implores divine omniscience both to guide and to search one's way. Still our version is right. By thy way is signified the way of God in providence and in grace. The way of God is the way that pleases God. David implores divine guidance and deliverance with special earnestness on account of the desperate wickedness of his enemies:

9. For there is no faithfulness in their mouth. Some regard David here as virtually saying, Help me, for I am better than these men. It is true that David was not in the wrong in his controversy with them. Yet such a construction of his prayer is not very pleasing. David would not indeed use weapons, which they allowed. But if we make him say that the cause of his urgency for the divine aid is the perfectly unscrupulous character of his enemies, we have a good sense in a logical connection without making the Psalmist in any measure commend himself. One of the horrible accompaniments of ordinary war is that it is "a temporary repeal of all the principles of virtue." It legalizes artifice, slaughter, and horrible cruelties. But the wicked repeal the code of morals whenever it suits them. David's foes fearfully departed from all the law of God. For faithfulness Fry reads truth; Horsley: constancy; Calvin paraphrases it, They speak nothing uprightly, or in sincerity; Horne says, The charge brought against them is, that truth and fidelity were not to be found in their dealings with God or each other. The ancient versions for faithfulness, read truth, rectitude, or equity. Rectitude and equity perish with veracity. The history of David's life shows that very few men ever suffered more from the utter want of candor and truth in his foes. Saul's whole deportment was of this description. He made promises only to show his utter faithlessness. Nor was the conduct of Absalom, of Ahithophel, or his heathen foes characterized by sincerity. One of the earliest and most painful tokens of depravity is a want of regard to truth. Ps. lviii. 3. Instead of their mouth the church of England following the Hebrew reads his mouth; Hengstenberg: "The use of the singular suffix at the first is to be explained by the entire mass of enemies being represented by the Psalmist as one person, as a personified ungodliness;" Alexander: "For there is nothing in his mouth, i. e., the mouth of any one of them, or of all concentrated in one ideal person, sure or certain, i. e., true." Elsewhere David brings out the same truth in another form: "They bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly." Ps. lxii. 4. Nor is this want of faithfulness surprising when their real characters are considered, for their inward part is very wickedness. The word rendered wickedness is plural, wickednesses. Gill says it "signifies woes, calamities, mischiefs;" Septuagint: Their heart is vain; Calvin: Inwardly they are full of iniquity; Dodd and Mudge give this sense: Their inward part is all woful, execrable stuff or rottenness; Fry: Within them is deep depravity. In a foot-note he asserts that the word translated wickedness means the innate depravity of the human heart. All sin is naturally traced to the fountain of a fallen and corrupt nature. For inward part Gill would read inward thought, and for authority appeals to the rendering given in Ps. xlix. 11 and lxiv. 6. The heart of an unregenerate man is always worse than his life. Inward wickedness is the parent of all visible vices, crimes and iniquities. Matt. xv. 18, 19; Mark vii. 21, 22. Nor is a religious experience of any permanent value, unless it leads us from actual sins to trace up our corruption to its source. The Arabic renders this clause: Iniquity is in their hearts. If there was no sin in the heart, beyond a question the life and the speech would be faultless. But because their heart is all wrong, Their throat is an open sepulchre. From a corrupt heart comes a foul mouth. Some have thought that the figure of the text was in substance this: that the throat like a sepulchre was the receptacle of much corruption. But not that which goeth into the mouth defileth a man; but that which cometh out of the mouth, this defileth a man. Matt. xv. 11. This principle is by Christ himself expressly applied to the matter of wickedness. Mark vii. 20-23. But as a sepulchre, where human bodies are decaying, sends forth a foul air, both unpleasant and unwholesome; so men, whose inward part is wickednesses, naturally and necessarily in their speech breathe out corruption, filling society with misery and greatly dishonoring God by their evil communications, their filthy and foolish words, their dreadful slanders, detractions, railings, revilings, complainings, murmurings, quarrelings, tattlings, heresies, oaths, curses, imprecations, blasphemies. Cocceius thinks this clause has reference to perniciousness of doctrine. The tongue is a world of iniquity. The lips of the wicked utter all devouring words. Horne: "Their throat was an open sepulchre, continually emitting, in obscene and impious language, the noisome and infectious exhalations of a putrid heart, entombed in a body of sin." This seems to be all that properly belongs to the figure here. Yet the other sense given teaches no falsehood respecting human nature, and is supported by eminent writers. Thus Calvin: "Their throat is an open sepulchre, as if he had said, They are all-devouring gulfs, denoting thereby their insatiable desire of shedding blood." Gill: "The throat of wicked men may be compared to an open sepulchre for its voracity and insatiableness; the grave being one of those three or four things, which never has enough or is satisfied; . . . and so may be expressive of the desire of the wicked after sin, who drink up iniquity like water, and of their delight in it and their fulness of it, and yet still greedy, insatiable, and not to be satisfied;" Patrick speaks of the open mouth, gaping for the destruction of the innocent; Henry: "They are likewise bloody, for their throat is an open sepulchre, cruel as the grave, gaping to devour and to swallow up; insatiable as the grave, which never says, It is enough. Prov. xxx. 15, 16. . . . The grave is open to them all, and yet they are as open graves to one another;" Hodge: "Their throat is an open sepulchre, i. e., from their throat issue words as offensive and pestiferous as the tainted breath of an open grave; or, what from the next clause may appear probable, Their throat is always open and ready to devour like the insatiable and insidious grave." He adds: They flatter with their tongue. The variation of the rendering of this verse where it is quoted in the New Testament is not important. It there reads: With their tongues they have used deceit. In all flattery there is deceit. "A man that flattereth his neighbor spreadeth a net for his feet," Prov. xxix. 5. This is a sin highly offensive to God. "The Lord shall cut off all flattering lips," Ps. xii. 3. But he, who flatters men, will either pray not at all, or but deceitfully. So his prayer will be sin, because it will be hypocrisy. Piscator, Gejerus and Hengstenberg render this clause, They make smooth their tongue; Geddes: Their tongue is smooth to flatter; Horsley: They set a polish with their tongue; Venema: "They pretend love to God and man, that they may the more easily impose on the credulous, and overwhelm them;" "Morison: "Every word they uttered seemed to be in falsehood. Nothing they said could be relied on. They spoke only to mislead and deceive." This and the next preceding clause are quoted by Paul, Rom. iii. 13, in proof of the doctrine of the depravity of the whole race, both Jew and Gentile. What one unrenowned man is as to God, the same in kind are all the unconverted. What one sinner does respecting divine things, all sinners in like circumstances will do. As each angel in heaven is a specimen of the innumerable company of those pure spirits, who worship around the throne, so that if we knew how one of them would feel and act we might know the character of all; so it is with the wicked of our own or of any other race. Each is a sample of the whole. Morison: "There has been a mournful uniformity in the character of the wicked in all ages; whether they have set themselves to persecute the church in her collective form, or the individuals, who have ranked under her banner;" Calvin: "Paul does not wrest these words from their genuine meaning when he applies them to all mankind, but asserts, with truth, that David showed in them what is the character of the whole human family by nature." Men of this description, living under the government of a just God, must be terribly exposed to ruin. Accordingly the next words are:

10. Destroy thou them, O God. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Vulgate: Judge them; Syriac and Hengstenberg: Hold them guilty; Chaldee and Alexander: Condemn them; Cocceius: Count them guilty; Calvin: Cause them to err; Fry: Convict them; Patrick: Pronounce the sentence of condemnation against them; Michaelis: Pronounce them guilty; Scott: Deal with them as guilty; Luther: The word [rendered Destroy] properly signifies such a decision and judgment as would show and manifest what sort of neighbors they are, when their ungodly dispositions are disclosed, and every one is made known. The metaphorical sense of the verb rendered destroy sometimes is to err. This led Calvin to render it as he did. He also supposed this and the next clause to be connected, this asking for the cause of ruin, and the next for the ruin itself. But he is not supported by others, although he has made some excellent practical remarks. The marginal reading is as good as any if we use the words in the old English sense. Make them guilty, i. e., condemn them. Guilt, meaning just exposure or liability to punishment, is in a large number of cases connected with the word rendered Destroy. Desolation and destruction follow condemnation or ascertained guilt. This is the first sentence, found in the Psalms, of an imprecatory form. For the right mode of understanding such expressions see Introduction, § 6.

On this verse Horne remarks that such clauses are spoken "by way of prediction rather than of imprecation," and renders them all in the future. Is it not sufficient to say that we have here the prophetic form of denouncing evil against the wicked, as in the next verse we have a prophetic annunciation of the blessings which shall come on the righteous? The very plans of the wicked will in the end prove their overthrow. Let them fall (or they shall fall) by their own counsels. Just as Haman was hanged on the gallows he erected for another, so the wicked are continually falling by devices designed to overwhelm others. If God let a man have his own way he will soon be in hell. A withdrawal of restraint, of wisdom, and of mercy, will at once complete any one's ruin. Calvin renders the clause, Let them fall from their counsels, i. e., he supposes David to be praying that their counsels might come to naught, their undertakings prove unsuccessful; Alexander: "They shall fall from their plans, i. e., before they can accomplish them, or in consequence, by means of them;" Patrick paraphrases it, Let their own devices, whereby they seek to ruin me, destroy themselves; The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic also read from their counsels. It is easy for God to bring to naught the counsels of the greatest schemers and plotters against the peace of his church and the glory of his Son. And it is as righteous for him to do so as it is easy. They deserve his displeasure. Cast them out (or thou wilt cast them out) in the multitude of their transgressions. The number of their iniquities would terribly affright men, if they had any just conception of the evil nature of sin itself. Then they would look upon their transgressions as innumerable as the sands on the sea-shore, or the stars of heaven. To be cast out in sin is to be a cast-away—refuse—reprobate silver. To those who rejected him Christ said, Ye shall die in your sins. To die in a far country, or in prison, or in delirium, or in lunacy, is in itself very undesirable; yet such deaths may open the gates of heaven. But to die in sin is the worst thing that can happen to any man. For sin is flagitious. It is rebellion against God. For they have rebelled against thee. Sin attacks God. It flies in his face. He is the object against which all sin is directed. It is his law which sin breaks, his will which sin opposes, his authority which sin tramples under foot, his mercy which sin rejects. Hengstenberg: "God would not be God, if he should suffer them to go unpunished;" Morison says the original "implies the opposition and resistance not only of open rebellion, but also of an unbelieving, cavilling, and disputatious spirit." In character, temper, and destiny the wicked are quite the opposite of the righteous. Accordingly David says:

11. But let all those that put their trust in thee rejoice. In this world those who have the least right to rejoice often seem to be the most merry; and those who have the greatest cause of joy often seem to be the most sad. But things shall not always stand thus. God will in due time put all right. The righteous who now walk by faith and take God at his word, though they walk in darkness and have no light, shall soon commence a new career—a career of uninterrupted and unending joy and triumph. Accordingly he says, Let them ever shout for joy. Ever, both here and hereafter. "Blessed are ye that weep now: for ye shall laugh." Luke vi. 21. Let them learn to rejoice in tribulation; let them make known their inward comforts and supports; let them make their boast in God; let them not keep silence when they should shout for joy. For all this there is good cause. Because thou defendest them. Waterland: Thou shalt overshadow them. Who can harm those that are the apple of God's eye, are in the hollow of his hand, and abide under the shadow of the Almighty? It matters not who assaults when God defends. The hand of God as safely protects against a world in arms as against one little worm. Therefore, Let them also that love thy name be joyful in thee. To love God's name is to love him and all, by which he has made himself known. All the righteous have this love. All of them think upon God's name, cherish it, glory in it. To hear it lightly spoken of gives them pain. To hear it blasphemed shocks their sensibilities. But when it is honored, extolled, praised, they are happy. They delight in God's name, titles, attributes, works, word, worship, ordinances, and people. The saints joy in God, not in the creature. In the world they have tribulation; but in him they are joyful. Alexander renders all the clauses of this verse in the future tense thus: And all trusting in thee shall be glad; forever shall they shout for joy, and thou wilt cover over them; and in thee shall exult the lovers of thy name. This is both declarative and prophetic. It cannot fail. Some suppose that David is praying that God's people may rejoice on account of the deliverances shown to him. This may be so. But a righteous man wishes God's people to be happy even if he himself should see much sorrow. True piety is benevolent. Could it have its way the saints should never shed another bitter tear. But true piety is also humble, and knows its own ignorance and quarrels not with God for his needful chastisements. God's nature is the basis of all spiritual comforts. And so it is said:

12. For thou, LORD, wilt bless the righteous. Both in the Greek and Hebrew Scriptures the same words are used whether to express the act of the creature blessing God, or the act of God blessing the creature; and yet there is a great difference between these. When man blesses God, the utmost he can do is to make known his desires that God may be honored by himself and all others. But when God blesses one he not only speaks good concerning him, but that good is sure to be accomplished. Man's blessing is optative; God's, authoritative. Nor is there any exception to the blessedness secured to the righteous. They are all in covenant. They are all blessed, not equally, but savingly, eternally, ineffably. This it is God's wont to do. There is no exception. For the righteous, Fry, after Nebiensis, reads, The Just One. He says that it is to be understood personally of Christ. He cites Horsley as favoring this view: "The Psalmist, speaking with the highest assurance of the final deliverance and happy condition of the good, is driven, as it were, by the Spirit that inspired him, to a choice of words, fixing the blessing to a single Person, to him who is blessed over all, and the cause of blessing." It is true that all the blessings of believers come to them through Christ; but there is no more reason for making the word righteous specially refer to Christ in this place, than in scores of others. If it be said that it is in the singular here, so is it in many other places, where no one thinks of applying it specially to Christ. Yet it is true that God has blessed him, and given him joys above all others, and has made him the depository of the blessings which so enrich his people; as well as the channel, through which they flow. Still the promise is to each believer. Morison: "Innumerable are the ways, in which Jehovah can fulfil this gracious promise to his people." In their lot in life, in their basket and in their store, in their bodies and souls, in their frames of mind and general tempers, in their relations with the world, in their joys and in their sorrows, in life and in death, in time and in eternity, thou, LORD, canst bless, wilt bless, and shalt bless the just. So that with favor wilt thou compass him as with a shield. Though the general figure, expressive of protection, is the same as in Ps. iii. 3, where God is called a shield, yet the word there rendered shield is not the same used here, this being often rendered buckler, and describing a piece of armor which was both offensive and defensive, having a solid case for protection, and surmounted by a spear or spears, against which, if any pressed, they were pierced. Horsley renders this last clause: "Like a shield of good will thou wilt stand guard around him." And truly "the good will of him that dwelt in the bush" is the hope of us all. It makes rich and adds no sorrow. Every good thing the righteous receive is of God's mere grace, and sovereign mercy. It is of favor, not of debt. The righteous deserve no good thing. Their righteousnesses are filthy rags. What they are and what they hope to be is all by the grace of God. This now and forever encompasses, fortifies, crowns, adorns them. It is their defence, their beauty, their chief glory. Dodd says the word rendered shield must mean some pointed weapon, as a spear. So that the clause should read, Thou wilt encircle him with favor, as with a fence of spears, as a prince is encircled with spears or spearmen. But this is forced. The word is never rendered spear, but always shield, buckler, or target. A shield embossed with spikes or spears seems to be the armor described. All over is the servant of God protected and altogether is he surrounded with loving-kindnesses.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. In prayer it is well to resort to the aid of language to express our thoughts and petitions, v. 1. "Take with you words and turn to the Lord," Hos. xiv. 2. It is well to have definite conceptions of what we need.

2. If God gives us a heart to pray, he will give us a blessing in answer to our prayers, v. 1. All his names, all his offices, all his promises secure thus much. He hears our sighs; he knows their meaning; he can and will attend to our case.

3. Meditation and prayer are kindred duties, v. 1. Each leads to the other. They dwell together. Bates: "Meditation before prayer is like the tuning of an instrument and setting it for the harmony. Meditation before prayer doth mature our conceptions and exercise our desires." In Genesis xxiv. 63, our translators put the word meditate in the text, but in the margin they put the word pray. No man can devoutly meditate without praying, or devoutly pray without meditating.

4. If in prayer words should be wanting, and we should be conscious of no more than breathing, sighing, meditation, others have been in like straits, v. 1. Let us not then be discouraged. He who will not quench the smoking flax can hear a breath, as well as a cry, a moan as well as words, a meditation as well as a speech.

5. Idolatry must be very hateful to God. As the sovereign of an empire must set himself against those who would cut off his revenue; so Jehovah must abhor all those practices, which deprive him of the tribute of prayer and praise, supplication and thanksgiving, which are his due, v. 2. All sin is a wrong to God. That which hinders, or corrupts his worship is a direct affront, a daring robbery.

6. True prayer is never careless or listless. It is earnest. It is importunate. It thinks. It also cries, v. 2. Delay of the answer for a season but inflames its desires.

7. No wickedness should drive us from God's throne of grace. If our own sins rise up against us, let them impel us to plead for mercy. And we see David here urged on to prayer by the wickedness of those who sought his destruction. If the wicked curse, let us pray; if they lie, let us pray; if they flatter, let us pray; if they shed the blood of the saints, let us pray, vv. 1, 2, 3.

8. If we would have the LORD for our God, let us also take him for our King, v. 2. If we reject his laws, it is certain we reject his grace. If we refuse his yoke, we surely do not accept his mercy. If his sceptre is an offence to us, so is his plan of saving sinners by his blood. If Christ is made of God unto us righteousness, he is also made of God unto us sanctification.

9. It is well when we can plead with the Lord as our King and our God to bless us, v. 2. He bids us do it. Nothing but our unbelief holds us back. If he calls us his sons, surely we may cry, Our Father. If he says, Ye are my people, we may say, Our God. Thomas made progress when he cried, My Lord and my God.

10. True submission and obedience to God will not make us dull but lively in his service, v. 3. It will arouse the spirit of devotion, v. 2. True religion is not quietism, nor stoicism, nor atheism. It brings the soul into communion with God. It arouses all its activities. It gives wondrous energy. It stirs up thought at midnight. It begets habits of devotion. It goes not by fits and starts.

11. Every well spent day must be begun with God, v. 3. It is right he should have our first and best thoughts. Gill: "The morning is a proper time for prayer, both to return thanks for refreshing sleep and rest, for preservation from dangers by fire, by thieves and murderers, and for renewed mercies in the morning; as also to pray to God to keep from evil and dangers the day following; to give daily food, and to succeed in business and the employments of life; and for a continuation of every mercy, temporal and spiritual." What a wonderful example was that set us by our Lord: "In the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed." Mark i. 35. It is not to be supposed that this was a solitary instance. Luke vi. 12; xxi. 37. Is there a thriving Christian on earth, who gives his earliest thoughts to the world and only later ones to God?

12. Genuine prayer will be looking out for answers, v. 3. The presentation of the petition is important as it secures the blessing. Prayer lives in a watch-tower. The Oratory should be an observatory. Berleberg Bible: "One must keep on the watch, if one would receive anything from God, and wait with longing for the desired answer, also be constantly looking out for help, and giving heed to whatsoever the Lord may speak." Henry paraphrases thus, "I will look up; will look after my prayers, and hear what God the LORD will speak, Ps. lxxxv. 8, that, if he grant what I asked, I may be thankful; if he deny, I may be patient; if he defer I may continue to pray and wait, and may not faint." Gill says the phrase, I will look up, or out, is "expressive of hope, expectation, faith, confidence that an answer would be returned."

13. Wrong views of the character of God spoil all religion, v. 4. When man's hope is built on the idea that God is like his erring creatures, that he is not holy, just, or true, all his solemn services are worthless, and his prospects are dismal. God is inflexibly just. If he saves a sinner who believes, he will so do it as to condemn sin in the flesh. Impunity is unknown in God's government.

14. Because God is holy, all who love holiness shall triumph over all who love wickedness, v. 4. There is no bond of sympathy so strong and enduring as that, which results from similarity of moral character. God cannot but love his own image. He cannot but hate the image of the wicked one. Light and darkness may be so mingled as to produce a twilight, but God and wickedness can never dwell together. Charnock: "Holiness can no more approve of sin than it can commit it."

15. There must be something inconceivably monstrous in all impiety, else God would not so often put upon it the brand of folly, v. 5. Dickson: "Let wicked men seem never so wise politicians among men, yet they shall be found mad fools before God, selling heaven for trifles of earth, holding war with the Almighty, and running upon their own destruction in their self-pleasing dreams, to the loss of their life and estate, temporal and eternal." God's views of sin may be learned from such places as Hab. i. 13; Zech. viii. 17; Amos v. 21-23; Isa. i. 14; Jer. xlv. 4. Charnock: "Sin is the only primary object of God's displeasure." It cannot be shown that God hates anything but sin.

16. Persecutors, heretics, false teachers, deceivers, and haters of all goodness are no novelty. Good men have always been hated, hunted, harassed by evil doers. Demas will forsake the church. Diotrephes will form parties. Absalom and his friends will seize on the temple. But the triumph of the wicked is short. If workers of iniquity abound, no new thing has happened, v. 5.

17. Because God is holy and man sinful, regeneration is necessary. God, and sinners who love iniquity, cannot dwell together, vv. 4, 5, 6. To expect happiness in heaven without a new nature is more foolish than any dream of madmen. Men may believe the world is flat or round, that it moves or stands still, and yet be virtuous, and happy, and on the road to heaven. But without a new heart no man can be saved. Christ justly expressed amazement that Nicodemus, a master in Israel, supposed to know the Old Testament Scriptures, should be ignorant of this doctrine.

18. There must be future retribution because God is holy, because men are not here dealt with according to their characters, because God has determined to destroy the wicked, and because that destruction comes not in this life, v. 6. This doctrine is implied in hundreds of texts, where it is not declared.

19. All hypocrisy is vain. Nothing is more idle, v. 6. We never can impose on the Almighty. Morison: "Let all workers of deceit, all hypocritical pretenders, whether in the intercourse of life or in the fellowship of the church, know that they are hateful in the divine sight; that their prayers will not be heard; that their offerings will not be accepted; that nothing short of repentance and deep contrition of spirit will be associated with the returning smile of divine mercy and compassion. Continuing in their present course of deceit and falsehood, they can expect to meet nothing but the wrath of an angry God." No wickedness on earth is more common than the various forms of deceit.

20. God is not the author of sin. He abhors it. Nothing is so repugnant to his nature, vv. 4, 5, 6. He permits sin, but he does not approve it. He overrules sin, but he hates it. He may sustain in being very wicked men while they commit sin, but he never works wickedness. To charge him with being the author of sin is blasphemy.

21. Honesty is the best policy. It commonly appears so in this life; invariably, in the next, v. 6. The perpetual toil and scuffle of the false man to make things stick together and to preserve appearances might warn him of worse trouble yet to come. Morison: "Let the sentiment of this verse teach the importance of candor, and benevolence, and sincerity in all the intercourses of life. How many there are who will meet you as friends, and give you the right hand of good brotherhood, while they are stabbing you in the dark, and whispering something, even in the ear of your familiar friend, which may lessen you in his esteem. And yet these very dastardly characters will not dare to breathe in your presence any other sentiments save those of kindness and respect. Let such men remember, that in the holy scriptures, lying and murder are the invariable companions of deceit, and treachery, and circumvention." When God utterly forsakes a man, he soon confounds all moral distinctions. To such a one black is white, bitter is sweet, evil is good. Many of the vices are cognate. They dwell together.

22. Neither in fact, nor in the esteem of good men is there any substitute for the public worship of God, v. 7. Take away from the pious of earth all the recollections, impressions, purposes, refreshments, encouragements, hopes, joys, and other graces, which owe their origin, or their vigor to the house of God, and what a change would be witnessed. It is a great mercy in God to give us public ordinances. They reprove, cheer, warn, reclaim, animate, strengthen all God's people.

23. The only hope of sinners is in mercy; nor will a little answer their purpose. They need a great deal, v. 7. Calvin says this verse teaches us "the general truth, that it is only through the goodness of God that we have access to him; and that no man prays aright but he, who, having experienced his grace, believes and is fully persuaded that he will be merciful to him. The fear of God is at the same time added, in order to distinguish genuine and godly trust from the vain confidence of the flesh." God has taken peculiar pains to assure us of his mercy and grace. Reliance on these is of great use. Dickson: "The faith, which the godly have in the mercies of God, doth encourage them to follow his service; and in some cases doth give them hope to be loosed from the restraints which hinder them from enjoying the public ordinances." It is a great thing to be able to keep the eye fixed on God's great compassions.

24. No good man is offended because God is greatly to be feared, v. 7. The true fear of God has no torment in it. The righteous would on no account part with reverential feelings.

25. The greater our perils, the more should our prayers abound; the more enemies, the more supplications, v. 8. That is a wicked perversion of any event, which drives us from the mercy-seat.

26. It is right that we should pray to be kept in a plain way, and not be allowed to fall into darkness respecting either faith or practice, v. 8. Inscrutable points of doctrine, mysterious providences, and insoluble questions in casuistry are often occasions of terrible temptations. To ask for light on our path is therefore the same as praying not to be led into temptation. Satan loves to fish in muddy water. Mental confusion is unfriendly to the steady course of piety. Let us beg God to make crooked things straight. Dickson: "So much the more as the godly are sensible of their own blindness, and weakness, and readiness to go out of the right way, so much the more do they call for, and depend upon God's directing them."

27. The Scriptures speak one uniform and unmistakable language respecting the universal and dreadful depravity of man, v. 9. There was no stronger language used on this subject by David than we find in Genesis vi. 5. And when Paul would prove Jew and Gentile all lost he finds no more fitting testimony than in this Psalm. Rom. iii. 13. Compliments to unregenerate men respecting their goodness are as much out of place as praise of a corpse for its beauty. They are all dead. Morison: "There has been a mournful uniformity in the character of the wicked in all ages."

28. Dickson: "Among other motives to make the godly take heed of their carriage in time of trial, this is one; they have to do with a false world, and hollow-hearted men, who will make false pretences of what is not their intention, and will make promise of what they mind not to perform, and will give none but rotten and poisonable advice, gilded with false flattery, and all to deceive the godly and draw them into a snare," v. 9.

29. The ruin of the incorrigibly wicked is inevitable, v. 10. Everything is against them. God, with all his nature, plans and providence, the inherent weakness and wretchedness of their cause, the multitude of their offences, the heinous character of their rebellion, unite with all the teachings of Scripture and all the worship of God's people in making the overthrow of the impenitent beyond all doubt certain. God's people cannot thank him that no weapon formed against Zion shall prosper, nor pray, Thy kingdom come, nor adore God for one of his attributes, nor cry, God be merciful to me a sinner, nor repeat a prophecy concerning the final triumph of truth and righteousness, without pointing to great principles, all of which say, The ungodly shall perish.

30. But the righteous are safe, v. 11. All, that makes sure the ruin of the wicked, renders certain the victory of the righteous. God is with them, defends them, blesses them.

31. We ought to pray for God's people, v. 11. They need our prayers. They have a right to them on the score of brotherhood. Henry: "Let us learn of David to pray, not for ourselves only, but for others; for all good people, for all that trust in God, and love his name, though not in everything of our mind, or in our interest. Let all that are entitled to God's promises have a share in our prayers. Grace be with all them that love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. This is to concur with God." What a model of tenderness and earnestness in intercession for others we have in Abraham. Gen. xviii. 23-32. Nor can any circumstances of personal affliction or distress excuse us from praying for all God's saints as we learn from the example of David recorded here and elsewhere.

32. Whoever denies that the true people of God have solid, strong and enduring joys shows that he is ignorant of the whole matter of spiritual religion, v. 11. The most exultant anthems ever sung on this earth are the songs of God's people passing through the wilderness, the fire and the floods.

33. What a comfort the Scriptures are to all the children of God in sorrow. How this whole Psalm has been read and wept over and rejoiced in by the saints for nearly three thousand years, and shall be till time shall be no longer. The comfort of the Scriptures gives hope. Rom. xv. 4. Just as a man is taught and sanctified by the Spirit will such portions of truth rejoice his heart, and make him exult.

34. The whole Psalm shows that never in this life shall we get beyond the means of grace. Nor is it best we should. It is enough that we travel the road watered with the tears of the sweet singer of Israel, and use the means he used. Yea, more, David's Lord in the days of his flesh poured out strong cryings and tears to God. Let us follow Christ, and know the fellowship of his sufferings.

35. If our cause is good, let us not be uneasy about the issue. In courts of human judicature we may have a good cause, a good judge, a good jury, good counsel and good witnesses, and yet we may often fail. But he, who has a good cause in the court of heaven, shall not be cast. So the whole Psalm teaches.

36. This Psalm shows that in essentials true religion is the same in all ages. It has sorrows, but then it has joys; it has conflicts, but then it has victories; it has darkness, but then it has trust; it has foes, but it also has an infallible guide; it has perils, but it is surrounded with God's favor as with a shield.

37. The whole Psalm shows that salvation is of God. The righteous would soon fall by the malice and machinations of their foes, if they had to manage their own cause. But God holds them up, so that they fall not; he covers them, so that the enemy cannot get at them; he guides them, so that they miss not their way.

38. If this Psalm refers to Christ, of whom David was a type, then his victories are no less a source of joy to his people than were those of his servant David; nay, they are more so.

PSALM VI.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminith, A Psalm of David.

- 1 O LORD, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
- 2 Have mercy upon me, O LORD; for I am weak: O LORD, heal me; for my bones are vexed.
- 3 My soul is also sore vexed: but thou, O LORD, how long?
- 4 Return, O LORD, deliver my soul: oh save me for thy mercies' sake.
- 5 For in death there is no remembrance of thee: in the grave who shall give thee thanks?

6 I am weary with my groaning; all the night make I my bed to swim; I water my couch with my tears.

7 Mine eye is consumed because of grief; it waxeth old because of all mine enemies.

8 Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity; for the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping.

9 The LORD hath heard my supplication; the LORD will receive my prayer.

10 Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed: let them return and be ashamed suddenly.

THE reader is referred to the beginning of the Commentary on the third Psalm for remarks on the words, A Psalm of David, and to the fourth Psalm, whose title otherwise is precisely the same as we find here, except that in this Psalm we have the additional words upon Sheminith. This phrase is found in 1 Chron. xv. 21 where we are told of the appointment of certain singers to sound with harps on the Sheminith, "to excel." It is also found in the title of the twelfth Psalm precisely as it is here. Respecting the signification of Sheminith there exists considerable diversity. Fenwick renders it, On the unction, meaning the anointing of the Holy Spirit. But how this sense could be gotten from the word, Sheminith, or why any special unction should be claimed either for the words or the music of this song over others in the same collection does not appear. Bellarmine mentions an opinion, which he says is not to be slighted, viz.: that Sheminith points to the day of final judgment, which is to follow the six days of toil of this life and the seventh day of rest of souls, and then comes the eighth day, which is the end of the world. But the contents of the Psalm clearly show that the eternal judgment is not even once referred to unless it be very remotely, as in the preceding Psalm. Horsley renders it, upon the superabundance. But the difficulty is that it is only by some very remote and perhaps fanciful allusion that the idea of superabundance could in any way be connected with Sheminith. The literal rendering of upon Sheminith is upon the eighth. This is the marginal reading in the best editions of our English Bible wherever the word occurs. Some of the Jewish writers thought there was a reference to the eighth day, the day of circumcision. Gill says some ancient Christians referred it to the Lord's day, being the day after the seventh, or the Jewish Sabbath. Theodoret refers it to the eighth age, the millenium. But these three views are purely fanciful, receiving no support from the contents of the Psalm. Nor is there more support to the opinion that the eighth refers to a song of eight notes, to the tune of which this Psalm was sung. If for the eighth we read the octave, our minds instantly turn to something relating to music, and so this term seems to point to something pertaining to music in the public worship of God. Hengstenberg: "The correct explanation is given by those who take it for an indication of the tune." He cites no one as agreeing with him, nor does any one appear to take the same view as himself. Vatablus supposes it to be a tune in which the octave note prevails. Pool thinks Sheminith is "the shrillest or loftiest note;" while Gill cites some as thinking that it refers "to the eighth note, which was grave, and which we call the bass." Many others think it refers to an instrument, perhaps a harp of eight strings. This view is favored by the Chaldee, Jarchi, Kimchi, and Ben Melech; by Bellarmine, Waterland, Moller, Gill, Patrick, Morison, Cobbin, Fry, and Scott. Venema is in doubt whether it is an instrument of eight cords, or the lower octave tune that is designed; Calvin: "I do not know whether it would be correct to say it was a harp of eight strings. I am rather inclined to the opinion that it refers to the tune;" Alexander says Sheminith "corresponds exactly to our octave; but its precise application in the ancient music we have now no means of ascertaining." It may well be left to each one to form his own opinion in the case, and specially to commend care in rejecting the view maintained by the great mass of commentators, viz.: that a particular instrument is referred to. But no heresy is taught, nor spiritual truth rejected by holding any of the fore-cited explanations, though some of them are wild and unreasonable.

The authorship of this Psalm is properly ascribed to David. Of his having written it there is no cause of serious doubt. Seven of the Psalms have long been styled penitential. These are the 6th, 32d, 38th, 51st, 102d, 130th, and 143d. From this list some drop the 102d and insert the 25th. They have been called penitential not merely because they contain earnest supplications becoming sinners, but also confessions of sin and expressions of sorrow appropriate to a penitent. But the very same reasons would lead us to include at least three others under the same designation, viz.: the 25th, 69th, and 86th. Still there is no objection to calling this a penitential Psalm. But on what occasion it was written we cannot determine. There is a strong tendency in commentators to refer many of the sorrowful Psalms to David's penitence respecting the matter of Uriah. But David was a penitent before he incurred guilt in that affair. And both before and after that sad business his great trouble, as is that of every believer, was the plague of his own heart, the fountain of depravity within him. His whole life was a conflict with corruption. Paul had committed no recent outbreking sin when he uttered that exceedingly bitter cry, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" It was indwelling sin that distressed him.

Some have supposed that this Psalm has special reference to bodily disease, and for proof refer to vv. 2 and 5. Others think it has special reference to the terrible machinations and assaults of his enemies, and refer to vv. 7 and 10. Others suppose there is special reference to some spiritual troubles, vv. 3 and 4. The fact is that all these things may have borne him down at the same time. It has grown into a proverb that troubles never come alone. See how affliction brought on a sense of sin in Joseph's brethren. It is a great thing to learn to bow to the rod of correction in a temper becoming a sinner, who through grace has become a child of God. It is not probable that this Psalm was composed at the time of the affliction, but after it had passed away. Yet it doubtless contains the petitions offered during the anguish occasioned by the sore visitation. It also records the blessed issue of his troubles and his happy deliverance from them. In this Psalm the original of the word LORD is in each case Jehovah, on which see above on Ps. i. 2.

1. O LORD, *rebu*ke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. The variations in rendering this verse are slight. For hot displeasure, some have proposed to read wrath, indignation, glow or heat. But in each case the sense is the same. The two clauses express the same idea—"Fury untempered with grace and insupportable wrath." Each contains a petition, the purport of which has not been always agreed upon. Some suppose that David here implores the removal of his afflictions. Others with more reason regard him as asking that his afflictions may be the chastisements of a son, not the punishments of a cast-away. Such suppose this petition to be the same in substance as that of the weeping prophet: "O LORD, correct me, but with judgment; not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing," Jer. x. 24. The same idea is expressed in Jer. xlv. 28, "I will not make a full end of thee, but correct thee in measure; yet I will not leave thee wholly unpunished." This view therefore consists with the analogy of Scriptural teaching. Nor would a wise and good man under divine inspiration be ready to ask that he might be exempt from trial. But any man may without qualification humbly ask to be dealt with as a child, not as a rebel. Luther: "This he regards not, nay, he will readily suffer, that he be punished and chastened; but he begs that it might be done in mercy and goodness, not in anger and fury. . . Therefore the prophet teaches us here, that there are two rods of God, one of mercy and goodness, another of anger and fury;" Calvin gives this as the sense:

"O Lord, I confess that I deserve to be destroyed and brought to naught; but as I would be unable to endure the severity of thy wrath, deal not with me according to my deserts, but rather pardon my sins, by which I have provoked thine anger against me;" De Wette: "The sufferer prays not for a remission, but only for an alleviation of the calamity;" Patrick's paraphrase is: "O LORD, who delightest in mercy, moderate, I beseech thee, thy sharp correction; and do not proceed to inflict upon me the severest marks of thy displeasure;" Morison: "He does not deprecate the divine rebuke, for he remembers how awfully it had been provoked; but he entreats that Jehovah would not rebuke him in his anger, that he would not chasten him in his hot displeasure. He felt that a creature's weakness would not withstand the shock of incensed Omnipotence;" Henry: "He does not pray, Lord, rebuke me not; Lord, chasten me not; for, as many as God loves, he rebukes and chastens, as the father the son in whom he delights." This view is also taken by Venema, by Gill and, as Hengstenberg owns, by "most expositors." The wrath of God destroys, but his paternal love corrects, reclaims and saves. It is itself a mercy and he who receives it may well pray

2. Have mercy upon me, O LORD. How suitable to every condition in life is the cry for mercy. It is first an acknowledgment of the justice of all the evil that has befallen us. It is also a confession of our utter weakness and incapacity for relieving ourselves. It is next a confession of our faith in the power of God to give us succor if he will but undertake our cause. It is also a declaration that the divine compassions are so great that whatever our distress may be, we may safely rely on him. Such a prayer befits us, in health and in sickness, in life and in death. No more appropriate words ever fell from the lips of mortals. No man ever promotes his own comfort by denying the justice of the sufferings he is called to endure at the hand of God. Indeed a suspicion to the contrary will fill any mind with torture, and a conviction to the contrary will make any man outrageous. Listen to Cain: "My punishment is greater than I can bear." Listen to Quintilian on the death of his wife and children, especially the recent death of a promising son: "Who would not detest my insensibility, if I made any other use of my voice, than to vent complaints against the injustice of the gods, who made me survive all that was dearest to me? . . . There reigns a secret envy, jealous of our happiness, which pleases itself in nipping the bud of our hopes." Let sinners always feel and say that justice is against them, and that their hope for anything good is in the divine mercy. Let them continually admit that they deserve all sorts of afflictions, and if saved from them, it must be by the mere favor of God. Let them bring all their woes before him and cry for mercy, as did David, when he said, for I am weak. Hengstenberg reads, for I am faint, or withered; Morison: I am extremely weak, or I am languishing; Jebb: very weak am I; Alexander: drooping am I. David here complains of bodily distress, though it may have arisen from mental anguish. Calvin says: "David calls himself weak, not because he was sick, but because he was cast down and broken by what had now befallen him." There is a very mysterious connection between our souls and our bodies. No man in great anguish of mind ever felt well in body, although he might have done so in an hour, if his mind had been put quite at ease. Morison: "The weakness or debility, of which David complains, seems to attach more immediately to the soul, and to the soul as enervated and wasted in its spiritual strength by sin." The reason he assigns is not valid: "This appears from the circumstance that the divine mercy is appealed to for relief. Mercy has relation to guilt and unworthiness, rather than to mere bodily malady and distemper." But is not every blessing a mercy to sinners? Especially is not our continued existence a great mercy? Lam. iii. 22. Have we not all forfeited our lives? Several commentators seem at a loss on this clause; and all from not admitting that David's affliction was not one. He had enemies plotting against him; he had mental distress; he had bodily infirmity. All these at once pressed him hard. In this way every expression in the Psalm may be made clear, and even the commentators made generally to harmonize. The same remarks suit the next clause: O LORD, heal me, for my bones are vexed. For vexed Calvin reads are afraid; Hengstenberg: Are terrified; Fry and Alexander: Are shaken. Morison observes that by the bones Jewish expositors understand the body generally, but says, he can see no reason why the bones should not be spoken of literally. Calvin: "He attributes fear to his bones, not because they are endued with feeling, but because the vehemence of his grief was such that it affected his whole body. He does not speak of his flesh, which is the more tender and susceptible part of the corporeal system, but he mentions his bones, thereby intimating that the strongest parts of his frame were made to tremble for fear." The sense seems to be that his bodily distress was not slight, but deep, and incapable of being removed by any ordinary remedies. God alone could heal him. He therefore betook himself to the great physician. Luther: "Where the heart is troubled, the whole body is faint and broken." "A wounded spirit who can bear?" Alexander: "To regard the bodily distress as a mere figure for internal anguish would be wholly arbitrary and destructive of all sure interpretation. The physical effect here ascribed to moral causes is entirely natural and confirmed by all experience." This state of things was itself sad. But the sufferer adds:

3. My soul is also sore vexed. The Syriac and Hengstenberg read: And my soul is greatly terrified; most of the ancient versions and Morison: My soul is exceedingly troubled; Calvin: My soul is greatly afraid; Fry: My soul is shaken exceedingly; Alexander: My soul is greatly agitated. The verb rendered vexed in this place is the same rendered vexed in the preceding verse. There are no troubles like soul-troubles. Sin will mar anything. It will make any soul wretched. Morison: "It depresses its spiritual energies, quenches the ardors of devotion, darkens the prospect of faith and hope, produces slavish dread, creates an inaptitude to spiritual services and enjoyments, and acts, in all respects upon the mind of a believer, as fell disease does upon the body." Calvin very properly rejects the opinion, which here takes soul for life. It does not suit the scope of the passage. The soul of David was so distressed that time seemed long. This is very natural. Many have experienced this effect of pain, bodily and mental, in making the hours tedious. He cries out, But thou, O LORD, how long? The Chaldee: How long ere thou wilt refresh me? church of England: How long wilt thou punish me? Hengstenberg tells us that the words, O LORD, how long? were Calvin's motto, and that the most intense pain could not extort from him anything more expressive of desire for relief. They have been the words of many a great sufferer. The sentence is unfinished, but neither unmeaning nor unimpressive. The very ellipsis points to great distress, and is a piteous cry for relief. Dimock proposes to supply what is wanting thus: And how long wilt thou be angry, Jehovah? and refers to Ps. lxxix. 5 in support. But great grief is apt to utter broken sentences. Ejaculations are often abrupt and incomplete, yet nothing is more expressive. Highly finished periods do not beseeem those, who are sorely afflicted. The sentence may be filled up many ways, and give a good sense thus: How long before thou wilt have mercy? how long shall my bones and my soul be thus vexed? how long wilt thou permit me to suffer as I do? how long before I shall be rescued? An afflicted saint familiar with Scripture, does not care to have all words supplied. Morison: "David seems like an individual choked with grief, and feels himself incapable of completing the sentence he had begun." He thus paraphrases the words, O LORD, how long? "How long wilt thou continue to hide thy face, to afflict my spirit, to chastise my body, to deny me the refreshing tokens of thy love, to shut thine ears against my complaints, to leave me, the victim of grief, and the subject of torturing disease? How long, O Lord, shall this be the case? Shall not a day of mercy and deliverance at last dawn? Wilt thou not again look upon my pain, and forgive all my sins? Hast thou afflicted, and wilt thou not heal?" Calvin: "This elliptical form of expression serves to express more strongly the vehemence of grief, which not only holds the minds but also the tongues of men bound up, breaking and cutting short their speech in the middle of the sentence." Luther: "In all emotions of the heart, such as fear, love, hope, hatred, and the like, a state of suspense and delay is vexatious and difficult to be borne, as Solomon says in Prov. xiii. 12, 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick.' But in troubles of this kind, delay is the most severe and insupportable pain." At such a time what a privilege is prayer! What a mercy to be allowed to pour out our tears and complaints to God, and to cry,

4. Return, O LORD, deliver my soul. God's essential presence is everywhere. This encourages his people to pray to him, knowing that he can hear them. But his gracious presence is often wanting to his people. One of the most grievous afflictions is the absence of God. In this alarming strain he threatens his people: "I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early." Hos. v. 15. When God hides his face his people are troubled. His return is regarded as a great mercy. The Arabic reads, Be propitious, O Lord. "When the humble and penitent soul is made conscious of the divine withdrawment, nothing will satisfy it but a sense of God's returning smile." If he comes, he will bring salvation, and so David cries, deliver my soul. He not only prayed for his life, but for his soul. If that is lost, all is lost. If that is safe, other things are of slight importance. Our worst foes are the enemies of our souls. They are our sins, our tempters and our tormentors. To deliver from these is the work of God alone. Yea, it is his sovereign work. If moved to it, it cannot be by anything seen in the creature. In bestowing any favor God is self-moved. Therefore David says, Oh save me for thy mercies' sake. The ancient versions, with Calvin, Jebb, Gill, Horne, and Alexander follow the original and read mercy, not mercies. Fry reads, tenderness. The word here rendered mercy occurs more than two hundred times in the Hebrew Bible and is rendered favor, pity, kindness, mercy, goodness, loving-kindness, merciful-kindness. So that beyond all question we here have a confession that hope of deliverance for a sinner in any distress is found in the unmerited compassions of God. Luther's paraphrase is: "Not for mine own services, which indeed are nothing, as is sufficiently and more than sufficiently proved by this terror at thy anger, and my trembling bones, and the sadness of my heart and soul. Therefore help me for thy mercies' sake, that thine honor and the glory of thy compassion may be forever connected with my deliverance." God takes great pains to inform his people in all ages that all their hope is in his sovereign favor and rich grace, and that it is not the merit or the misery of mortals, that moves him to show them pity, or extend deliverance. Ezek. xxxvi. 22, 32; Eph. ii. 4-9. It is well when we have faith to draw arguments from God in favor of our petitions. God's mercy gets great honor when it extends great favors to great sinners. We may safely plead with God to do that which will be an honor to his attributes. In this verse David pleads for God's mercy's sake; in the next he urges an argument drawn from the silence of the grave.

5. For in death there is no remembrance of thee; in the grave who shall give thee thanks? John Rogers and the Bishops' Bible both render the first clause thus: "For in death no man remembreth thee;" in this they follow some of the ancient versions, which read, "In death there is no one remembering thee." The doctrine of this verse may be the same as that of Ps. xxx. 9; lxxxviii. 10; cxv. 17, 18; and

Isa. xxxviii. 18. This last reads, "The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee." Two senses have been given to this fifth verse. The first is that in this world true religion, in which God's honor is deeply involved, is kept alive by means of the testimony of his friends. God says to such, Ye are my witnesses. If the witnesses are dead, they can testify no more. One of the chief ways of honoring God on earth is by speaking his praise. "Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me." Ps. l. 23. The same doctrine is taught in Heb. xiii. 15. The voice of the dead is never heard any more on all the earth praising God. This is a good sense, consistent with other portions of revealed truth, and given by Calvin, Patrick, Gill, and Alexander. The other sense supposes that David had a fearful discovery of his sin and misery, and felt that if God pursued him in wrath he must soon drop into hell, being utterly consumed by divine terrors, bereft of hope, and left among those miserable outcasts, who on earth forget God, and who in the future world have no pleasure in ever remembering him. The death here spoken of then is the death of the soul—eternal death. If this view is correct, then we must read the last clause, as Jebb does, In hell who shall give thanks to thee? The original word here rendered grave occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures sixty-five times. Thirty-two times it is rendered grave, thirty times hell, and three times pit. Sometimes it cannot signify anything but hell as we now understand that word. See Ps. ix. 17. Strange to say, even the Doway Bible here reads hell. The church of England reads the pit. Henry's paraphrase is, "Lord, send me not to that dreadful place where there is no devout remembrance of thee, nor any thanks given to thee." Labored criticisms on the words used to designate the separate state of souls departed seem not to have been profitable, owing perhaps to the fact that too much of the material for them has been taken from the mythology of the heathen, or that they have been written to establish some preconceived theory. In the two clauses of this verse death and the grave are parallel, and the question of the second clause is in general import equivalent to the negation of the first. The word rendered give thanks is of frequent occurrence and is otherwise rendered praise, thank, confess. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, and Vulgate read confess. The foregoing interpretations are entirely consistent with each other. Both are admissible. If either of them is true, then this passage cannot be brought to prove that between death and the resurrection men's souls are unconscious. Such a view derives no countenance from Scripture, but is opposed to many of its clear teachings. Nor does this verse teach that death is an eternal sleep. We know that it is not. Old Testament believers knew it was not. Jude 14, 15; Ex. iii. 6; Matt. xxii. 32; Mark xii. 27; Luke xx. 38; 2 Sam. xii. 23. One thus exercised must be sorely troubled. No wonder he says:

6. I am weary with my groaning. The pains, the sins, the enemies of David had so long filled him with groanings that he was wearied with them. He knew the sharp pains of bodily disease, the sorest afflictions of life, the saddest disappointments and failures, terrible temptations, inherent and outbreking sins, the hidings of God's face, the pangs of deep conviction, and fears full of torment. He groaned till he was weary, and begged God to show him mercy. Was not this a case, in which divine mercy would be greatly honored by extending help before it became worse? All the night make I my bed to swim. Calvin: I soak my couch; Jebb: I wash every night my bed; Fry and Hengstenberg: Every night I make my bed to swim. Of course this language is exaggerated; but it is a lawful use of the hyperbole. He does not say in this clause how he made his bed to swim. It may have been in good part by those dreadful sweats, which break out on persons suffering from mental anguish while in bed whether awake or asleep. This is the view of Venema and Patrick. But the more common opinion is that his bed swam with the tears he shed. Every night is a better rendering than all the night. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Alexander, following the original, put the verb make in this clause and the verb water in the next in the future tense. Alexander thus connects the clauses: "I am weary in my groaning . . . and unless I am relieved, I shall (still as hitherto) make my bed swim every night, my couch with tears I shall dissolve, or make to flow." The meaning is that his grief will never cure itself, and that if God shall not interpose, his sorrows will utterly waste and exhaust him. Indeed they had already made sad work with him; for he says,

7. Mine eye is consumed because of grief. For consumed, some read withered, sunken, blasted, dimmed, become dull, fretted, worn away. Poëts have sung of the effects of grief on the eye.

His eye-balls in their hollow sockets sink.—DRYDEN.

Sunk was that eye
Of sovereignty; and on the emaciate cheek
Had penitence and anguish deeply drawn
Their furrows premature, etc.—SOUTHEY.

There is great force in that phrase, He wept his eyes out. For eye Morison reads countenance; John Rogers' Translation: My countenance is changed for very inward greife; Bishops' Bible: My beautie is gone for verie trouble; Genevan Translation: Mine eye is dimmed for despite. Hengstenberg thinks the word rendered eye never occurs in the sense of face. But in this is he not mistaken? In 2 Kings ix. 30, it is rendered face, and cannot mean the eye. And in Num. xi. 7, it is twice rendered color. And why may it not mean the same here? My color or complexion is consumed because of grief, etc., would give a good sense. For grief, Calvin, Hengstenberg and Alexander read vexation; Gill and many others, indignation. But whether it is his own indignation at the outrageous wrongs done him, or the indignation of God towards him for his sins is not agreed. The latter is the better sense. My beauty is wasted, my color is consumed by thy indignation, etc. He adds, respecting his eye, or countenance, It waxeth old because of all mine enemies. The marks of premature old age are often brought on by bodily disease, by mental distress, and by the vexatious behaviour of wicked men. Pain, or spiritual distress, or oppressive cares, will make their mark on the eye, on the whole countenance. In this case a premature old age showed that, unless mercy interposed, death would soon follow. Morison: "By his own inward griefs, the afflictions of his body, and the cruel persecutions of his enemies, he felt the encroachments of a premature old age; and beheld in the languid eye, and in the sunken cheek, and in the pallid countenance, the appearances of a dissolution rapidly approaching." But with the saints the darkest hour is just before day. Therefore in a very altered strain David begins the next verse.

8. Depart from me, all ye workers of iniquity. Iniquity the same as in Ps. v. 5; also, vanity as in Ps. x. 7; also, mischiefe as in Ps. lv. 10; also sorrow, in Ps. xc. 10. Fry here has vanity. Those who work iniquity, always work mischief, vanity and sorrow. He, who would avoid these, must shun that. And so David says to all who work iniquity, depart from me, thus declaring that he will not be of their company. This is the sense most naturally suggested by the words themselves. But the subsequent context shows the language to be that of defiance and triumph. He orders them off with all their menaces and taunts and disheartening speeches. He says, I will listen to you no longer; I will be distressed by you no more; you have tormented me long enough; I am myself again; take yourselves off; for the LORD hath heard the voice of my weeping. By what sign David knew that his prayer was heard we are not told. Some favorable change in the aspect of public affairs, some check to corruption, some succor from temptation, some sweet sense of God's love, some improvement in health, one or all of these may have united with an increase of faith to persuade him that the worst was over, and that deliverance was sure and near at hand. This Psalm may have been composed some time after the sore trials mentioned in preceding verses. If it was, then the clause under consideration may express David's gratitude after deliverance had been fully and openly secured to him. Yet he would on no account forget by whom he was saved. When prayer is answered and we are rescued, let us give God the glory. He often comes suddenly to the confusion of his enemies and the rescue of his chosen. Amyrald: "Those violent commotions, in which after the most bitter and dolorous lamentations and testimonies concerning human weakness, faith suddenly regains the ascendant, and through the offered hope of deliverance, sheds light and serenity over the mind, are very common in the Psalms." He might have added that they still abound in Christian experience. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. Mercies, obtained by weeping and prayer, are well suited to give courage. They are like armor won in battle and hung up as trophies to show what can be done.

The Lord can clear the darkest skies,
Can give us day for night,
Make drops of sacred sorrow rise,
To rivers of delight.

The voice of my weeping is the same as my loud weeping. There are many sorrows, which we cannot tell to men. There are others, which overwhelm us and strike us dumb. But it is well when God enables us to roll all our burdens over on him; and permits us to weep and plead before him. The voice of weeping was not confined to eastern saints. It is heard by God wherever his suffering people dwell. David insists that his deliverance was by God's gracious answer to his strong crying and tears, and so he says,

9. The LORD hath heard my supplication. This is but another form of repeating what he had said in the last clause. But the next expression has given rise to some difficulty. The LORD will receive my prayer. If the idea in the mind of the Psalmist was of the future, then it is the expression of a confident assurance, supported by past experience, that God will never refuse to hear his prayer. This would convey a proper and weighty idea, consistent with Scripture and with Christian experience. The future tense is preferred by our translators, and by Jebb and others, who follow the Hebrew. Alexander: "The combination of the past and future represents the acceptance as complete and final, as already begun and certain to continue." All the ancient versions and Calvin employ the past tense—hath received, thus making this clause re-affirm the substance of the two previous clauses. But Fry and Hengstenberg think it best to employ the present tense—receiveth or receives. Thus the Psalmist asserts that he is now receiving evidence of a gracious acceptance. Either rendering teaches truth, but the present tense is perhaps preferable to the past, and the future to the present. Because his prayer was heard, he says:

10. Let all mine enemies be ashamed and sore vexed. For sore vexed, Calvin reads greatly confounded; Hengstenberg: terrified; Fry: greatly terrified. There is the same variety in the rendering here as in some other cases. Our English version and some others use the imperative form of all the verbs in this verse, making the several clauses imprecatory. If read thus, see commentary on Ps. v. 10. Fry uses the present tense of the indicative mood, and reads, All mine enemies are confounded, etc. But the church of England, Gill, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer the future, making the whole a prediction, All mine enemies shall be ashamed, etc.

This reading is on all accounts to be preferred. Meantime we have here a strong confirmation of the fact that those parts of the Psalms, which look like asking God to send evil on one's enemies are but prophetic and infallible declarations that the evil will come. See Introduction, § 6. And so they shall return and be ashamed suddenly. Some of the older commentators as well as some more modern, instead of return read again, thus; they shall be again ashamed. But this is no improvement on the common version. The sense is, They shall return from their pursuit of David, and shall be ashamed suddenly. It is easy for God in a moment to put to confusion all our enemies. The overthrow of the wicked commonly takes them by surprise. No faithful warnings, no clear prophecies can prepare the minds of unbelievers for dreadful coming events. Hengstenberg thinks that the returning of the Lord in v. 4, and the returning (or flight) of the enemies in v. 10, stand related to each other as cause and effect.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. With believers when things get to the worst then they get better. To them darkness is the harbinger of light; grief, of gladness; humility, of exaltation; death, of life. The whole Psalm teaches thus.

2. Let men beware how they harden themselves in sin by pleading the falls of David. If they resemble him only in sinfulness, they will miserably perish. Unless like him they repent, they are undone forever. And this repentance must be speedy, for as Augustine says, "Though after this life repentance be perpetual, it is in vain."

3. It is better to weep now when God will hear than hereafter when mercy shall be clean gone forever. To us sinners sorrow must come. The wise prefer to mourn when mourning for sin shall be followed by peace and joy.

4. No small part of spiritual wisdom consists in knowing how to behave under severe and complicated trials. Some melt away under them and lose all heart and courage. This is one extreme, and very dangerous. Others harden the heart and act as if God was not chastising them. Hengstenberg: "That supposed greatness of soul which considers suffering as a plaything, upon which one should throw himself with manly courage, is not to be met with on the territory of Scripture; upon that everywhere appear faint, weak, and dissolving hearts, finding their strength and consolation only in God. This circumstance arises from more than one cause. 1. Suffering has quite another aspect to the members of God's church than to the world. While the latter regard it only as the effect of accident, which one should meet with manly courage, the pious man recognizes in every trial the visitation of an angry God, a chastisement for his sins. This is to him the real sting of the suffering, from which it derives its power to pierce into marrow and bone. 'Rightly to feel sin,' says Luther, 'is the torture of all tortures.' . . . To make light of tribulations is all one, in the reckoning of Scripture, with making light of God. 2. The tenderer the heart the deeper the pain. Living piety makes the heart soft and tender, and refines all its sensibilities, and, consequently, takes away the power of resistance, which the world possesses, from the roughness of its heart. Many sources of pain are opened up in the Christian, which are closed in the ungodly. Love is much more deeply wounded by hatred, than hatred itself; righteousness sees wickedness in quite a different light from what wickedness itself does; a soft heart has goods to lose which a hard one never possessed. 3. The pious man has a friend in heaven, and on that account has no reason to be violently overcome by his sorrow. He permits the floods of this quietly to pass over him, gives nature its free, spontaneous course, knowing well that beside the natural principle there is another also existing in him, which always unfolds its energy the more, the more that the former has its rights reserved to it—that according to the depths of the pain, is the height of the joy which is derived from God—that every one is consoled after the measure in which he has borne suffering—that the meat never comes but from the eater, and honey from the terrible. On the contrary, whosoever lives in the world without God, he perceives that for him all is lost when he is lost himself. He girds himself up, gnashes at his pain, does violence to nature, seeks thereby to divert himself, and to gain from nature on the one side what it abstracts from him on the other, and thus he succeeds in obtaining the mastery over his pain, so long as God pleases. 4. The pious man has no reason to prevent himself and others from seeing into his heart. His strength is in God, and so he can lay open his weakness. The ungodly, on the other hand, consider it as a reproach to look upon themselves in their weakness, and to be looked upon by others in it. Even when smarting with pain inwardly, he feigns freedom from it, so long as he can.”

5. How different is all this from the miserable shifts to which ungodly men are driven. In their extremity dreadful sullenness and remorse, alternate bluster and fainting, boasting and cowering mark their state. Shortly before his death, Byron said: “Shall I sue for mercy?” Pausing a considerable time, he made this desperate answer to his own question: “Come, come, no weakness; let’s be a man to the last.” That miserable pupil of Voltaire, the pedantic king Frederick II. of Prussia, had lived to feed his ambition, and after remarkable successes was compelled to say: “It is unhappy that all who suffer must flatly contradict Zeno, as there is none but will confess pain to be a great evil. It is noble to raise one’s self above the disagreeable accidents to which we are exposed, and a moderate stoicism is the only means of consolation for the unfortunate. But whenever the stone, the gout, or the bull of Phalaris mix in the scene, the frightful shrieks which escape from the sufferers, leave no doubt that pain is a real evil. . . . When a misfortune presses us, which merely affects our person, self-love makes a point of honor to withstand vigorously this misfortune: but the moment we suffer an injury which is forever irreparable, there is nothing left for us in Pandora’s box which can bring us consolation, besides, perhaps, for a man of my advanced years, the strong conviction that I must soon be with those who have gone before me, (i. e., in the land of nothingness.) The heart is conscious of a wound, the Stoic freely confesses; I should feel no pain, but I do feel it against my will, it consumes, it lacerates me; an internal feeling overcomes my strength, and extorts from me complaints and fruitless groans.”

6. This Psalm shows us what extreme and terrible sufferings of conscience may come upon a good man after sad departures from God. It is thought by some that the convictions and distresses of the real children of God, when aroused to a sense of their backsliding and guilt, far surpass the anguish of the same persons at the time of their first conversion. No doubt this is often so. Let the people of God flee from sin as from hell. It will bring the pains of hell into their consciences. Spiritual distress and spiritual conflicts are the worst trials on earth.

7. But whatever our afflictions may be, let us betake ourselves to God, v. 1. The child, that falls into the bosom of parental faithfulness, shortens the stroke and breaks the force of the rod, which is lifted in chastisement. Morison: “Whether we contemplate the maladies of the soul, or those of the body, we are equally compelled to turn to Jehovah as the great Physician.” The sooner we learn this lesson, the better for us. The very name, Jehovah, rightly understood must encourage all to pour their tale of sorrow into his ear.

8. In all our afflictions it is our duty promptly to inquire, Wherefore contendest thou with me? And it is always safe to take it for granted that a sufficient cause may be found in our corruptions and iniquities, v. 1. Calvin: “Those persons are very unsuitably exercised under their afflictions who do not immediately take a near and steady view of their sins, in order thereby to produce the conviction that they have deserved the wrath of God. And yet we see how thoughtless and insensible almost all men are on this subject; for while they cry out that they are afflicted and miserable, scarcely one among a hundred looks to the hand which strikes. From whatever quarter, therefore, our afflictions come, let us learn to turn our thoughts instantly to God, and to acknowledge him as the Judge who summons us as guilty before his tribunal, since we, of our own accord, do not anticipate his judgment."

9. Amazing is God's kindness in not punishing his people as they deserve, v. 1. This is their only hope. This is a sufficient hope. "Fear thou not, O Jacob my servant, saith the LORD: for I will make a full end of all the nations whither I have driven thee: but I will not make a full end of thee, but correct thee in measure; yet I will not leave thee wholly unpunished," Jer. xlv. 28. Jehovah will discriminate between saints and sinners. He will not punish them alike, Gen. xviii. 25.

10. If blessings are delayed, let us continue in prayer. It is never wise nor safe to cease calling on God, however sad our state. Dickson: "No delay of comfort, no sense of sin, no fear of God's utter displeasure can be a reason to the believer to cease from prayer, and dealing with God for grace: for the prophet is weary, but giveth not over."

11. Prayer and praise should go together, vv. 1-5. The Assembly's Annotations: "God having revealed, that the most acceptable service men can render him is to call on him in trouble, and after deliverance to glorify him, those holy men of old, being in danger of death, could fix on no better consideration than this of God's glory, by which to press the plea of their prayers for life and prosperity." All ten of the lepers were glad to be healed, yet but one returned to give glory to God. Many a man prays for recovery from sickness, and, when it comes, he returns no thanks.

12. The only hope of sinful men for any good thing is in the mere mercy of God, vv. 2, 4. Moller: "To the pious the grace of God is the only light of life. As soon as God gives any sign of his wrath, they not only grow pale, but are well nigh plunged into the darkness of death; but as soon as they behold him reconciled and propitious, their life is restored." Calvin: "Men will never find a remedy for their miseries until, forgetting their own merits, by trusting to which they only deceive themselves, they have learned to betake themselves to the free mercy of God." If men would always forsake their own righteousness, and look to Christ alone, all would be safe. Human merits can help none into heaven. And human demerits can shut out of heaven none who flee to Christ and take him for their righteousness.

13. How reasonable it is that we should pray and labor for that cheerfulness of mind, without which life is a burden, and devotion a source of distress. Calvin: "It is only the goodness of God sensibly experienced by us, which opens our mouth to celebrate his praise; and whenever, therefore, joy and gladness are taken away, praises also must cease."

14. He, who knows us better than we know ourselves, often sees fit to send on us severe bodily pain, that we may draw nigh to him, v. 2. It is a great secret to know how to be sick, and to profit by sickness. Dickson: "The LORD can make the strongest and most insensible parts of a man's body, sensible of his wrath, when he pleaseth to touch him; for here David's bones are vexed." Many a man's soul has been saved by the destruction of his body with wasting disease. Muis: "As often as we are visited with sickness, or any other suffering, we should, after the example of David, call our sins to remembrance, and flee to God's compassion: not like the ungodly, who derive their evil, as well as their good, everywhere else than from God, and hence are never led, either by the one to repentance, or by the other to gratitude.

Sickness or calamity is not to be estimated according to the mind of the flesh, but of the Spirit; and we must reflect that if God afflicts us, he deals towards us as sons, that he may chasten and improve us."

15. In all our distresses, bodily and mental, we should avoid a spirit of petulance and impatience. It is dreadful to be left to find fault with God, to charge him foolishly. Such a course provokes the Almighty, hardens the heart, and sooner or later gives great power to the conscience to torment us. We may cry: "O LORD, how long?" v. 3. Calvin: "God, in his compassion towards us, permits us to pray to him to succor us; but when we have freely complained of his long delay, that our prayers or sorrow, on this account, may not pass beyond bounds, we must submit our case entirely to his will, and not wish him to make greater haste than shall seem good to him."

16. What mighty motives to activity and fidelity in our Master's work are furnished in the brevity of our lives and in the silence of the tomb, v. 5. See Ecc. ix. 10; John ix. 4. It is said that as men grow old they become covetous. This may be so. But if we should find them covetous of time, instead of money, it would be a proof of advancing wisdom. Even Paul and Whitefield and Brainerd and Nevins are no longer allowed to say one word for God in this world. O ye ministers, preach away! O ye Christians, pray on!

17. The end of life is to glorify God, v. 5. If we fail here, we fail utterly. Let us honor him with all our faculties of body and mind.

18. After reading accounts of such sufferings as are described in this Psalm we ought not to make much ado over any light afflictions, which may come on us. If better men suffered more than we, and without a murmur, we ought to take heed lest we displease God by our complaints under any trials. There was true virtue in that saying of the church, "I will bear the indignation of the Lord," etc., Mic. vii. 9.

19. Dreadful must sin be in its very nature, when even in this life and on a pardoned man it produces such effects as are described in this Psalm. Moller: "Sorrow proceeding from a sense of the Divine wrath exceeds all others."

20. Very terrible sufferings on account of particular sins may come on even good men. It was so with David. It was so with Jacob. It was so with some of the early Christians. 1 Cor. xi. 30. God loves his people too well to let them wander on in sin, and drop into hell for the want of a little needful and wholesome severity. 1 Cor. xi. 32.

21. Nothing enables a good man to defy the malice and power of his enemies, like an assurance that his prayers are heard and answered, v. 8. God's grace and power are infinite. Faith in him will dispel any sadness. Dickson: "The Lord can shortly change the cheer of an humble suppliant, and raise a soul trembling for fear of wrath, to a triumphing over all sorts of adversaries, and over all temptations to sin arising from them." The presence of divine grace expels all foes, or disarms them of their dreaded power. The Berleberg Bible on the words, Depart from me, etc., says: "Depart from me ye false tormenting accusations, ye rage and fury of menacing spirits and powers, that terrify me to death, and have shut up my blessed life as in the abyss of hell; ye are the real evil-doers, whom my external foes merely represent."

22. If God hears our prayers once, it should encourage us to hope that he will hear us again, v. 9.

23. How highly we should prize the privilege of communion with God. It is our life and our joy. Morison: "Those, who have once known the unspeakable enjoyment of communion with a reconciled God, cannot long endure the sensible withdrawal of divine mercy. They have breathed an element out of which they cannot long exist; they have stood with their Redeemer on the mount of transfiguration, and they are ready to exclaim, 'Lord, it is good to be here.' Nor must it be forgotten that the divine return to any backsliding soul is its true deliverance. As the rising sun scatters the darkness of night, so when God returns to his people, in smiling mercy, he scatters the dark forebodings of unbelief, and liberates their souls from the bondage of sin."

24. If sin has such power to bring anguish in this world, what will it not do hereafter, when it shall be finished? Jas. i. 15; Luke xxiii. 31; Jer. xii. 5.

25. It is right and profitable often to say that our deliverances are from God, and when our prayers are answered, to celebrate God's mercies. David twice or thrice tells how God had heard him, vv. 8, 9.

26. Is there wanted in our day anything so much as a fervent spirit of prayer? Morison: "Where are those mighty meltings of heart which took place in days of old, when our forefathers were deprived of liberty, and sought shelter 'in the mountains, and caves, and dens of the earth?' It may be said, indeed, that this is the age of action; but how worthless and unacceptable will that action be which is not fostered and urged on by 'the spirit of grace and supplications?'"

27. As what is promised to one believer is also promised to all, so that which is denounced against one enemy of God, is alike denounced against all of like character. The result of the conflict between David and his foes is a sample of what shall fall out in every like case. Let the righteous rejoice. Let sinners tremble.

28. Let us never fall into the error of the wicked, who have long and always delighted in deriding the suffering people of God, and especially in making light of their pious grief for sin. Dickson: "The insulting of enemies over the godly when the Lord's hand is heavy upon them, because it reflecteth upon religion and upon God's glory, is a main ingredient in the sorrow of the godly," v. 7. There is a great difference between "encouraging the exercise of a salutary repentance," and provoking feelings of "unmitigated despair."

29. How apt God is to punish in kind. David's enemies pursued him till he was sore vexed. In the end they were sore vexed themselves, vv. 3, 10. Compare Judges i. 5-8; 2 Sam. xxii. 27; Ps. xviii. 26; cix. 17, 18; Matt. v. 7; Jas. ii. 13.

30. All is well that ends well. Horne: "Many of the mournful Psalms end in this [triumphant] manner, to instruct the believer, that he is continually to look forward, and solace himself with beholding that day, when his warfare shall be accomplished; when sin and sorrow shall be no more; when sudden and everlasting confusion shall cover the enemies of righteousness; when the sackcloth of the penitent shall be exchanged for a robe of glory, and every tear become a sparkling gem in his crown: when to sighs and groans shall succeed the songs of heaven, set to angelic harps, and faith shall be resolved into the vision of the Almighty."

PSALM VII.

Shiggaion of David, which he sang unto the LORD, concerning the words of Cush the Benjamite.

1 O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust: save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me:

2 Lest he tear my soul like a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is none to deliver.

3 O LORD my God, if I have done this; if there be iniquity in my hands;

4 If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me; (yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy;)

5 Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah.

6 Arise, O LORD, in thine anger, lift up thyself because of the rage of mine enemies: and awake for me to the judgment that thou hast commanded.

7 So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about: for their sakes therefore return thou on high.

8 The LORD shall judge the people: judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness, and according to mine integrity that is in me.

9 Oh let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end; but establish the just: for the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins.

10 My defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart.

11 God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

12. If he turn not, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready.

13 He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death; he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors.

14 Behold, he travaileth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood.

15 He made a pit, and digged it, and is fallen into the ditch which he made.

16 His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate.

17 I will praise the LORD according to his righteousness: and will sing praise to the name of the LORD most high.

THE title of this Psalm has occasioned considerable difficulty. The word Shiggaion occurs nowhere else, though the plural form of it, Shigionoth, is found in the first verse of the third chapter of Habakkuk. Any signification given to the word in one place ought to suit the other, unless some cause for a difference can be shown. The word from which Shiggaion is derived is often found in the Bible; and any sense not fairly drawn from it must be very doubtful in its application here. On these and like grounds it is safe to reject the following renderings; plaintive song, by the Arabic; elegiac, by Cobbin; care, by Cocceius; ignorance, by Bellarmine; innocence, by Luther; interpretation, by the Chaldee; psalm, by the Septuagint; song, by the Syriac; delight, joy and pleasure, by some of the Rabbies. Nor is there any evidence that Shiggaion was the first word of a song, the tune of which was to be used in singing this Psalm. No such song is produced. There seems to be no doubt that it is the name of a song; for it is said David sang it. This may mean either that he composed it, or that he recited it to some tune. Shiggaion means a wandering. Four explanations are offered. One is that this composition was to be sung to a wandering tune, i. e. a tune full of variations of tone, time and style of execution. The second is, that this is a Psalm of various metre. The third is, that David was singing of his own wandering, but whether it refers to his uncertain dwelling in the wilderness, or to some error, or moral wandering, is not agreed. The fourth is that David is singing of the wanderings, or errors of others in their treatment of him. Hengstenberg favors this fourth view. But this explanation does not suit the word in Habakkuk. Neither does the third. Calvin, Venema and Scott embrace the first view, and not without cause, though Calvin with characteristic good sense adds, "I do not contend about a matter of so small importance."

The next inquiry is, Who is meant by Cush? The eldest son of Ham bore that name; but the difficulty arises from the fact that no such person is spoken of in history as cotemporary with David. Some have thought that by Cush was meant Hushai, who dissuaded Absalom from following the counsel of Ahithophel. 2 Sam. xvii. 5-15. This view was maintained by Athanasius. The objections to it are that Hushai and Cush are quite different words, not only in our translation but also in the Hebrew; and that there is no evidence that Hushai was a Benjamite. He is called the Archite, and Archi was a city of Manasseh beyond Jordan. Besides, Hushai spoke no calumny against David, as Cush seems clearly to have done, v. 3. Others have supposed that by Cush was meant Shimei, who was indeed a Benjamite, and reviled David. But the words Cush and Shimei are wholly dissimilar; and there is no reason for supposing that Shimei ever bore the proper name of Cush. Others take Cush to be Saul himself. He was indeed a Benjamite, and he was the son of Cis, or Kish; but he was not Cis himself. Those, who maintain this view derive some countenance from the Chaldee, which thus renders this title: "The interpretation of an ode of David, which he sang before the Lord, when he delivered a poem upon the death of Saul, the Son of Cis, who was of the tribe of Benjamin." Those who hold that the word Cush signifies an Ethiopian should not forget that Cush designates Ethiopia, and Cushi, an Ethiopian. Hengstenberg says, some "Consider the name Cush as symbolical, and suppose David to have applied the epithet to his enemy on account of his dark malice, as being too inveterate to admit of a change for the better." He refers to "almost all the Jewish expositors" in confirmation of his views. He also cites Luther, who reads Moor for Cush, and who says; "He calls him Moor, on account of his unabashed wickedness, as one incapable of anything good or righteous. Just as we commonly call a lying and wicked fellow black. Hence the language of the poet:

He is black, O Roman; be thou ware of him.—Horace.

As we also call him fair, who deals with people in an honest and upright manner,—who has a heart that is free of envy. Therefore it is said, David has entirely left out his proper name, and given him a name in accordance with his perverse heart and ways." Hengstenberg favors this view, and cites Jer. xiii. 23 and Amos ix. 7, and says that as Saul was the son of Kish, David plays upon the name of his father. Venema cites the same line from Horace, and the same passages in the prophets as appropriate, if the word Cush is to be taken figuratively. Cocceius understands by Cush, "Saul, who as an Ethiopian changes not his skin, so was he impenitent, stubborn and malicious." Others have taken substantially the same views. Perhaps, however, most men will feel little satisfied with such an explanation. Calvin: "The opinion of some that Saul is here spoken of under a fictitious name is not supported by any argument of sufficient weight. . . In my opinion he here expresses by his proper name, and without a figure, a wicked accuser, who had excited hatred against him by falsely charging him with some crime." This view is every way natural, and is embraced by Patrick. In Acts xx. 35, Paul quotes words spoken by Christ though not recorded by any evangelist. And Paul in 2 Tim. iii. 8, gives us the cognomen of two celebrated magicians of Egypt, whose names are not found in any part of the Old Testament. A large part of David's life was spent in turmoil. He may have had hundreds and thousands of mischievous and bitter foes, whose names are not given even once in any part of Scripture. We should expect as much. Inspiration gives but a short sketch of the sayings and doings of the antitype of David, Jesus Christ. John xxi. 25. It takes but an hour or two to read everything written in Bible history respecting David. When this Psalm was written and first sung, Cush and his slanders may have been well known to devout and intelligent Israelites. For reasons similar to those mentioned in commenting on preceding Psalms it is supposed that this Psalm was not actually written, though its leading thoughts may have come up, at the time when David was sore pressed by his enemies. Before he closes, he raises the song of victory and thanksgiving. Some, however, have supposed that he did this because by faith he anticipated complete deliverance. The names of the Creator found in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God, El God, and Gel-yohn Most High. On the first three see above on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4. On the last see below on v. 17. David is unquestionably the author of this Psalm, but at what time he wrote it, we know not. Some have fixed the date at the year B. C. 1058.

1. O LORD my God, in thee do I put my trust. This is the first instance in the Psalms where David addresses the Almighty by the united names Jehovah and my God. No more suitable words can be placed at the beginning of any act of prayer or praise. These names show the ground of the confidence afterwards expressed. They "denote at once supreme reverence and the most endearing confidence. They convey a recognition of God's infinite perfections, and of his covenanted and gracious relations." Fry renders the first clause, I have taken shelter in thee; Jebb: In thee do I seek refuge. Our translators hardly ever vary in rendering this verb trust. Once they give, hath hope, Pr. xiv. 32; once make my refuge, Ps. lvii. 1. The marginal readings more frequently vary. Calvin and Hengstenberg use the present tense. But the ancient versions follow the original, and use the past tense, I have trusted, or I have hoped. Alexander gives the full force when he reads, "I have trusted, and do still trust;" that is, David here describes a continuous act. Calvin: "David does not boast of a confidence which he constantly entertained in his afflictions. And this is a genuine and undoubted proof of our faith, when, being visited with adversity, we yet persevere in cherishing and exercising hope in God. From this passage we also learn that the gate of mercy is shut against our prayers, if the key of faith do not open it for us. Nor does he use superfluous language when he calls Jehovah his own God; for by setting this as a bulwark before him, he beats back the waves of temptations, that they may not overwhelm his faith." Nothing is more certain than the all-sufficiency of God. Nothing has greater power than that. Nothing is more sure than its sustaining energy to every one who relies on God alone. He may with boldness say: Save me from all them that persecute me, and deliver me. Persecutors have various methods of wearing out the saints. Sometimes they try flames, and wild beasts, and racks, and gibbets, and the sword, and dungeons. Again they employ expatriation, confiscation of goods, civil disabilities. But a universal weapon against the friends of truth is the tongue. By scorn, by railing, by mocking, by misrepresentation, by slander the people of God are wronged, distressed, cast down. Horne: "To a tender and ingenuous spirit the 'persecution' of the tongue is worse than that of the sword, and with more difficulty submitted to; as indeed a good name is more precious than bodily life. Believers in every age have been persecuted in this way; and the king of saints often mentions it as one of the bitterest ingredients in his cup of sorrows. Faith and prayer are the arms with which this formidable temptation must be encountered, and may be overcome." Slanders are often uttered in order to afford a pretext for violent measures against men's persons and lives. For this cause charges of conspiracy against the government are often falsely made, as against Nehemiah, Jeremiah, Christ and Paul, and here against David. But God can save and deliver; and if we rely on him, he will surely do it, although our enemies may be very numerous, as David's were, for he speaks of all his persecutors. Sometimes a multitude of enemies assail us at once, but they are led on by one man, who has power and malice, which make him very dangerous to us. This seems to have been the case here, for next we read:

2. Lest he tear my soul like a lion, rending it in pieces, while there is none to deliver. The Arabic reads, Lest they take away my soul, but this is unsupported by any text or authority. This verse more than any other seems to point to Saul in the plenitude of his royal power as the most formidable enemy David had. For "the king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion;" and "the fear of a king is as the roaring of a lion;" Pr. xix. 12; xx. 2. But even "the king's heart is in the hands of the Lord;" and he can turn it as easily as the gardener turns the rivulets of water in the little channels made for the purposes of irrigation, Pr. xxi. 1. How easily God can do this, even in the case of Saul, we see in 1 Sam. xxiii. 27, 28. But it is not certain that Saul is here pointed out: There may have been some other powerful adversary, whose name is not given us. Or Cush himself may have been the terrible as well as the slanderous foe. But Hengstenberg thinks that the one person mentioned in this verse is a personification, represented by Saul. If so, the idea is not materially varied. The image of a terrible wild beast tearing a lamb or a sheep in pieces had been familiar to David from his boyhood. 1 Sam. xvii. 34-36. Indeed the figure was natural and just. See also 2 Tim. iv. 17. It is also used by Peter (1 Epis. v. 8,) in reference to the great adversary of our souls. To tear the soul, is to destroy the life and kill the person of a man. From the enemies of his people there is no pledge of deliverance, but in God only. He can give succor. Henry: "It is the glory of God to help the helpless."

3. O LORD my God, if I have done this [which is alleged against me—if I have conspired against the life of the king—or been guilty as charged;] if there be iniquity in my hands in the affair as charged by Cush, so that my enemies have just cause for their hostility to me. [This verse and the next find their application in v. 5.]

4. If I have rewarded evil unto him that was at peace with me. Alexander: If I have repaid my friend evil; Fry: If I have made returns of evil; Castalio: If I have returned evil for evil; Waterland: If I have repaid evil to him, who dealt ill with me; Dimock gives a similar rendering; Patrick: If I have injured him when he was kind to me; Edwards: If I have done evil to my friend. The import of the passage is that of a solemn protestation that he had not been guilty of base ingratitude in the case charged by Cush, whatever it may have been. He adds, (Yea, I have delivered him that without cause is mine enemy.) This is the more literal, but not the more common rendering. None of the ancient translations put this in parenthesis, nor does any other now at hand except our common English version and the Psalter of the church of England. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Vulgate: Let me deservedly fall empty before mine enemies, thus making this the beginning of the woe invoked in case of guilt. The objection is that the original will not bear out such a rendering. The Chaldee: If I have afflicted those who have in vain brought me into straits. The sense is good and pertinent, but where was it found? The Syriac: If I have oppressed my enemies without cause; Fry: If I have spoiled those that without cause are mine adversaries; Hammond and Hengstenberg also prefer spoiled. Waterland uses despoiled. But I find not that the verb is ever in this form elsewhere in our version rendered spoiled. Calvin: If I have not delivered, etc. But he admits that the word not has to be supplied. The simplest mode of meeting the difficulty is that adopted in our English version. Then the verb has the rendering given it everywhere else in this form, i. e., deliver; no negative is required; the sense is good; and the Psalmist declares his benevolence to those who were without cause hostile to him. Good for evil has always been the doctrine of good men. Certainly it was with David. Twice he had Saul completely in his power, first, at En-gedi, then in the trench, but he would not hurt a hair of his head, nor suffer any one else to injure him. Doubtless he would treat any other foe with true Scriptural benevolence. 1 Sam. xxiv. xxvi. The sense then is, If I am the guilty man they say I am, yea, if I am not benevolent even to my worst foes, then

5. Let the enemy persecute my soul, and take it; yea, let him tread down my life upon the earth, and lay mine honour in the dust. Selah. See remarks on Selah in the Introduction, § 15. The import of the whole seems to be this: If Cush can make good his accusations, then let the worst come on me, that my enemies desire—let the enemy take my life—cut short my existence—and lay mine honor in the dust. The word here rendered honor is the same, that in Psalms xxx. 12, lvii. 8, cxviii. 1 is rendered glory, and in those cases clearly means the tongue. If this is the meaning here, then he says, Let my tongue lie silent in death. This is very pertinent and apposite. But the word is often and properly rendered honor as in Num. xxiv. 11; 1 Kings iii. 13; 1 Chron. xxix. 12, 28; Ps. lxvi. 2; cxii. 9. So that David as much as says, let infamy cover me and let my memory rot if I am the man I am said to be. This is an extension of the woes mentioned in the preceding clauses. By honor Hengstenberg after Muis and others understand the soul, the noblest part of man's nature. But he does not make the matter clear. He is probably wrong. He does not even notice the difficulties of such an exposition. When circumstances demand it, and the truth is on our side, we may in the most solemn manner protest our innocence, 2 Cor. i. 23; Phil. i. 8. Yea, we may properly declare ourselves ready to undergo punishment, if it can be shown that we deserve it, Acts xxv. 11. Such forms of asseveration should be kept for solemn and weighty occasions. A serious assault upon our characters is always felt by good men to be an overwhelming calamity if we cannot be rescued by legitimate means of defence. For persecute and take Jebb reads pursue and overtake, and he says these words keep up the image of a wild beast introduced in v. 2. What a bulwark the upright find in conscious integrity. What boldness it gives David in prayer. Therefore he says,

6. Arise, O LORD, in thine anger. Our cause does not speed well merely because it is in the main just, but when the righteous Lord, who loveth righteousness, undertakes it for us. To him we must come in humility at all times. Against him we have sinned grievously, and should he make use of our enemies to scourge us, at his hands we deserve it all. The Berleberg Bible shows the relation between this and the preceding verses thus: "But, because my conscience acquits me of such things, and testifies that I am innocent in that respect, therefore I seek thy protection, and call upon thy righteousness, which is wont to defend the guiltless." There is considerable variety in rendering the next clause of this verse. Our version reads: Lift up thyself because of the rage of mine enemies; the Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Be thou exalted in the borders of mine enemies; Chaldee: Lift up [thyself] in fury upon my oppressors; Arabic: Lift up thyself upon the necks of mine enemies; Syriac, nearly the same; Calvin: Lift up thyself against the rage of mine enemies. It is generally agreed that the contrast is between the anger of God and the rage of David's foes. Fry changes the pointing and reads the first two clauses thus: Arise, Jehovah: in thine indignation lift up thyself against the raging of mine adversaries. This effectually brings the anger of God to oppose the wrath of man. Calvin and Hengstenberg put the very shortest pause between anger and lift up; but Hengstenberg reads with, not against. Alexander reads in or amidst. If the anger of God is invoked to oppose the rage of David's enemies, against gives the sense as well as any other word. Calvin: "David here sets the anger of God in apposition to the rage of his enemies; and when we are in similar circumstances we should act in the same manner. When the ungodly are inflamed against us, and cast forth their rage and fury to destroy us, we ought humbly to beseech God to be inflamed also on his side; in other words, to show in truth that he has no less zeal and power to preserve us, than they have inclination to destroy us." The next clause reads: And awake for me to the judgment that thou hast commanded. For commanded Calvin and Street read ordained. This, however, does not materially vary the sense. The judgment here referred to is not the final decision of men's destinies in the last day, but that vindication of David, which he had a right to expect from him, who had called him to be king over Israel, from him whose nature was wholly righteous.

The Judge of all the earth will do right. On that point there can be no doubt. Though for awhile he may keep still as one that sleepeth, yet in due time he will awake, and do the work of retribution. And when God should do that work then says David,

7. So shall the congregation of the people compass thee about: for their sakes, therefore, return thou on high. Allowing that David refers to Saul, Scott's comment on this and the preceding verse is very judicious: "David was assured that the Lord intended to cut off Saul. This was the 'judgment which he had commanded,' and for which David prayed, not only on his own account, but for the sake of the people. Saul's tyranny and neglect of his duty as king of Israel had crushed and scattered the Israelites: and his persecution and impiety had driven them from the ordinances and worship of God, and seduced them into many crimes. The Psalmist therefore prayed that the righteous Judge would ascend his exalted tribunal, exert his omnipotent authority, and by some visible interposition check the progress of impiety, and give encouragement to his servants; that they might be again collected in his courts, and unite in his holy worship." Some extend the scope of this verse beyond the Israelites, and read peoples or nations for people, and the Hebrew word is plural. No doubt the ill effects of Saul's administration were felt in surrounding nations, as were afterwards the happy effects of the reigns of David and of Solomon. But the word rendered congregation here is the same that is so rendered in Ps. i. 5; lxxiv. 2, and very often elsewhere. It generally refers to the people of Israel, and so seems to restrict the sense to the application given by Scott, although it is sometimes applied to other assemblies. Of those, who extend the term so as to include Gentile nations, Calvin takes the clearest and most concise view: "Lord, when thou shalt have put me in a peaceable possession of the kingdom, this will not only be a benefit conferred on me personally, but it will be a lesson common to many nations, teaching them to acknowledge thy just judgment, so that they shall turn their eyes to thy judgment-seat." The call on God to return on high is a petition that he would as Judge of the earth resume the seat, out of which by a bold figure he is now said to be for a season. Kimchi: "When God seems to take no notice of the transgressions of men, it is as if he descended from the place of his power, and from his judgment-seat; but when he visits and judges their iniquities, he seems to elevate himself on high, or to return to his judgment-seat." The words rendered for their sakes are by Calvin, who here follows some old versions, rendered on account of this, i. e. the benefit of the divine judgment to many nations. Horsley, Fry and Hengstenberg read over it, and Alexander above it, i. e. the congregation. The passage is confessedly difficult. A careful consideration of what has been offered has not afforded satisfactory evidence that our translation can be improved. It agrees with Luther and Jebb. Often a solemn procession was formed and marched around the temple or the altar. This is distinctly alluded to in Ps. xxvi. 6. To compass about God or his altar was therefore to offer solemn religious worship. The worshippers also gathered around the altar. David was confident his prayer should be answered and so he says:

8. The LORD shall judge the people. Fry and others, following the original, render the last word plural, nations, i. e., all nations. The assertion is that God is Judge of all the earth, and shall assuredly prove this to be so. Of this David had a full persuasion. Calvin properly remarks that the verb SHALL JUDGE in the future denotes here a continued act. As God thus determines controversies between the righteous and the wicked, David asks that his case may be now taken up and tried: Judge me, O LORD, according to my righteousness, and according to mine integrity that is in me. God is not oppressed with the care and judgment of the nations. To ask him to execute judgment in a given case is to beseech him to do what he is always doing on a much larger scale. He who governs the world can surely govern one man. He who judges all nations will not despise the case of one sufferer. He who does the greater will surely do the less. The appeal to his own innocence is confined to the matter respecting which David had been slandered. It has nothing to do with his standing in the sight of God as a sinful man. Before God none more earnestly cried for mercy: "Enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." Ps. cxliii. 2.

9. Oh let the wickedness of the wicked come to an end. For wickedness Calvin reads malice and Alexander badness. There never was a regenerate man that did not heartily offer that prayer. There never was a renewed soul that was not sorely grieved by the wickedness of his times. Hypocrites may make an idle lament over the degeneracy of their age, but God's real people enter into such grief with heart-felt sincerity. Some men spend all their sighs about the wickedness of others, forgetting their own sins. But the child of God hates and laments all sin, because it dishonors God. His own sins dreadfully distress him. So do the transgressions of others. When wickedness is rampant the righteous fear and tremble and utter strong cries against it. The best English Bibles use Oh in this case, not as an exclamation, like O, but optative. This is the precise idea of the original. The word wicked is plural. A pious man laments not merely those sinful acts which personally annoy him and his friends; he deplores all sin and would have it cease everywhere. There is no reason for rendering the clause, Let the wickedness of the wicked consume them, as some have suggested. David also prays, but establish the just [man.] Some of the old versions read, Direct the just. The word may be so rendered, but establish is a more common and in most cases a better rendering. God establishes the just man in part by properly directing him. The singular being used here probably shows the special reference to David, yet the truth asserted is universal. And God can be at no loss to tell who is the just and who are the wicked; for the righteous God trieth the hearts and reins. Among the Hebrews the kidneys (or reins) no less than the heart were often spoken of as the seat of pain and pleasure, joy and grief, knowledge and thought. So to cover all the theories in the popular mind, all the words that would aid in conveying an idea of God's omniscience are employed. We have a like reference to popular belief respecting the constitution of man in 1 Thess. v. 23. In such cases there is no sanction of popular theories. The Bible teaches not philosophy. The import of the clause is that God knows all the thoughts, motives, secrets, uprightness or wickedness of men, and so can easily mete out justice to every soul. Fry renders it, And let the righteous God try the hearts and reins; Hengstenberg: And the trier of the heart and reins art thou, O righteous God. This last makes the address direct to God throughout. But in the Psalms there is manifested a remarkable facility in changing from the second to the third person. The doctrine taught by each of these modes of translation is the same. To such a God David gladly appeals.

10. My defence is of God, which saveth the upright in heart. The word rendered defence here is in Ps. iii. 3, and in a dozen other places in the Psalms rendered shield, sometimes buckler, and sometimes defence. For in God some read with God, or upon God; but our version gives the sense. If our cause is good, then the divine rectitude is a comfort to us, for a righteous God hates iniquity. Yea, he saves, delivers, gives the victory to the upright in heart. The word rendered upright is in our translation of the Psalms uniformly rendered upright or right. In other parts of Scripture it is once rendered just, Pr. xxix. 10, and sometimes righteous, Num. xxiii. 10; Job xxiii. 7; Pr. ii. 7; iii. 32. It is several times rendered straight, Jer. xxxi. 9; Ezek. i. 7, 23. Alexander regards straight-forward or sincere as synonymous. The heart of a regenerate man is the best part about him. He is not deceitful. He intends and aims to do better than he does. And so,

11. God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day. The words ELOHIM and EL are both found in this verse. See on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4. There is no good ground for the rendering of the Septuagint and some other old versions, God is a Judge just, strong, and long-suffering, nor for the interrogative form of the last clause in the Vulgate, Is he angry every day? John Rogers' translation is, God is a righteous Judge, and God is ever threatenynge, and Ainsworth reads, God angrily threateneth every day. Though the words with the wicked are not in the Hebrew, yet the contrast is between the righteous and the wicked, and the wicked are surely here spoken of. Because the wicked are always wicked and because God is always holy, therefore his relation to them is ever one of opposition, of threatening, of anger. No holy creature could delight in a God who was not displeased with wickedness. Every day is equivalent to all the time, unceasingly. Charnock: "Uninterruptedly in the nature of his anger, though not in the effect of it." It is true that sentence against an evil work is not always executed speedily; but God's purpose is inflexible, and there is never a day when one blessed with spiritual discernment may not see infallible tokens of God's anger, at least against such forms of wickedness as are atrocious and notorious. But delay is not connivance. That the word wicked is properly supplied here is evident from the next verse:

12. If he turn not, he will whet his sword. The word here rendered turn is also found in Ps. xxii. 27. All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD; and in Ps. li. 13, Sinners shall be converted unto thee. The doctrine of conversion is no new doctrine. Because the wicked is wicked, he must turn or perish. He is a wise man who counts the long-suffering of God salvation. God commonly gives space for repentance, but then he limiteth a day. To whet his sword is to make ready to execute vengeance. The sword was the weapon used in beheading or slaying. The figure is an old one, Deut. xxxii. 41. If God shall punish, his inflictions will be terrible. Moreover, he hath bent his bow. The bow often used in war was the cross-bow, which was bent by putting the foot on the middle and then pulling the string, and so the word rendered bent is literally trodden on. See Deut. i. 36; Josh. xiv. 9; Isa. lxiii. 3. This is an image like the last taken from the habits of warriors. The work of destroying the wicked will not require any special preparation. Every sinner on earth is continually ready to drop into hell. Hengstenberg: "It is a remarkable instance of Divine foresight, but such as often occurs in history, that in the death of Saul the bow and the sword both actually had their share. Saul was hit by the archers, and sore pressed, so that he despaired of his life. 'Then said he to his armor-bearer, Draw thy sword, and thrust me through therewith, lest these uncircumcised come and thrust me through, and abuse me: but his armor-bearer would not; for he was sore afraid. Therefore Saul took a sword, and fell upon it.'" 1 Sam. xxxi. 3, 4.

13. He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death. The first pronoun He refers to God, who as a man of war was about to meet his foes. The second pronoun Him has perplexed commentators. Calvin reads it, meaning the bow; God hath prepared for it [his bow] the instruments of death. Fry thinks the meaning is that God has prepared for himself—for his own use—the instruments of death. But Alexander reads, At him [the wicked enemy] he has aimed, or directed, the instruments of death. Fry in this case is to be preferred to Calvin. Either Fry or Alexander gives the full sense; though the latter is the more ingenious. If his view is correct then as he says, "This is still another step in advance. The weapons are not only ready for him, but aimed at him." And so he ordaineth his arrows against the persecutors. For persecutors some would read burning or hot ones, supposing that persecutors burn with wrath and envy. The word does not occur often, but pursue or persecute is not an unusual rendering. It occurs but once more in the Psalms (x. 2) and is there rendered persecute. But some following the Arabic and Syriac join the word to arrows. Hengstenberg reads, He makes his arrows burning, and Alexander, His arrows to (be) burning he will make: thus referring to the fiery darts or arrows thrown into beleaguered cities. Fry also reads swift arrows, but says in a note that it may be, "flaming arrows." Waterland reads, He will make his arrows to pursue. Perhaps most minds will rest satisfied with our English version. The sense given by it seems to have been more generally accepted than any other.

Morison: "The figure, which represents Jehovah as having bent his bow and made it ready, is awfully descriptive of the exposed situation of every sinner until he returns to the Shepherd and Bishop of souls. The whole system of nature and providence is ready, at the bidding of the Almighty to inflict the blow that shall hurl him to perdition. The archer of divine vengeance stands, as it were, with bended bow, and the next arrow that he discharges may pierce, with everlasting anguish, the soul that now glides on securely in the career of thoughtlessness and crime."

Bates: "This description of God's righteous displeasure is more powerful to shoot through the conscience of hardened sinners than the bare threatening that justice will surely punish them."

Luther, speaking of the bold figure of verses 12 and 13, says, "The prophet takes a lesson from a coarse human similitude, in order that he might inspire terror into the ungodly. For he speaks against stupid and hardened people, who would not apprehend the reality of a divine judgment, of which he had just spoken; but they might possibly be brought to consider this by greater earnestness on the part of man. Now the prophet is not satisfied with thinking of the sword, but he adds thereto the bow; even this does not satisfy him, but he describes how it is already stretched, and aim is taken, and the arrows are applied to it, as here follows. So hard, stiff-necked, and unabashed are the ungodly, that however many threatenings may be urged against them, they will still remain unmoved. But in these words he forcibly describes how God's anger presses hard upon the ungodly, though they will never understand this until they actually experience it. It is also to be remarked here, that we have had so frightful a threatening and indignation against the ungodly in no Psalm before this; neither has the Spirit of God attacked them with so many words. Then in the following verses, he also recounts their plans and purposes, shows how these shall not be in vain, but shall return again upon their own head. So that it clearly and manifestly appears to all those who suffer wrong and reproach, as a matter of consolation that God hates such revilers and slanderers above all other characters."

14. Behold, he travaileth with iniquity. The pains taken by wicked men to do evil are often worthy of a better cause. They sleep not except they do some mischief. They toil hard in the service of a cruel master. They travail. This is true of every man, that fears not God. It is specially true of every persecutor. He hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood. Alexander gives all the verbs of this verse in the future and says, "The meaning seems to be that while bringing his malignant schemes to maturity, he will unconsciously conceive and bring forth ruin to himself." A parallel passage is found in Job xv. 35. Luther renders it, Behold, he has evil in his heart, with misfortune he is pregnant, but he will bring forth a failure; Fry: Behold he is in travail with iniquity; but though mischief is conceived, disappointment is brought forth. The church of England, following the Septuagint and Vulgate, renders it, He travaileth with mischief; he hath conceived sorrow and brought forth ungodliness; Hengstenberg: Behold, he travails with mischief, and is big with misery, and brings forth falsehood. The wicked shall find all their plans frustrated, and all their hopes disappointed. What a miserable show both Saul and Absalom made at the winding up of their plots against David. So doubtless did Cush if he was a third person. The sinner here spoken of was restless and busy, and so

15. He made a pit, and digged it, i. e., he made a pit by digging it. Pits are made to catch wild beasts or thieves or enemies, who prowl about. They are dug so deep that either man or beast falling into them cannot leap out. The mouth of the pit is covered over with boughs of trees, or straw so that it is not perceived. Cush and those who favored his views pursued David like a wild beast; they used open assault; they hunted him; they at length resorted to artifice. But all was in vain. They fell into their own pit. Sternhold and Hopkins have given a version of this and the next verse, which has attracted attention.

He digs a ditch and delves it deep,
In hope to hurt his brother;
But he shall fall into the pit
That he digged up for other.
Thus wrong returneth to the hurt
Of him in whom it bred;
And all the mischief that he wrought,
Shall fall upon his head.

Speaking of the burning fury of the ungodly, as here represented, Luther says, "So active and diligent are they to have the pit dug, and the hole prepared. They try everything, they explore everything, and not satisfied that they have dug a pit, they clear it out and make it deep, as deep as they possibly can, that they may destroy and subvert the innocent." And is fallen into the ditch which he made. Hengstenberg renders it the pit which he makes. He says: "We must not expound: into the pit which he has made. The wicked man is still occupied with the pit, still working at it, when he falls into it. The punishment overtakes him in the midst of his guilty career."

The teaching of the 14th and 15th verses is repeated in the 16th. His mischief shall return upon his own head. For mischief, Calvin reads wickedness; church of England, travail. The original word often occurs in the Hebrew Bible. In our English version it is but once rendered wickedness, Job iv. 8, and once perverseness, Num. xxiii. 21. It is also rendered pain, travail, trouble, sorrow, misery, grievance, grievousness; more commonly, mischief and labor. But does not Hengstenberg use too sweeping language when he says this word always denotes the evil one suffers, not that which one inflicts? See Num. xxiii. 21; Job iv. 8; xv. 35; Ps. xciv. 20; cxi. 9; Pr. xxiv. 2. This return of mischief will be dreadful. It will come with crushing force. And his violent dealing shall come down upon his own pate. The word rendered violent dealing is never so translated elsewhere. Very generally, it is given simply as violence, sometimes cruelty, damage, wrong, injustice. The meaning is that the whole final effects of the measures taken against David were felt by his enemies, as a righteous retribution. For pate, Calvin's translator reads crown. The sense is the same. The result of the whole is,

17. I will praise the LORD according to his righteousness: and will sing praise to the name of the LORD most high. Hengstenberg: "The righteousness and the praise shall correspond." God's righteousness is boundless, so shall be his honors. The truly devout do not willingly limit their praises of the LORD. This is the first place in the Psalms where we find Jehovah called the Most High. We first meet with the word thus rendered in Gen. xiv. 18. It occurs several times in the Pentateuch, and often in later books. It is found more than twenty times in the Psalms. God is the Most High in his glorious elevation of nature, of counsel, and of government. There is none like him. There is none with him. There is none beside him. He is not only in all and through all; but he is above all and over all God blessed forever.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is right to turn every event of life into an occasion of devotion. What could be less suited directly to arouse pious emotions than the sayings and doings of Cush? Yet thereupon David falls to praying and singing in a way to comfort himself and animate the church in all coming ages.

2. In devotion it is well to use the various Scriptural names and titles of God, vv. 1, 3, 11, 17. They are all suited to strengthen our faith. We ought not, however, to use them as mere expletives, nor with such frequency as shows a want of reverence.

3. Moller: "Even under the most grievous calumnies, by means of which men seek to destroy our good name and life itself, we should retain that choice moderation and equanimity, exemplified by David and by other saints."

4. It is a great blessing to have so much faith as to be able sincerely to say, My God, v. 1. He who can thus plead, virtually declares as Henry says, "Thou art my God, and, therefore, whither else should I go but to thee? Thou art my God, and therefore my shield; (Gen. xv. 1) my God, and therefore I am one of thy servants, who may expect to be protected;" Calvin: "This is a genuine and undoubted proof of our faith, when, being visited with adversity, we, notwithstanding, persevere in cherishing and exercising hope in God. . . The gate of mercy is shut against our prayers if the key of faith do not open it for us;" Morison: "In darkest seasons faith looks upon God as a sure refuge and defence, as ever near to God's afflicted servants in the hour of their greatest extremity."

5. Persecution is no novelty, v. 1. It began with Cain. It was taken up by evil men in subsequent ages, including Cush, and Pilate and thousands of others. The church of Rome binds all her bishops by oath to persecute as they have power. Persecution will last, while the wicked rage and are permitted to show their malice. All persecutors are so far alike that they hate holiness in God and man, especially in man, because they see it.

6. Salvation and deliverance from the least, as from the greatest enemies is to be sought and expected from God only, v. 1.

7. The opposition of carnal men to truth and piety is fierce, cruel and deadly, v. 2. Aroused, they are like wild beasts. Dickson: "If God do not interpose himself, for defence of his unjustly slandered servants, there is nothing to be expected from wicked enemies enraged, but merciless beastly cruelty."

8. No human power could have saved the church from utter extinction long since, vv. 1, 2. Moller: "The perils of the church are more and greater than can be comprehended in any statement. Like Daniel, she dwells among lions. Always and everywhere the roaring lion and ravening wolves lie in wait for the pious. But calling on God brings us to a safe refuge;" Morison: "Satan is an accuser, an adversary, a liar and the father of lies, the old serpent, the prince of the power of the air, the God of this world, the prince of darkness, the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience, and none can withstand him effectually, but in the armor of God, on the right hand and on the left." But our Saviour is Almighty. That settles the question.

9. It is every way right that we should submit ourselves to the government of God, as the righteous Judge of all the earth, vv. 3-5.

10. Humility does not require of us to acknowledge the truth of false charges brought against us. What humility demands is a judgment of ourselves, not below the truth, nor above it, but according to it, vv. 3-5.

11. Moller: "Against wicked rumors we ought to be content to oppose the single judgment of God." Some controversies will not be settled till the last day.

12. Conscious innocence is a wonderful shield, vv. 3-5. The righteous is as bold as a lion. For uprightness there is no substitute. This is our brazen wall, as one of the poets calls it. This is the fountain of delight to all the saints. "Our rejoicing is this, the testimony of our conscience;" 2 Cor. i. 12. Dickson: "Though innocence cannot exempt a man from being unjustly slandered, yet it will furnish him with a good conscience, and much boldness in the particular before God."

13. The doctrine of doing good for evil and of loving enemies is as old as true piety. It was practised by David. Dickson: "The more a man doth render good for evil, the more confidence shall he have when he cometh to God; for innocence served David for this good use, that he delivered Saul, who without cause was his enemy;" v. 4. Horne: "Happy he, who can reflect that he has been a benefactor to his persecutors;" Calvin: "When any one not only does not retaliate injuries received, but strives to overcome evil with good, he exhibits a genuine specimen of heaven-born virtue, thus demonstrating that he is one of the sons of God, for such a gentleness proceeds only from the spirit of adoption;" Luther: "Let this also be remarked that David here manifests an evangelical degree of righteousness. For to recompense evil with evil, the flesh and old Adam think to be right and proper. But it was forbidden even in the law of Moses, as evil was to be inflicted only by the magistrate, consequently not of one's own malice and authority." That the law of Sinai required good will and good for evil, we know from the sermon on the mount, Matt. v. 43-48, and from these sayings; "Love is the fulfilling of the law;" and "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor." That David practised on this principle is admitted by Saul himself: "If a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away? Wherefore the Lord reward thee good for that thou hast done unto me this day." 1 Sam. xxiv. 19.

14. Good men are not mistaken in putting honor above life, v. 5. Death was in David's esteem an evil, but the laying of one's honor in the dust was greater. Blessed be God's name, though he sometimes calls for life, he never requires us to sacrifice honor. It is a doctrine of the deceiver that the greatest calamity is the loss of natural life. Job ii. 4. We may easily love life too much. Our integrity cannot be preserved too carefully; our lives may.

15. The rage of the wicked shall surely be checked. If thoughts of God's mercy will not stop them, a sense of his wrath shall overwhelm them, v. 6. If the wicked can kindle dreadful fires, God can kindle hotter and greater burnings. If the wicked can send heavy woes and curses, God can send heavier. Dickson: "When our enemies are desperately malicious, and nothing can mitigate their fury; let the consideration of God's justice mitigate our passion: for he will arise in anger against them."

16. It is a blessed thing when we know that our prayers concur with the divine plan. This made David earnest, v. 6. This aroused Daniel, chap. ix. 1-27. This is the soul of prayer. For "this is the confidence that we have in him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us." 1 John v. 14. Let us chiefly pray for those things God commands us to ask for. In other things, let us always confess that we know not what is best, and ask God to choose for us.

17. Before God's judgment comes it may seem long; but when it shall have come, saint and sinner shall say that it lingered not, v. 6.

18. God's dealings with the wicked are useful. "The Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth." Ps. ix. 16. "When thy judgments are in the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." Is. xxvi. 9. Bad as the world is, it would be unspeakably worse, were it not that God holds it in check by the severity of his dealings with some, whom he sets up as beacons; yea, by the checks he gives to all.

19. We may plead with God for his church's sake, v. 7. See also Isa. lxiii. 17. This does not imply that there is merit in the church. Merit is in Christ alone. But God loves Zion, and therefore we may ask him to do that, which will advance the cause he has set his heart upon.

20. We may therefore plead with God not to yield his government, nor even to seem to do so, v. 8. The world is most at peace when good laws human and divine are uniformly enforced.

21. Though in a given contest with man we may be wholly innocent, and may so say before heaven and earth, vv. 3, 4, 5, 8; yet we must be careful not to plead that as before God we are without sin, or even that we are not heinous sinners.

22. We may rest assured that wickedness will be finally and utterly overthrown. God has said it. His people desire it, v. 9. Charnock: "God may be reconciled to the sinner, not to the sin."

23. The stability of the saint is as great as the instability of the sinner, v. 9. Whatever makes for one of these makes for the other also.

24. Let us often dwell on the divine omniscience, v. 9. If the fact that God tries the heart and reins is no comfort to us, it must be because we do not understand it, or love it as we should. The vilified and slandered of earth have been able to comfort themselves with this truth. "The clouds of calumny which have settled over the pious, have compelled them the oftener to submit their hearts and reins to the examination of the all-seeing eye."

25. As all the graces of the Christian are allied, so all the duties of religion are helpful to each other. Meditation helps prayer, vv. 9, 10.

26. It is on the common truths of religion we must chiefly rely to stir us up, and support us, vv. 9-11. That which is recondite is seldom of much service. Men are not saved by metaphysics, nor by truths hard to be understood by the docile, but by simple and plain truths.

27. Those, who are not upright in heart, sincere in their love, honest with God and man, have no right to expect to be heard and saved, v. 10. Scott: "We cannot stand before him (who tries the heart and reins) even according to his new covenant of mercy, 'without simplicity and godly sincerity,' and conscientious integrity in our habitual conduct."

28. Let not the wicked think that God's forbearance is connivance at sin, v. 11. God is really and terribly angry with the wicked all the time. Henry: "As his mercies are new every morning toward his people, so his anger is new every morning against the wicked."

29. The doctrine of a change of heart and life is inwoven into all the Scriptures, v. 12. Repentance or perdition, conversion or ruin are the alternatives presented in God's word. No wonder Christ expressed surprise that a Nicodemus should be ignorant of this doctrine. It is taught in all the Old Testament.

30. When God shall choose, he can easily destroy his foes. His weapons and instruments are all ready, vv. 12, 13.

31. God's wrath against persecutors burns with dreadful intensity. Scott: "Persecutors must expect his severest vengeance. . . The persecuted servants of God will be celebrating his praises, and rejoicing in his favor, while their persecutors are cast into the pit of destruction, and enduring the wrath of their righteous Judge, and all their subtle projects will concur in bringing about this final event." Henry: "Of all sinners, persecutors are set up as the fairest marks of divine wrath; against them more than any other God has ordained his arrows. They set God at defiance, but cannot set themselves out of the reach of his judgments." Morison: "It is both our wisdom and our safety to leave all our persecutors and slanderers in the hands of our Almighty deliverer. He can 'restrain their wrath, and make the remainder thereof to praise him.' Or he can change their cruel purpose, and awaken in their bosoms feelings of gentleness and benevolence."

32. The very misery of the wicked should convince them of their sin and folly. They have travail, but the result is vanity. They project, and the result is failure. Nothing satisfies. All the time the stones, which the wicked are throwing into the air, are falling on themselves. Saul was killed by the Philistines whom he wished to employ to kill David. "And the Jews, who excited the Romans to crucify Christ, were awfully destroyed by the Romans, and numbers of them crucified." Henry: "The sinner takes a great deal of pains to ruin himself, more pains to damn his soul than, if directed aright, would save it." If the wicked were not blind, they would see all this. Even here their bad passions, counsels and lies hurt them more than others, vv. 15, 16. Luther: This is the incomprehensible nature of the divine judgment, that God catches the wicked with their own plots and counsels and leads them into the destruction, which they had themselves devised." If these things are so in this life, where nothing is finished, what may we not expect in the next?

33. In the darkest hours it is well to praise God, v. 17. Job did so. So did Paul and Silas in the jail at Philippi. If we are God's servants, we can always praise God for what he is, for what he has done for others, for much that he has done for us, for what we expect him to do for us. We should often give thanks for anticipated victories. We should praise him for our keenest afflictions. Aristotle tells us of a bird that sings sweetly, yet always lives among thorns.

34. After a deliverance not to give hearty thanks is monstrous. Good manners require us to praise our Deliverer. Chrysostom: "Let us praise the Lord perpetually; let us never cease to give thanks in all things, both by our words, and by our deeds. For this is our sacrifice; this is our oblation; this is the best liturgy, or divine service; resembling the angelical manner of living. If we continue thus singing hymns to him, we shall finish this life inoffensively, and enjoy those good things also which are to come."

35. Many verses of this Psalm show that the truths of religion, which are often the least dwelt on are the most useful. God's perfections and government are a great study. Let us often recur to them and other foundation truths.

36. Dickson: "The fruit of faith joined with a good conscience is access to God in prayer, confidence, peace and tranquility of mind, mitigation of trouble, protection and deliverance, as the prophet's experience here doth prove."

37. The old, the safe, the only way to the kingdom of heaven is through much tribulation.

38. Scott: "Let us under all our trials look unto the Saviour. He alone was perfect in righteousness, yet none was ever reviled, slandered, and hated as he was. He lived and died doing good to his enemies, and praying for them." We never err in looking to Jesus for example, or precept, or strength, or wisdom, or righteousness.

PSALM VIII.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm of David.

1 O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens.

2 Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.

3 When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;

4 What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?

5 For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor.

6 Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet:

7 All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field;

8 The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.

9 O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

IT requires no lengthened argument to prove that David is the author of this Psalm. The title says it is his. The only occasion of doubt on the subject has been found in Heb. ii. 6, where Paul, quoting a part of the Psalm, mentions not David, but simply says, "One in a certain place testifies." But surely this cannot create any rational doubt. Similar modes of quotation are common, because natural.

There is no special importance attached to the inquiry, at what period of his life David wrote this Psalm. It does not appear that in it he celebrates any particular event in his own history.

Upon the words, To the chief musician, see on the title of Ps. iv. The word Gittith, has occasioned considerable discussion. Some regard this Psalm as one of triumph, sung to God, the author of a great victory obtained over some haughty enemy, as Goliath of Gath, or the Gittite. This view is taken by Hammond and Patrick. It is also favored by Edwards.

This method of explaining Gittith seems to be effectually set aside by its recurrence in the titles of Psalms lxxx. and lxxxiv., where neither of these modes of solution would be at all admissible. Neither of these last-named Psalms can possibly be supposed to have any reference to Goliath, the Gittite.

The word Gath in Hebrew signifies a wine-press. See Jud. vi. 11; Lam. i. 15; Joel iii. 13. In the plural we have in Neh. xiii. 15, Gittoth, very nearly the same as Gittith. From this some have supposed that this was a song to be sung "concerning the wine-presses." This view is taken by Theodoret, Ainsworth, Horsley, and Clarke. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate: For the wine-presses; Doway: For the presses; but it has a note stating Gittith is supposed to be a musical instrument. Bellarmine says he cannot doubt that the Hebrew word should be the same as is found in Neh. xiii. 15. But he is the blind follower of the Septuagint and Vulgate. He also says, it is hard to divine what is designed. Others, who favor the rendering of the Septuagint, suppose that the reference is to a style of music, common at the vintage. But all these views will probably appear to most readers as strained.

Others think that Gittith means an instrument from Gath. Mudge says, it is "in all probability the Gath-instrument, as we say the Cremona fiddle, the German Flute; Alexander: "As David once resided in Gath, and had afterwards much intercourse with the inhabitants, the word may naturally here denote an instrument there invented or in use, or an air or style of performance, borrowed from that city;" Calvin: "Whether Gittith signifies a musical instrument or some particular tune, or the beginning of some famous and well-known song, I do not take upon me to determine. . . Of these three opinions, it is not of much importance which is adopted;" Venema thinks that Gittith clearly points to the air or melody to be used in singing this Psalm; The Chaldee: "A Psalm of David to be sung upon the harp that came from Gath;" Hengstenberg thinks it should be rendered, Upon the harp of Gath, or in the Gathic style; Rivet says it is uncertain what Gittith signifies; Fry says, that on this point, "nothing is known for certain. The most probable conjecture refers it to the tune or music;" Scott: "Gittith is perhaps the name of some tune, which David had learned when in Gath, or from the Gittites, and to which this and two other Psalms were set." Sebastian Schmidt, having noticed some of the most plausible of the foregoing opinions, says that he had rather give no account of the matter than one so full of uncertainty. Piscator says the point is of little moment. The other opinions respecting Gittith are probably not deserving of consideration. At least one of the other Psalms upon Gittith was composed by Asaph; so that whatever is meant thereby was not confined to David. Hengstenberg: "It is worthy of remark, that all the three Psalms distinguished by this name are of a joyful, thanksgiving character." Yet an examination of them shows that this remark needs some qualification.

There is not an agreement among commentators whether this Psalm is to be interpreted by reference to any historical event. Mudge says "it is evident enough from v. 2, that it was occasioned by some particular incident; either a remarkable deliverance from wild beasts, or something of that kind, perhaps granted to a child." Edwards agrees with Mudge in the general opinion, but suggests the victory over Goliath as the event celebrated, "or some other surprising conquest effected by very weak forces, whom the Psalmist may, in a poetical manner, call babes and sucklings." Patrick paraphrases it throughout as a celebration of the victory gained over Goliath by David. Hengstenberg thinks this Psalm "needs no historical exposition and bears none." It is a great error to suppose that every devotional composition in the Scriptures had its origin in some stirring incident. Perhaps we commonly err in attempting by conjecture to fix on some event in history, as the key of the interpretation of any Psalm.

Scott fixes the date of this Psalm at 1050 B. C.

In the Hebrew the first word of the first and of the eighth verses is Jehovah.

Although this Psalm is thrice quoted in the New Testament (Matt. xxi. 16; Heb. ii. 6-9; 1 Cor. xv. 27); yet there has been more than usual diversity in the views taken of its scope and design. Without noticing all the opinions presented on this subject, it is safe and proper to say that the obvious sense of the words grammatically construed must give us the primary meaning, and then that any authorized or sober use of a secondary import may properly be received.

Hengstenberg says the theme of this Psalm is, "The greatness of God in the greatness of man." Elsewhere he speaks of this Psalm as a devotional composition on the first chapter of Genesis. This is probably the correct view of the primary sense of the words. But the Syriac scholiast says, "The eighth Psalm is concerning Christ our Redeemer;" Luther says, "This is a prophecy concerning Christ—concerning his passion, his resurrection, and his dominion over all creatures;" Rivet also says, "It is certain that here the Psalmist had respect to the Messiah, who was to come." So uniformly has the more pious and sober part of the Christian world regarded this as a highly Messianic Psalm that an assertion to the contrary rather shocks the godly than awakens their doubts. These suggestions concerning the purport of the Psalm have led many to take the ground, that both the foregoing views are correct, the one primary, the other secondary, the one literal, the other typical. Pool would apply it to man in general and to the man Christ Jesus in particular, to God's glory as manifested in creation and providence, but especially in redemption. He says the Psalmist first admires the excellent glory of God in heaven and earth, but most of all sings the love of God, by which he hath so wondrously exalted vile man. He adds that without doubt this Psalm is a prophecy respecting Christ. Alexander: "We have here a description of the dignity of human nature, as it was at first, and as it is to be restored in Christ, to whom the descriptive terms may be applied, without forced or fanciful accommodation on the one hand, and without denying the primary generic import of the composition on the other;" Morison: "While we may here be reminded of the first Adam and his posterity, and of the eminent rank and dominion of man over all the creatures of God upon this terrestrial globe; we shall yet, in a more striking manner, be reminded of Him, who, as 'the second Adam, the Lord from heaven,' has been placed, in glorious majesty, at the head of that new creation, which, consisting of redeemed and sanctified men, shall reflect the lustre of his matchless beauty and excellence through all eternity." Many others present substantially the same views.

The Psalm opens with an outburst of strong emotion, showing that the mind was already full of matter. The apparent abruptness of the beginning is quite in keeping with the genius of true poetry and true devotion.

Venema favors the opinion that this Psalm was composed at night, when David was watching the flock, notes the fact that the sun is not here mentioned among the heavenly bodies, and adds that the contemplation of the heavens under these circumstances was well suited to stir up such meditations. Hengstenberg rejects this view, but does not give very strong reasons. The probability is that the Psalm was an evening meditation, not composed during David's pastoral life, but afterwards. Yet the thoughts naturally suggested by gazing at the heavens during his early life were doubtless familiar to him, when he actually wrote this song.

1. O LORD our Lord. John Rogers' Translation, the Bishops' Bible and the church of England read, O LORD our governor. The Septuagint renders both these names of God by the word which in the New Testament is always rendered Lord. The latter word Lord is derived from a verb, which would justify us in rendering it as above, governor, judge, supporter. The Chaldee renders it preceptor. In our English version it is almost invariably rendered Lord. O Jehovah, our Ruler, How excellent is thy name in all the earth! For excellent some would read glorious, as the Syriac; admirable, as the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Arabic; adorable, as Fry; wonderful, as Calvin. Others suggest great, illustrious, magnificent, renowned, powerful. Our English Bible renders it elsewhere sometimes excellent, Ps. xvi. 3, lxxvi. 4; glorious, Is. xxxiii. 21; famous, Ps. cxxxvi. 18; Ezek. xxxii. 18; mighty, Zech. xi. 2; applied to ships, gallant, Is. xxxiii. 21; to flocks, principal, Jer. xxv. 34, 36; applied to men, noble, Jud. v. 13; goodly, Ezek. xvii. 8; worthy, Nah. ii. 5.

The name of God is that by which he is known. "Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name," Ps. cxxxviii. 2, i. e., above all whereby thou hast made thyself known. Alexander regards manifested excellence as synonymous with name in this case; Calvin: "The name of God is here to be understood of the knowledge of the character and perfections of God, in so far as he makes himself known to us." The form of announcing this glory of God is a clear confession of weakness and ignorance in man. In contemplating the Divine glory often the most and the best we can do is to cry out, How excellent! how wonderful! It is a mark of a wise man to know the limits of human knowledge, and of a devout man to adore where he cannot further inquire. Some ignorance is better than some knowledge. Paul was wiser in saying, O the depth of the riches, etc., Rom. xi. 33, than if he had claimed to know all about it. So here David gives us his idea by telling us that his theme is above any words he can command. There is some diversity in rendering the rest of the verse. Our translation is, who hast set thy glory above the heavens. Fry: Thy glory that is set forth above the heavens; Edwards: Thou who settest thy majesty above the heavens; Calvin: To set thy glory above the heavens! The French translation quoted by Anderson: Because thou hast set, etc.; and the marginal reading of the same is, Who hast set, or even to set; Hengstenberg: Who hast crowned the heavens with thy majesty. The old versions show a like diversity. The Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate read, For thy magificence is elevated above the heavens; Syriac after magificence adds the words [of thy splendor;] Arabic: That thou shouldest give thy name above the heavens. The Chaldee is very nearly if not quite the same with our common version. The foregoing variations are not material improvements on the English version. The word glory is elsewhere rendered beauty, comeliness, more frequently majesty, honor, yet oftener glory. Our translation doubtless gives the sense. Hengstenberg's rendering is perhaps the next best. The Jews spoke of three heavens; first the atmosphere, and so we read of the fowls of heaven; secondly the starry heavens, see Ps. xix. 1; and the heaven of heavens, or the third heavens, where God peculiarly manifests himself. Neither one nor all of these can contain him. His glory is above them all; and yet his glory is on them all. The starry heavens are covered with the proofs of his majesty. So great is God's glory in this respect that the young and feeble-minded find themselves absorbed in contemplations on these works of God.

2. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger. In every generation God has received and shall receive great honors from children, youth and simple-minded people, in their admiration of his works and in their wonderful questions and observations respecting his nature and works. Ofttimes the excellency of a principle is shown in its application to new and unexpected cases. Jesus Christ quoted this verse to show that praise to God proceeding from the lips of the young and the simple was no new thing, that if they wondered and praised God for the glories spread abroad in the heavens, they might very reasonably be expected to be moved to speak his honors when he should be filling the land with his miracles of love and with his words of grace and truth, Matt. xxi. 14-16. Our Saviour delighted to dwell on such truths as this, that the kingdom of heaven was open to the little ones, to babes, Matt. xi. 25, 26; Luke x. 21; xviii. 17. Instead of ordained strength the Septuagint version reads perfected praise, and Christ quotes this paraphrase rather than the literal original. This shows that it is lawful to make a free use of a version, even if it be not perfect, as indeed no work of uninspired man can be. Although the word rendered strength occurs more than ninety times in the Hebrew Scriptures, yet in our English Bible it is nowhere rendered praise. Except in Ecc. viii. 1, where it is rendered boldness, it is invariably translated, might, power, strength, or turned into the adjective corresponding to these words. So obviously is this rendering correct that even the church of England, which very much follows the Septuagint, departs from it here and reads ordained strength. The word rendered ordained is commonly translated founded. Some would read constituted, appointed, or decreed. Appointed gives the sense. Some have tried to show that it was merely in babes as works created by God that he got praise. But this makes no provision for the phrase out of the mouths. It may relieve some minds to state that Hebrew mothers seem to have nursed their children much longer than is now customary in Europe or America. Hengstenberg says they suckled their children till the third year. Hannah did not wean her son till he was old enough to appear before the LORD and to abide in the temple and to worship the LORD there, though it is still said of him, he was young, 1 Sam. i. 22, 24, 28. The enemies of the truth have a wretched cause, when it can be shaken and subverted by the mouths of babes and sucklings. Hengstenberg: "God obtains the victory over his rebellious subjects, by means of children, in so far as it is through their conscious or unconscious praise of his glory, as that is manifested in the splendor of creation, especially of the starry firmament, that he puts to shame the hardihood of the deniers of his being or his perfections." Even Koester quoted by Hengstenberg admits that in the word which we render strength "there is contained a pointed irony, indicating that the lisping of infants forms a sort of tower of defence against the violent assaults of the disowners of God, which is perfectly sufficient." To still is to silence, or confound. Calvin prefers put to flight. The verb rendered still is in other forms rendered rest or rested, Gen. ii. 2, 3 and many other places. Some would read cause to cease. Our translation often has it so, Neh. iv. 11; Isa. xiii. 11; Ezek. vii. 24. Enemy and avenger are names here given to the wicked. They are not too strong. Mortal hatred against God and holiness belong to the unregenerate heart of man. Fry for avenger reads accuser; Ainsworth, Horsley and Morison, self-tormentor; Edwards and Hengstenberg read vengeful. This better corresponds with the true import, than the word avenger in its modern sense. The spite and malice of the human heart against God are dreadful. They are without a cause. They are inveterate. They are invincible except by divine grace. That the wicked bear malice against God is manifest in many ways. If they do not hate God, how can we account for the extent to which a large part of mankind have long been ignorant of Jehovah? At two periods, once in the family of Adam, and once in the family of Noah, the knowledge of God has been in the possession of every member of the human family; yet the great mass of men have rejected the true religion, and taken up with idolatry. In no way can this loss of divine knowledge be accounted for except by a strange aversion. Paul tells the secret. Men did not "like to retain God in their knowledge." This is a clear and the only satisfactory explanation. The enmity of men against God is also manifest by the way in which God's name is treated. It is continually profaned and blasphemed, even by millions, who know the third commandment, and the terrible doom of him, who violates it. There are more hard speeches uttered on this earth against God than against any thousand wicked men or any thousand fallen angels. Men would not curse and condemn God as they do, if they did not cordially hate him. See too how they reject and despise his laws. They break them every day openly, wilfully, insultingly. "The carnal mind is enmity against God; it is not subject to his law, neither indeed can be," Rom. viii. 7. If men did not hate God, they would not hate his people as they have always done. From the first generation of men to this hour, the blood of the saints has been crying to heaven. Millions on millions have died cruel deaths for no other reason than that they were followers of the Lamb. Besides, the Bible expressly says that unregenerate men hate God, and all goodness; that they hate him without a cause; that they hate him continually. Nor is this all. When God was manifest in the flesh and filled the world with miracles of mercy, he was persecuted, denied, rejected, derided, and crucified. They who hated the Son hated the Father also. The wicked are enemies of God by wicked works, and revengeful against all who take sides with him. Yet often have they been stilled by men and means apparently contemptible. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world to confound the things which were mighty; and base things of the world, and things which are despised, yea, and things, which are not, to bring to naught things that are." Many a time has the unlettered confessor confounded the philosopher, the plain man put to silence the prating of the learned, the child silenced the bold infidel. See church history. See what Sabbath-schools have done. Calvin: "Babes and sucklings are the invincible champions of God, who, when it comes to the conflict, can easily scatter and discomfit the whole host of the wicked despisers of God, and those who have abandoned themselves to impiety." God loves to stain the pride of all glory and show that man is a worm.

3. When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained. As in all curious workmanship men use the fingers, so in condescension to our capacities God is said to have made the heavens by his fingers, though he is without bodily parts. Such a mode of speech is no more liable to mislead than any other form of figurative language. To ordained, Calvin prefers arranged; Fry, disposed; Edwards, established; Alexander, fixed; Hengstenberg, founded. Although the word here rendered consider is used many hundreds of times simply in the sense of see, look, behold; yet it has other meanings, as to regard, Ps. lxxvi. 18, and it is also very properly several times rendered consider as in Ps. ix. 13; xxxi. 7; Ecc. iv. 4, 15. It is here in the future, that is the form of expressing a habit, q. d., when I am accustomed to consider the heavens, etc. A view of the firmament by night seems to have begotten at once the most elevated conceptions and the most devout affections. Astronomy is a sublime science. It always was so. It carries our contemplations far out into the boundless fields of space, and shows us creation. But theology is a still sublimer science. It takes the honest inquirer far beyond the remotest star up to God. The one shows us nature; the other, nature's author; the former, creation; the latter, the Creator. There is nothing in any of the heavenly bodies, which renders them objects in any way fit to receive worship. It is evident to any one that they are not intelligent, nor independent. He, who worships them must be as truly sottish as he who worships a brute. All idolatry is stupid, though not all equally indecent. But a devout admiration of the works of God is promotive of true piety. The heavens bear no marks of self-existence. The Psalmist very properly calls them God's heavens. His kingdom ruleth over all. He fills immensity. The number of the stars is known to be immense. Though our earth is more than ninety-five millions of miles from the sun, yet the planet Neptune is more than thirty-one times further. No man would be able in one hundred and sixty-five years to count the miles between the sun and that distant world, whose year is equal to 164 of ours. But the nearest fixed star is many thousands of times further from our sun than any of the known planets. And the number of the fixed stars is countless. Six thousand men busily counting for a whole day, from morning till night, could not raise their aggregate total as high as the number of the smallest-sized stars. There are known to be at least 300,000,000 of them. The probability is that these are but as a drop of the bucket, or as the small dust of the balance compared with the whole. Our sun is more than a million times larger than our earth. And there may be worlds a million times larger than the sun. If on the day that Adam and Eve were created, a messenger had been started from the Sun to announce to the inhabitants of Neptune the creation of man on earth, and if he had travelled day and night at the rate of fifty miles an hour in a straight line, he would not yet have reached his destination nor delivered his message. The Lord is a great God. Infants praise him. The heavens declare his name to be great above that of all others. It is excellent in all the earth. It is excellent in every respect. The next verse finishes the sentence here begun:

4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man that thou visitest him? For remarks on the words rendered man, and son of man, see Introduction, § 16. Whether the views there suggested by Piscator, Venema, and others be correct or not, Calvin well observes that "the prophet teaches that God's wonderful goodness is displayed the more brightly in that so glorious a Creator, whose majesty shines resplendently in the heavens, graciously condescends to adorn a creature, so miserable and vile as man is, with the greatest glory, and to enrich him with numberless blessings." However considered man had an humble origin. He was of the earth, earthy. In some respects he is inferior to other creatures. He is not so long-lived, so strong, so active, or in his gait so elegant as some beasts, over whom at creation God gave him perfect dominion, and over whom to some extent he still has authority.

The word rendered visitest is of frequent occurrence, being found in twenty-eight of the thirty-nine books of the Old Testament. It is used in a good sense in Gen. xxi. 1; l. 24, 25; Ruth i. 6; 1 Sam. ii. 21; Ps. lxxv. 9; lxxx. 14; in a bad sense in Ex. xx. 5; xxxii. 34; Job xxxv. 15; Ps. lxxxix. 32, and in many other places. Indeed it is often in our English Bible rendered punish. So that if the context did not give another sense we might paraphrase it thus, Man is so feeble, so frail, and compared with God, so insignificant that it fills me with wonder that thou regardest him in any way, either to govern or to judge, to bless or to curse him. I marvel that thou leavest him not as an atom too small to be accounted of at all. The pious John Newton tells us that at one stage of his religious experience he was greatly distressed, not with a fear of being punished for his sins so much as with an apprehension that God would entirely overlook him. The poet Pollok has described a very similar feeling in one understood to be himself. But the whole Psalm shows that David is speaking of the kindly visits, the merciful regards of God. Calvin paraphrases the words thus: "This is a marvellous thing, that God thinks upon men, and remembers them continually." If we take visitest in a good sense, then the force of the whole is much heightened. If to notice at all is condescension, to notice favorably is amazing loving-kindness.

5. For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels. The chief difficulties in this clause relate to the words little and angels. According to our version man even here is in degree but little lower than the angels. But is this so? Is there not a vast difference between them both in attainment and in position? In the next world, indeed, there is an important sense, in which the righteous shall be equal unto the angels, Luke xx. 36. But now it is far otherwise. To meet this difficulty many have proposed to read for a little while. Our translators have set the example in Job xxiv. 24; Ps xxxvii. 10; Hag. ii. 6. This rendering is also admissible in the corresponding Greek in Heb. ii. 7. The word is so used in Luke xxii. 58, and in Acts v. 34. The word equally applies to time, space, or degree. The context must decide to which it refers. In case of doubt we may choose that which gives the best sense. It will be found in this case safest to read for a little while. The church of England avoids the difficulty by wholly omitting the word little. Thou madest him lower, etc. Rivet, Moller, Cocceius, Venema, Fabritius, S. Schmidt, Dodd, Morison and Fry all read, for a little while. John Rogers' translation reads, for a season. The word rendered angels is the same that in Genesis i. 1, and in thousands of other cases is rendered God. It is plural. The Genevan translation reads, Thou hast made him a little lower than God. Calvin does the same and says, "I explain the words of David as meaning the same thing as if he had said, that the condition of men is nothing less than a divine and celestial state." But earth never was heaven, or comparable to it. Scott: "Adam, even when created in the image of God was infinitely beneath his Maker." There is no greater gulf than that, which separates the created and uncreated, the finite and infinite, man and God. Fry reads, For a little while lower than the gods, and he undertakes to prove that the proper application of the term is never in Scripture made to any being less than the Most High and that it is applied to angels or demons only in respect of their having become objects of worship to idolatrous men. But this view is hardly tenable. The inspired writers would surely not sanction an improper application of any name ever given to God. The Septuagint renders the word angels here, in Ps. xcvii. 7, quoted by Paul in Heb. i. 6, and in Ps. cxxxviii. 1. This rendering is followed by the Chaldee, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, by numerous Jewish interpreters, by Rivet, Edwards and others. When we find the Apostle in Hebrews using angels we may safely follow him, though it is not claimed that the inspired writers in quoting Scripture invariably paid further regard to the Hebrew than to give the sense so far as fell in with their argument. Angels are very exalted creatures. Man is inferior to nothing that God has made except the angels. God has done great things for him. Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor. The great mass of translations in different languages commonly cited use the word, crowned, or a precisely corresponding word. But some have suggested encircled, decorated. Our English version prefers to render it crowned, Ps. lxxv. 11, or compassed, Ps. v. 12. The nouns rendered glory and honor are in our English version both translated by the word glory and both by the word honor. The latter is also rendered majesty, and Fry prefers so to read here. Alexander: "These nouns are elsewhere put together to express royal dignity." Ps. xxi. 5; xlv. 3. Calvin thinks that by the language of this verse the Psalmist "intends the distinguished endowments which clearly manifest that men were formed after the image of God, and created to the hope of a blessed and immortal life. The reason with which they are endued, and by which they can distinguish between good and evil; the principle of religion, which is planted in them; their intercourse with each other, which is preserved from being broken up by certain sacred bonds; the regard to what is becoming, and the sense of shame which guilt awakens in them, as well as their continuing to be governed by laws; all these things are clear indications of pre-eminent and celestial wisdom. Not without good reason therefore does David exclaim that mankind are adorned with glory and honor."

6. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands. This seems to be a devout rehearsal of the truths taught in Gen. i. 26, 28; ix. 2, and often alluded to in the sacred writings down to near the close of the canon of Scripture. James iii. 7. Thou hast put all things under his feet, i. e., thou hast placed them in subjection to him. This subjection was at creation perfect. By the fall it has been impaired. Still it is not destroyed. Calvin: "What David here relates belongs properly to the beginning of the creation, when man's nature was perfect."

The 3, 4 and 5 verses of this Psalm are quoted at length in Heb. ii. 6-8, and applied to Christ. This has given rise to a considerable diversity of views. Calvin goes so far as to express the opinion that "what the apostle says in Heb. ii. 6-8 concerning the abasement of Christ for a short time is not intended by him as an explanation of Ps. viii. 5-7; but, for the purpose of enriching and illustrating the subject on which he is discoursing, he introduces and accommodates to it what had been spoken in a different sense." But is not this going too far? In all the early part of the epistle to the Hebrews the apostle is conducting an argument respecting the priesthood of Christ, and if there is loose reasoning, the mind of the church would be much disturbed. Samson speaks more advisedly when he says, "It requires but little stretch of faith to believe that a passage which so easily admits of the application here made, is so applied, not by accommodation merely, but in consistency with its proper original meaning." Let us not attempt to weaken the apostle's argument. That is impregnable. Yet we may with Hengstenberg say that by the quotation in Heb. ii. 6-8 we are not "necessitated to refer the Psalm, in its primary and proper sense, to Christ. Although David, in the first instance, speaks of the human race generally, the writer of the epistle might still justly refer what is said to Christ, in its highest and fullest sense. For while the glory of human nature, as here delineated, has been so deteriorated through the fall, that it is to be seen only in small fragments, and what is here said is to be referred to the idea rather than the reality, it appears anew in Christ in full splendor. The writer of the epistle describes the glory obtained for humanity in Christ over the things of creation, whereby it is to be raised above the angels." If these views of interpretation are correct, they are alike applicable to the quotation and use of the 6th verse of this Psalm in 1 Cor. xv. 27. Still the question recurs, where is the great grace to man in the humiliation and exaltation of Christ? Is not Christ divine? The answer is, first, Christ had two natures. One was divine. By this he was equal with the Father, and was infinitely removed from us. His other nature was human and as such had in itself no more claim to authority than that of any other sinless human being. But he was God's elect. To him was this honor given that his human nature should be assumed into an eternal and ineffable union with the divine. This is the most amazing exercise of God's love and sovereignty on record. Augustine: "The highest illustration of predestination and grace is in the Saviour himself, the man Christ Jesus, who has acquired this character in his human nature, without any previous merit either of works or of faith;" and Calvin: "What was bestowed upon Christ's human nature was a free gift, nay, more, the fact that a mortal man, and the son of Adam, is the only Son of God, and the Lord of glory, and the head of angels, affords a bright illustration of the mercy of God." Thus human nature, in this one instance, is exalted. But secondly, Jesus Christ was a public person, a representative of all our race, whose existence beyond this life shall be either desirable or tolerable. In his exaltation and glory they all partake. The higher he rises the greater their glory. They reign by sitting on his throne. To man here is love beyond a parallel—beyond all names of tenderness.

7. God gives to man here, even in his fallen estate, some tokens and remnants of power. He has therefore put under him all sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field. Morison thinks that by the last phrase the Psalmist exclusively designates those animals, which are not domesticated. But an examination of the passages, where it is found, will probably lead to the opinion that his language is too strong. The Scriptures expressly speak of WILD beasts of the field, when they wish them to be exclusively regarded. Ps. l. 11; lxxx. 13. See also Isa. xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39. The phrase seems to denote all beasts wild and tame. Man's impaired though real dominion over cattle, and flocks, and the whole race of brute beasts enables him to live in some peace and comfort. But the passage has a far higher application than this, even to the dominion given to Christ over all sorts and conditions of men. His people are his sheep, John x. 1-16. His ministers are called oxen, 1 Cor. ix. 9, 10. And the prophet employs the boldest figures drawn from the animal kingdom to represent the subjection of all classes of men to the authority of Christ, Isa. xi. 6-9; lx. 6, 7. Nor does the matter of dominion stop here.

8. God has also given him power to some extent over the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas. Broken as man's power is, and liable as he is to be made the prey of wild beasts, of the birds of heaven, of the sea-monsters, yet to a remarkable extent he still has dominion over them. The food, and clothing, and ornament, and treasure he daily obtains from the regions noticed in this verse are worth many millions of money. Horne thus applies verses 7, 8 to Christ and his kingdom: "The souls of the faithful, lowly and harmless, are the sheep of his pasture; those who, like oxen, are strong to labor in the church, and who, by expounding the word of life, tread out the corn for the nourishment of the people, own him for their kind and beneficent Master; nay, tempers fierce and untractable as the wild beasts of the desert, are yet subject to his will; spirits of the angelic kind, that, like the bird of the air, traverse freely the superior region, move at his command: and those evil ones, whose habitation is in the deep abyss even to the great Leviathan himself; all, all are put under the feet of King Messiah." It is sufficient to maintain that the terms employed in these verses are designed to be very comprehensive. But to give this verse in connection with the preceding the higher application to Christ, it is not necessary to become fanciful and insist that each of the terms corresponds to some one thing in the spiritual world, though the ravens are subject to Christ and at his bidding fed the prophet, and the angels who fly through the midst of heaven are his ministers to do his pleasure, and the devils, the spirits of the bottomless abyss, are subject to him. The kingdom of Christ has as its willing subjects all holy intelligences, and has subsidized all, whether friendly or hostile, that can in any wise affect its progress. Such thoughts may well fill the pious mind with adoring exclamations.

9. O LORD our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth. This verse is like the first. There seems to be no variation of design or of application. It is a devout repetition of words of adoration.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We must not give up the truths of natural religion, v. 1. We must maintain them and insist on them. They are as clear as they are necessary. They are declared in all the earth.

2. God's names and titles are to be reverently and adoringly used, repeated, celebrated and extolled, v. 1.

3. To plead our covenant relation with God as our God is a duty enforced by the constant example of the pious, v. 1.

4. God's mercies of every kind are to be duly noticed. Moller: "Among the wonderful bounties of God conferred on man, the chief are these two, viz.: the creation of all men in Adam, and the restoration of the elect in Christ."

5. Dickson: "The godly are not always borne down with trouble; sometimes they have liberty to go and delight themselves in beholding God's glory and goodness towards themselves."

6. Morison: "What a reverential view does it convey to us of the spirit of prophecy when we contemplate it as surmounting the imperfection of an obscure dispensation, as penetrating into the hidden mysteries of future ages and generations, and as giving forth to the church, as in historic narrative, an announcement of facts, which could be known only to the omniscient research of the Infinite mind."

7. In all our plans of usefulness let children hold their proper place. Nothing ever awakened the hatred of Christ's enemies more than the praises of children, because they knew the power of such an example. Scott: "The new-born infant is such a display of God's power, skill, and goodness, as unanswerably confutes the cavils of atheism. Even little children have been taught so to love and serve him that their praises and confessions have baffled and silenced the rage and malice of persecutors." We should therefore labor to promote early piety. He who is old enough to hate God and break his commandments, is old enough to love him and walk in the way of his testimonies. Piscator: "Those who deny the providence of God are confuted by the support and preservation of sucking children and of those in the tender age, commonly given to play. Consider Christ's saying in Matt. xviii. 10."

8. One reason why God makes so much use of plain, humble, and feeble instruments, is that he would let all men see that the excellency of the power is of him and not of man. He will have all the glory.

9. The reason why men must be born again, is because they are wicked, enemies, and vengeful, v. 2.

10. The wicked have a very bad cause and as feeble as it is wicked. They sometimes cry out that a fox running on the walls of Zion will shake them down. But little David is a match for their greatest giants. Yea, babes and sucklings have often confounded them, v. 2.

11. While we reverently study God's word let us not slight his works, but consider them, v. 3. Everything that God has made or has done may teach us some lesson. Sin will pervert anything, even the noblest truths and sciences, but wisdom will grow wiser thereby.

12. The stability of the heavenly bodies and of the universe is well suited to beget confidence in God. This is one great use of such studies. Isa. xl. 26.

13. And if the use of the telescope in the blazing universe above us should at any time lead us to doubt God's care of us, let us seize the microscope and see his wondrous care of the myriads of creatures beneath us, and surely our reason must be satisfied, and by God's blessing our faith must be strengthened.

14. And let all God's works and mercies humble us, v. 4. This is their proper effect on every rational creature. Scott: "What are we but mean, guilty, polluted, ungrateful, rebellious, and apostate creatures?" Our place is in the dust. And let us not fear to take a low place. Our origin, our wickedness, our feebleness all put us there. If we shall ever rise, it must be by lying down; if we are ever exalted, it must be by self-abasement.

15. How blessed is the truth that our Saviour can no more be brought low for the suffering of death, vv. 5, 6, compared with Heb. ii. 6-9. His work is done, his conflict is over, his temptations are ended. Just so shall it in due time be with all his chosen ones.

16. The great power God has given to man over the brute creation should be exercised mercifully. Cruelty to dumb creatures dreadfully hardens the heart, and must be provoking to God. "A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast; but the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." Pr. xii. 10. Compare Deut. xxii. 6.

17. The church will stand. Christ has it by covenant of old, v. 6.

18. How great is our Immanuel. He is the second Adam, the Lord from heaven. He rules the universe, vv. 5-9.

19. What revelations are effected by redemption. The whole of man's happy state lost by sin is recovered and restored by faith in the incarnation and mediation of Jesus Christ.

20. That is a happy train of thought which begins and ends in devout and hearty adoration, vv. 1, 8.

21. As oft as we behold the heavens, let us meditate on God and praise him for what he is and does; and especially let our views of creative power and providential care lead us to the higher theme of salvation by Christ.

22. It is marvellous that men who have no heart to praise God here should expect to be admitted to heaven to praise him there. Dying will not make any man fond of celestial music or employments.

23. When Christ's work shall all be done, all his enemies be put down, and all his redeemed brought home, then it will be confessed that the greatest movement ever made respected man's recovery, the greatest kingdom ever set up was the kingdom which is not of this world, the greatest conqueror ever known was the Captain of our salvation. Now indeed nothing is finished. In fact oftentimes all seems tohu vanu bohu, "without form and void." Calvin: "Paul reasons in this manner, If all things are subdued to Christ, nothing ought to stand in opposition to his people. But we see death still exercising his tyranny against them. It follows then that there remains the hope of a better state than the present." But when the top-stone is put on the church, and its glory revealed, none will say that Zion is not glorious, nor that her Head is not the chiefest among ten thousand.

PSALM IX.

To the chief Musician upon Muth-labben, A Psalm of David.

- 1 I will praise thee, O LORD, with my whole heart; I will shew forth all thy marvellous works.
- 2 I will be glad and rejoice in thee: I will sing praise to thy name, O thou Most High.
- 3 When mine enemies are turned back, they shall fall and perish at thy presence.
- 4 For thou hast maintained my right and my cause; thou satest in the throne judging right.
- 5 Thou hast rebuked the heathen, thou hast destroyed the wicked, thou hast put out their name for ever and ever.
- 6 O thou enemy, destructions are come to a perpetual end: and thou hast destroyed cities; their memorial is perished with them.
- 7 But the LORD shall endure for ever: he hath prepared his throne for judgment.
- 8 And he shall judge the world in righteousness, he shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness.
- 9 The LORD also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble.
- 10 And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee: for thou, LORD, hast not forsaken them that seek thee.
- 11 Sing praises to the LORD, which dwelleth in Zion: declare among the people his doings.
- 12 When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them: he forgetteth not the cry of the humble.
- 13 Have mercy upon me, O LORD; consider my trouble which I suffer of them that hate me, thou that liftest me up from the gates of death:
- 14 That I may shew forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion: I will rejoice in thy salvation.
- 15 The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made: in the net which they hid is their own foot taken.
- 16 The LORD is known by the judgment which he executeth: the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. Higgaion. Selah.
- 17 The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God.
- 18 For the needy shall not always be forgotten: the expectation of the poor shall not perish for ever.
- 19 Arise, O LORD; let not man prevail: let the heathen be judged in thy sight.
- 20 Put them in fear, O LORD: that the nations may know themselves to be but men. Selah.

FOR remarks on the words, To the chief musician, see on Ps. 4th at the beginning. There is much diversity of opinion, as to the right explanation of upon muth-labben. The word muth taken by itself means death, and labben may mean white, fair, or for a son. This is all that is certainly known on the subject. All the rest is conjecture, with various degrees of probability, but no one view is to be received without some doubt. Some interpret it of the death of Saul. But in this there is nothing plausible. Others think it refers to the death of David's son, Absalom. But David's feelings and behaviour on that mournful occasion were very diverse from the tenor of this Psalm, 2 Sam. xviii. 33. Others suppose that Labben was the name of some great captain, who commanded forces hostile to David and to Israel, and that this Psalm celebrates deliverance from him after his death. It is not pretended that any such name is found in the catalogues of names of the hostile contemporaries of David. The whole is a sheer conjecture as to the name, though it is not a wild conjecture. The contents of the Psalm show indeed that David's enemies had been signally defeated once or oftener. Some have supposed that this Psalm celebrates the victory gained by the death of Goliath. Some, who take this view, hold that Labben is a fictitious name given to the giant. Calvin mentions some, who so held. Patrick has warmly embraced the view that Goliath is intended, but not under a fictitious name. He says, "I mention, Goliath, because, among the various opinions about muth-labben, I find none so probable as theirs, who think it hath some relation to him: to whom there are three ways of applying those Hebrew words. All of them by Almuth understand to be meant upon the death. And then Labben, some think, signifies the Son, that is, a great man, as I have expounded in my preface to this work. Others render it the White; that is an illustrious, noble person, or one famous in arms, as Goliath was. Others render it intermediate; which agrees also to that champion, who came out and stood between the two armies, and defied Israel, 1 Sam. xvii. 4 and onward." The whole of the remarks here offered on labben are so strained that perhaps no one will feel disposed to follow the venerable author. It is, however, due to him to say that the Chaldee has it, "To praise upon the death of the man, who went out between the camps." Some have thought it related to the death of the Son of man on Calvary; but the contents of the Psalm show this to be pretty certainly a mistake. Bythner quotes Arias Montanus as inverting the letters and reading, nabal; and Hengstenberg says, "The true mode of explanation was hit upon by Grotius, who supposed that labben, or Laban was put by a transposition of letters for Nabal, and that the superscription marks the object of the Psalm. But he erred in this that he took Nabal as a proper name, upon the dying of Nabal—a subject to which the Psalm could not possibly refer—instead of: upon the dying of a fool. This error being rectified, the superscription accords precisely with the contents, the destruction of the fool (comp. Ps. xiv. 1) is actually the subject of the Psalm." The number, who will be persuaded that the inspired writer was here giving us an anagram, will probably be very small. Others would read it, For the hidden things of the son. This is the rendering of the Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate. The Arabic is much the same, Concerning the mysteries of the son, but it adds, with respect to the glory of Christ, and his resurrection and kingdom, and the destruction of all the disobedient. Houbigant reads, The mysteries of the Son. Theodore applies it to Christ's victory over death, by submitting to death, which was a hidden thing. The remaining opinions interpret muth-labben of either the tune, the music, or the instrument to be used in singing the Psalm. Ainsworth and others think it may signify the note, which is called counter-tenor. Fry mentions some, who hold that it relates to some unknown regulations for the music. Mudge thinks the two words upon and muth should be read as one, which he regards as "the beginning of a celebrated composition, to which, perhaps, a particular kind of instrument was appropriated, or at least a particular tune; to which this Psalm is directed to be sung." Calvin thinks it more probable that muth-labben was the beginning of some well known song, to the tune of which this Psalm was composed. The remaining view is that it signifies the musical instrument to be used in singing this Psalm. Calvin says some held this opinion. Such unite the words upon and Muth, and read alamoth, which word is found in the title of Ps. xlv. They also think that Ben in labben is the name of the chief musician, who with his family and companions were appointed to sing with psalteries on alamoth. 1 Chron. xv. 18, 20. The reader will probably be ready to say that none of the views presented are sustained by satisfactory evidence or authority. It is even so. Venema and Edwards admit the difficulty to be beyond their powers of solution.

The subject of the Psalm will be best learned by an examination of each verse. Jerome, Ainsworth and Gill all apply it to Anti-Christ. But the Psalm seems to record past victories rather than to predict future triumphs. The Psalm will be found a mixed devotional composition, containing praises, expressions of confidence in God, and supplications for mercies considerably mixed together.

That David was the author of this Psalm we have no reason to doubt. The inscription gives it to him.

We cannot fix the date of this Psalm. Scott puts it at ten hundred and twenty-one years, and Clarke about ten hundred and forty-two years before Christ. It was written after the ark was carried to Mount Zion, as is evident from vv. 11, 14. In his Introduction Clarke expresses the opinion that this Psalm was sung by David on bringing the ark from the house of Obed-edom. But God could not be said to have "dwelt in Zion," nor to have been "praised in the gates of the daughter of Zion" till the ark was brought to that hill. It is useless to attempt to interpret this Psalm by any historical incident. The life of David was full of conflicts and troubles, out of which he was, however, mercifully delivered. This song would therefore suit almost any period of his reign. And as David was identified with the people of Israel, the Psalm is evidently composed in the name of the chosen nation, the visible church. Calvin: "It is a mistake to limit to one victory this thanksgiving, in which David intended to comprehend many deliverances." Luther: "The Prophet here speaks in his own person, and in that of all the saints also, who are afflicted for the sake of the word of God."

The names of the Almighty found in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, and Gel-yohn Most High, on which respectively see above on Ps. i. 2; vii. 17.

1. I will praise thee, O LORD, with my whole heart. The Septuagint for praise uses a word, which is in the New Testament frequently rendered confess, as in Matt. iii. 6; Mark i. 5. But it is also translated by the verb thank as in Matt. xi. 25; Luke x. 21. Sometimes it means to own or acknowledge as a friend, and sometimes to covenant or promise as in Luke xxii. 6. Sometimes it seems to include all the acts of religious worship, even when rendered confess as in Rom. xiv. 11; xv. 9. So that the Vulgate, which uses the word confess, may be followed without great error, if we take that word in its old and fullest sense. Yet thankfulness is here the prominent idea in the word. Worshipers are divided into three classes. There are those whose whole service is sheer and gross hypocrisy. How many are of this description no mortal can tell. We may hope that where God's word is freely and abundantly preached, the number is comparatively small. A second class is made up of those, who would shudder at wilful hypocrisy, but they serve God with a divided heart. There is reason to fear that in the purest churches there are many such. The third class of worshippers consists of those, who bring the whole heart into God's service. This is a form of expression often used in Scripture. It declares the sincerity and earnestness of the worshipper. It is the opposite of feigned. Jer. iii. 10. It does not imply absolute perfection in the service offered. In the same spirit David says, I will shew forth all thy marvellous works. For shew forth Edwards and Alexander read recount; Calvin and Fry, tell of; church of England speak of; Clarke, number out or reckon up; Morison, publish abroad, openly declare. Instead of marvellous works, Jebb reads marvels; Hengstenberg and Alexander, wonders. The word is rendered in our English Bible, wonders, marvels, miracles, wondrous works, wondrous things. The honor, which God has received by the wonders he has wrought on the earth is very great. Christians are not wise when they yield an iota of the argument in favor of the true religion drawn from miracles. What a profound impression was made on nearly all the nations of the world by the stupendous displays of the power of God in the days of Moses! The reason of the hostility of wicked men to the doctrine of miracles is found in the fact that if miracles are true, the ungodly are utterly undone. Until the modern Deistical controversy, by a miracle was meant any wonderful display of divine power, whether the laws of nature were suspended or not. Of late it implies a suspension of those laws. To thank God, and devoutly speak of the wonders he has wrought at any time or for any purpose is a great part of piety and a great nourisher of holy affections.

2. I will be glad and rejoice in thee. For rejoice Calvin, Morison and Fry read exult; Alexander, triumph. In our common version in Ps. xxv. 2, it is rendered triumph, everywhere else, rejoice or be joyful. Venema paraphrases the words thus, I will rejoice even to exultation. It is our duty not only to submit to God, but to be happy not only in his word and his government, but in himself, in his nature and perfections. Communion with God has ever been a precious doctrine in the church of God. I will sing praise to thy name, O thou Most High. For sing praise Jebb reads make a psalm. The word is commonly rendered sing praise, sing praises, or simply sing; but in 1 Chron. xvi. 9 and Ps. cv. 2 it is rendered in our common version sing psalms. Calvin and Edwards read, I will celebrate in [or with] songs thy name; Horsley and Fry read I will chant; Calvin, celebrate in songs; Venema and Edwards, celebrate with songs; Alexander, praise or celebrate in song. God's name is that by which he is known. Alexander thinks it equivalent to manifested excellence. If men ever worship God aright, they must purpose to do it.

3. When mine enemies are turned back, they shall fall and perish at thy presence. The verbs fall and perish are in the future, but this does not exclude the past. It expresses what is habitually done. Hengstenberg: "The use of the future is to be explained from the lively nature of the representation." See Introduction to this work, § 6. When his enemies are forced to retreat they fall into great confusion, are terrified, adopt foolish, and reject wise measures for their preservation. Or from their past defeat, he argues to what shall be their dismay. The beginning of defeat to the wicked is a sign that, without repentance, a terrible overthrow is coming, Esther vi. 13. The word rendered fall, is in Ps. xxvii. 2; Isa. viii. 15, and many other places translated stumble; though it is as often perhaps rendered fall; and sometimes, be overthrown. Hammond: "It refers to those that either faint in a march or are wounded in a battle, or especially that in flight meet with galling traps in their way, and so are galled and lamed, rendered unable to go forward, and so fall, and become liable to all the chances of pursuits, and as here are overtaken and perish in the fall." One of the strongest marks of wisdom is simply to know whence our help comes. If our enemies fall or flee, it is at God's presence. He can alarm the most resolute, take away natural courage, put a dreadful sound in men's ears, and fight terribly, though invisibly, against his foes. Some, however, change the pointing and so alter the relation of these clauses. Thus Fry:

Verse 2. I will rejoice and exult in thee;
I will chant thy name, O Most High;

Verse 3. Because my enemies are turned back:
They fall; they perish at thy presence.

Edwards points in very much the same way. Alexander thinks the third verse may either be connected with what goes before, or it may begin a new sentence. If it belongs to the preceding, then Fry and Edwards are right in reading because instead of when. For remarks on the name, Most High, see Ps. vii. 17. "God is in the loftiest and most exalted pre-eminence, and sovereignty over the whole creation; and in essence and glory, surpassing all comprehension."

4. For thou hast maintained my right and my cause; thou satest in the throne judging right. The word rendered hast maintained, is in Gen. i. 31, ii. 2, and in hundreds of cases translated hast made. It is also frequently rendered hast done, and sometimes hast wrought, shewed, executed, fulfilled, granted. Edwards: hast asserted. Fry: hast done me justice and right. Hengstenberg: hast made my judgment and right. The work done was judicial. The Judge of all the earth took up the matter. The right must be mighty, when God is on the side of the wronged. The last clause is rendered by Calvin, Thou satest upon the throne a righteous judge; Hengstenberg: Thou satest on the throne as righteous judge; Edwards: Thou satest upon thy throne judging righteously. The sense is given by either, or by our version. As kings, when about to try a cause in a solemn manner, sat down on their thrones, so God had in good earnest taken up the cause of David and decided against his enemies.

5. Thou hast rebuked the heathen. Rebuked in our Bible commonly so rendered, sometimes reproved. Here the rebuke was the pronouncing and execution of the judicial sentence, formed by God sitting as judge, as noticed in v. 4. The word here rendered heathen, is plural, and in that form occurs five times in this Psalm, vv. 5, 15, 17, 19, 20. In vv. 17, 20, it is translated nations. It is very often rendered Gentiles. The list of the names of the people, who often conspired against God's people is long and shows the most singular alliances and combinations. See Gen. xv. 19-21; Deut. vii. 1; 2 Kings xxiv. 2; Ezra iv. 7-10; Ps. lxxxiii. 2-8. But numerous as the enemies of God's church have ever been, he has always overpowered them. What is the stubble to the fire? So it is added, Thou hast destroyed the wicked. The word rendered wicked here is in the first Psalm rendered ungodly, and in this Psalm three times, wicked, vv. 5, 16, 17. It is in the singular, and may mean that these hostile nations were leagued as one man, or as Alexander suggests, we may read many a wicked enemy. The word rendered destroyed is in another form in vv. 3, 18, of this Psalm rendered perish. When transitive, it is the usual word for destroy; when intransitive, for perish. The destruction of the wicked is perdition. And so, Thou hast put out their name for ever and ever. Calvin, Edwards, and Fry read, blotted out. Hengstenberg: "Thou hast so completely extirpated them that their memory has perished with them." The phrase rendered forever and ever is very strong and emphatic. Clarke: "He who contends it means only a limited time, let him tell us where the Hivites, Perizzites, Jebusites, etc., now dwell, and when it is likely they are to be restored to Canaan?"

6. O thou enemy, destructions are come to a perpetual end; and thou hast destroyed cities; their memorial is perished with them. There is much diversity in rendering this verse. Boothroyd: Desolations have utterly consumed the enemy; thou didst destroy their cities; their remembrance is lost; Edwards: As for the enemy, they are utterly destroyed; they are become everlasting desolations, for their cities hast thou erased; the memory of them, as well as themselves, is perished; Mudge: As for the enemy, they are quite destroyed; everlasting desolations; their cities thou hast extirpated; their memory, as well as themselves, is annihilated; Fry: Desolations have consumed the enemy forever: the cities thou hast destroyed, their memory is perished with them; Jebb: O thou enemy, thy swords are come to a perpetual end: and cities thou hast brought to ruin: their memorial is destroyed with them; Horne reads the first clause, The destructions of the enemy are completed to the utmost, meaning that the work of their ruin as enemies is forever finished; Venema: The enemies are consumed by destructions forever: and thou hast destroyed the foes: their memory is perished with them; Clarke: The enemy is desolated forever: for thou hast destroyed their cities, and their memory is perished with them; Hengstenberg: The enemy, finished are the destructions forever, and thou hast destroyed cities, their memorial is perished with them; Alexander: The enemy, or as to the enemy, finished are (his) ruins forever: and their cities hast thou destroyed: gone is their very memory; Morison: Devastations have utterly consumed the enemy; and their cities which thou hast destroyed, their very names have perished with them. In a note he supports this translation by a reference to the Hebrew and Latin Bible of Montanus, by the renderings of Horne and Horsley, and by that of Bishop Lowth in Merrick's Annotations. Green renders the first clause, The desolations of the enemy are ceased forever. Dimock supposes we may perhaps read, The houses of the enemy are desolations forever. The marginal rendering of this verse, which Scott prefers, is, The destructions of the enemy are come to a perpetual end: and their cities hast thou destroyed, etc. The first difficulty regards the word enemy. Is he here addressed, or is he spoken of? Perhaps the latter is correct. The weight of modern authority is on that side. The word, thou, in that case is simply continued from the preceding verse, and refers to God. The next difficult word is that variously rendered destructions, desolations, ruins, swords. The first three renderings are substantially the same. The last has for its support the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate. The Arabic also reads arms. A very slight variation in the Hebrew would allow us to read either swords or desolations. Perhaps the latter is here to be preferred. The rendering of Edwards probably conveys as accurate an idea as we can get in so few words. The interpretations of this passage are as various as the renderings. Calvin has thus summed up several of the leading views: "Some read this sixth verse interrogatively . . . as if David, addressing his discourse to his enemies, asked whether they had completed their work of devastation, even as they had resolved to destroy everything; for the first verb signifies sometimes to complete, and sometimes to put an end to anything. And if we here take it in this sense, David, in the language of sarcasm or irony, rebukes the foolish confidence of his enemies. Others, reading the verse without any interrogation, make the irony still more evident, and think that David describes, in vv. 6, 7, 8, a twofold state of matters; that, in the first place (v. 6) he introduces his enemies persecuting him with savage violence, and persevering with determined obstinacy in their cruelty, so that it seemed to be their fixed purpose never to desist until the kingdom of David should be utterly destroyed; and that, in the second place (vv. 7, 8) he represents God as seated on his judgment-seat directly over against them, to repress their outrageous attempts. If this sense is admitted, the first word of the seventh verse must read but, not and, thus: Thou, O enemy, didst seek after nothing except slaughter and the destruction of cities; but, at length, God has shown that he sits in heaven on his throne as judge, to put into proper order the things, which are in confusion on the earth. According to others, David gives thanks to God, because, when the ungodly were fully determined to spread universal ruin around them, he put an end to their devastations. Others understand the words in a more restricted sense, as meaning that the desolations of the ungodly were completed, because God, in his just judgment, had made to fall upon their own heads the calamities and ruin which they had devised against David. According to others, David, in the sixth verse, complains that God had, for a long time, silently suffered the miserable devastation of his people, so that the ungodly, being left unchecked, wasted and destroyed all things according to their pleasure; and, in the seventh verse, they think he subjoins for his consolation that God, notwithstanding, presides over human affairs." But if the sixth verse speaks of the enemy and not to him, then none of these views are so good as that suggested by the rendering of Edwards, of Fry, or of Alexander. Hengstenberg says that the three verbs in this sixth verse "stand in exact parallelism. Now, if the affairs of the enemy are described by the last two, as going to perdition, the same explanation must be held also to be the only correct one in regard to the first." He also thinks there is here a reference to Ex. xvii. 14; Deut. xxv. 19; Num. xxiv. 20, where we find these expressions, "I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" "thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven;" "Amalek was the first of the nations; but his latter end shall be that he perish forever." It is a great and universal principle of God's government, that "the memory of the wicked shall rot." This verse therefore may be regarded as having a sense complete in itself without any reference to succeeding verses. It is a blessed truth that though the enemies of God pass away and perish, yet Jehovah is unchangeable.

7. But the LORD shall endure forever. The word here rendered endure is in verse 11, and very often elsewhere rendered by the verb dwell; but in verse 4 of this Psalm as also in Ps. i. 1; ii. 4 and in many places it is rendered by some form of the verb sit; Calvin and Fry: sitteth; Alexander: will sit. It probably has reference to his sitting in his throne as noticed in v. 4. Hengstenberg is so confident of this that he reads, The LORD is enthroned forever. This is pretty certainly the correct view. It derives support from the preceding context, the imagery here filling the writer's mind, the use of the word in v. 4, and the parallelism in the next clause. He hath prepared his throne for judgment. Men, who live in opposition to God, have a great dislike to the doctrine of divine and eternal judgment. Yet its importance and the very hostility of the human mind render it proper that it should often be repeated. So we had it in Ps. i. 5, and now here also. Nor is it obscurely revealed. We have it still more clearly in the next verse.

8. And he shall judge the world in righteousness. Even Paul in his great address on Mars' hill a thousand years after could find no better words, in which to teach the Athenians the doctrine of the judgment-day than the Septuagint rendering of this clause. Calvin: "The pronoun, He, is of 'great weight.'" It is as if he had said, He himself, or He exclusively shall judge the world. The same is again repeated, He shall minister judgment to the people in uprightness. The word people is plural, peoples, or nations. The word uprightness is plural. Job: "He is excellent in power and in judgment, and in plenty of justice:" chap. xxxvii. 23. In Ps. xcvi. 9; xcix. 4, it is rendered equity. The words here used are different from those in the preceding clause. Edwards: He administers judgment to the nations in equity. Fry gives the same except he puts justice for judgment. Nor is this doctrine at all unwelcome to the righteous. Nay, it is their hope; for,

9. The LORD also will be a refuge for the oppressed. The word here rendered refuge is in the margin here and elsewhere rendered an high place. It occurs twice in this verse, and thirteen times elsewhere. It is variously rendered defence, refuge, high tower, high fort, place of defence; and in Jer. xlviii. 1 it is left as a proper name. The idea seems to be that of a fortification of great natural strength, where an enemy cannot come, or even get a sight of those, whom he would destroy. Venema: "David is the first, so far as I have noticed, who by this term calls God, a high place." He first uses it in 2 Sam. xxii. 3, where it is rendered my high tower. David often experienced safety in such places, when fleeing from Saul. For will be Fry reads was; the Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate also use the past tense; Edwards: is. But the Chaldee and Syriac agree with our version, which is to be preferred. The word rendered oppressed is found also in Ps. x. 18; lxxiv. 21 and in Prov. xxvi. 28. In the latter case it is rendered afflicted; in the others, oppressed. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Arabic and Syriac read poor instead of oppressed. For the LORD the Chaldee reads the word of the Lord. This gives a good sense, but cannot be admitted because it narrows down the broad truth of the text to one thing, and because it does not agree with the Hebrew text; yet it is but a paraphrase. The truth is repeated in the next clause. The LORD will be a refuge in times of trouble. Morison: "In their greatest straits, God's people shall find themselves garrisoned by omnipotent love." One of the excellencies of true religion is that it is a source of the greatest consolation, when consolation is most needed, viz., in times of trouble, or, as Alexander reads, in times of distress, or, as Edwards, at critical times of distress, or, as Calvin, in seasonable times in distress. He makes the seasonableness of the protection and aid prominent in the exposition. The word rendered trouble is also rendered anguish, tribulation, adversity, affliction and distress; our translators evidently regarding either of these words a fit rendering. Nor is God a high place inaccessible to his saints. So the Psalmist adds:

10. And they that know thy name will put their trust in thee. The word rendered trust is very generally so rendered, or hope, or put confidence. In this Book it is first found in Ps. iv. 5, and next here. The word here rendered name is the same as was found in Ps. v. 11; vii. 17; viii. 1. Calvin: "His name means his character, so far as he has been pleased to make it known to us." To know God's name is to have his excellence revealed in our hearts by his Spirit, so that we apprehend his nature, and have a spiritual discernment of his beauty and glory. It is impossible truly to see beauty without loving it. It is impossible to have essentially right views of God without delighting in him. So that there is a broad difference between the saving knowledge of God, and those dreamy speculations of him, which float in the minds of the unrenewed. Right apprehensions of God's character will inspire confidence in him. And the more men thus know of him, the more will they trust in him: for thou, LORD, hast not forsaken them that seek thee. It is a great and delightful truth that in the annals of redemption not one case has been found, where God deserted to the ruinous power of sins or enemies any soul, that had fled to him for refuge. One well authenticated case of that kind would destroy all confidence in the divine character and government. To seek God is put for the whole of religion, which consists in seeking to know him, to be like him, to possess his favor and his protection, to serve and obey him, to have communion with him, and finally to be with him in glory. Men must seek him intelligently, not superstitiously; diligently, not carelessly; humbly, not proudly; with all the heart, not hypocritically; in the name of Christ, and not relying on any merits but those of the Redeemer. Such truths as God here reveals, authorizing our confidence in him, may well animate us with joy. Therefore it is said,

11. Sing praises to the LORD, which dwelleth in Zion. To speak of God as dwelling in Zion proves this Psalm to have been written after the removal of the tabernacle to that holy hill, and not at the slaying of Goliath, nor at any time previous to the removal of the ark from the residence of Obed-edom. The call upon men to sing praises is a declaration that not merely one man, but that all men were bound to magnify the name of the Lord for such mercies as are here recorded. No man has a heart truly to praise God, but when he also wishes all others to do it. Nor is secret praise for public mercies enough. We must sing a song or psalm, or, as Jebb reads it, "make a psalm," to God on such occasions. We must not only tell a few friends, but spread abroad the fame of Jehovah. Therefore it is added, "Declare among the people his doings." The word rendered people is here plural. It is sometimes rendered folk, nation, nations, but most commonly people. It is not the same word that is found in v. 8. Here it clearly refers to surrounding nations. Calvin, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, and Alexander have nations. The things to be declared were God's doings. Elsewhere this word is rendered in a good sense works, deeds, acts, actions; in a bad sense works, inventions. Ps. xiv. 1; xcix. 8. Morison: "By the doings of God, we may understand either the mighty acts of his providence, or his revealed designs and purposes concerning his church and her enemies;" Calvin: "The meaning is that his doings are not published or celebrated as they deserve, unless the whole world is filled with the renown of them. To proclaim God's doings among the nations was indeed, as it were, to sing to the deaf; but by this manner of speaking David intended to show that the territory of Judea was too narrow to contain the infinite greatness of Jehovah's praises." His mighty acts in Egypt, in the settlement of David, and in subduing his enemies are proper matters of praise in all lands and ages, because they were illustrious, and because what God did then he will, if necessary, do again. He does not work miracles now. His providence may, however, be as truly marvellous as if he did. There must be some very serious and alarming malady in the souls of men to make it necessary for inspiration so often to call on us to praise God, which is one of the most obvious and ought to be one of the most pleasant duties in the life of a good man.

12. When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them: he forgetteth not the cry of the humble. This verse has occasioned much perplexity. Various renderings have been proposed. Calvin: For in requiring blood he hath remembered it; he hath not forgotten the cry of the afflicted; Edwards: For he that maketh inquisition after blood remembereth them; he forgets not the cry of the afflicted; Fry: He hath required blood, he hath taken account of it, he hath not disregarded the cry of the afflicted; Hengstenberg: For the avenger of blood is remembered by him, he forgetteth not the cry of the afflicted; Alexander: For seeking blood, or as an inquisitor of blood, he has remembered it, i. e., the blood; he has not forgotten the cry of the distressed. The interpretations of these verses are also very diverse. Scott: "God sometimes indeed permitted his servants to be tried by persecution; but there would be a season of inquisition for blood, when the prayers of the humble would be remembered and completely answered;" Horsley gives this paraphrase: "When God requireth the innocent blood of Jesus at the hands of the Jews, his murderers, he will not forget the peoples; but will manifest himself to them, mindful of the original promises. When the Jews are cut off the Gentiles shall be grafted in;" Patrick's paraphrase is: "Though God may seem to wink for a time at the cruelty of violent men, yet he will call them at last to a strict account for all the innocent blood they have shed, and for their unjust and unmerciful usage of meek and humble persons, whose cry he never forgets (though he doth not presently answer it) but takes a fit time to be avenged of their oppressors." Many other views might be quoted. The first clause of the verse is, When he maketh inquisition for blood. All agree that he refers to Jehovah. To make inquisition for blood is to require blood. Under all dispensations God has declared his abhorrence of bloody crimes. The first persecutor was a murderer. To him God said, "Thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground." To Noah he said, "Surely your blood of your lives will I require." The word rendered make inquisition is in Gen. ix. 5, and often elsewhere rendered require. It is the same word that in the 10th verse of this Psalm is rendered seek. It is often so rendered, as also by the words inquire, search for, etc. The meaning then is that God will see that innocent blood is rightly avenged. The Hebrew word for blood is plural here as often elsewhere. See Ps. v. 6, and comment on it. When God requires, searches, or makes inquisition for blood, it is said, he remembereth them or it. If we read it we refer to blood. As the noun in Hebrew is plural, bloods, so is the pronoun them. If in following the English idiom we make the noun singular, we must make the pro- noun singular also, if we believe it refers to blood. But it is evident our translators and many others regarded the pronoun as referring to persons, not to bloods, or murderers. But what persons are intended, the enemies of all goodness, or the humble mentioned in the last clause? The word rendered remembereth is used in the Bible both in a good and bad sense. God may remember men to bless them, or to punish them. So that we can get no light from that quarter. If them refers to the enemies of God's people, we should have to go back several verses to find the noun of which them is the substitute. If them refers to God's friends, we can find its noun in v. 10, or in the last word of v. 12. There are difficulties in each of these modes of explanation. Hengstenberg thinks the parallelism is best preserved by giving this sense, "God remembers blood, he forgets not the cry of the afflicted." But the parallelism in many places, as in vv. 4, 11, 14, 17, 19, of this very Psalm would suggest the contrary. It is evident, however, to any candid mind that the method of reading the verse adopted by Calvin and others who follow him is far the most free from difficulties. Mudge and Edwards suppose them refers to the last word humble, or afflicted. And Calvin admits that the pronoun often precedes the noun in Hebrew. Whichever of these modes of explanation is adopted, the doctrine of the verse is not altered. If God requires blood he of course remembers it, and the man who shed it and the man who was slain; and in particular he forgetteth not the cry of the humble, or, as some read it the afflicted, or the poor, or the meek. The word is fitly rendered either way. Such views of God must encourage a pious persecuted man to pray. Therefore the Psalmist earnestly addresses himself to God.

13. Have mercy upon me, O LORD. The marginal reading is, Be gracious unto me. In our version it is rendered by such phrases as those already given, and by Have pity, Show favor. The human heart is distressingly inclined to despair of the mercy of God, and when it has no hope toward God, its ruin is complete. It is a great thing for a poor soul to be able so far to confide as to pray in hope of being heard. And we make a right use of past deliverances when we employ them to arouse us humbly to beg for yet other mercies. Luther: "In the same way do all feel and speak, who have already overcome some tribulation and misfortune, and are once more oppressed, tormented and plagued. They cry and beg that they may be delivered." The Psalmist repeats his cry for mercy, saying, Consider my trouble, which I suffer of them that hate me. The word rendered consider is in our version often so given, for more frequently see, sometimes mark, sometimes behold, look upon, have respect to. It is a great matter when we can get the Judge of all the earth to mark our cause, to look upon our trouble, to have respect to our affliction. The word rendered trouble is more than thirty times in our version rendered affliction, and but two or three times trouble. But our translators use these and several other words as synonymous. The words, which I suffer, are not in the original, but are properly supplied, as all admit. Even the Doway Bible has them. This affliction came to David from them that hated him. Of these there were not a few. They often far outnumbered his friends; so that his case would have been hopeless, if he could not have pleaded with Jehovah, as thou that liftest me up from the gates of death. The word rendered death is Muth, not Sheol, as some expositions would lead one to suppose. Sheol is never in our version rendered death. The word rendered gates is the same as is found in v. 14, and is commonly so translated. The gates of death is a phrase found elsewhere. See Ps. cvii. 18. It denotes great peril, as if we were about to enter the grave. The figure in the mind of the writer was probably that of a prison with gates and bars. The same figure is in Scripture applied to the state of the dead. Job xvii. 16; Is. xxxviii. 10. It is hardly probable that David had the figure of a fortified city in his mind. He says thou liftest. He refers not merely to what God would do, or was now doing, but what he was in the habit of doing, or had often done. Calvin: God is accustomed not only to succor his servants, and to deliver them from their calamities by ordinary means, but also to bring them from the grave, even after all hope of life is cut off." Such deliverances from death, whether threatened by violence or by pestilence, should be received by us with the utmost humility and the liveliest gratitude, and should be by us improved as occasions for glorifying God. So David thought:

14. That I may shew forth all thy praise in the gates of the daughter of Zion. Public mercies call for public praise, and great mercies for great thanksgivings. If those who experience gracious interpositions shall keep silence, how can God be honored any more by the righteous, than by the wicked? We may all say as Bishop Hall, "O my God, I am justly ashamed to think what favors I have received from thee, and what poor returns I have made to thee! Truly, Lord, I must needs say, thou hast thought nothing either in earth or in heaven too good for me. . . O thou who hast been so bountiful in heaping thy rich mercies upon me; vouchsafe to me yet one gift more: give me grace and power to improve all the gifts to the glory of the Giver." Shew forth, in this verse is the same word as is found in the beginning of this Psalm. See on second clause of the first verse. To show forth all God's praise is to enter largely into the work. An occasional God I thank thee is no fit return for a perpetual stream of rich benefits. This work of public praise was to be conducted in the most public place in Jerusalem, here called the daughter of Zion. Cities are in Scripture often spoken of as young women, delicate ladies, or venerable matrons. Ps. xlv. 12; Isa. xxiii. 10, 12; Gal. iv. 26. So Jerusalem was beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth. Hengstenberg is very confident that in the gates means simply within and no more. There is no evidence as some have asserted that Jerusalem was called the daughter of Zion, because that city was built round about that holy hill, nor because Jerusalem derived its chief importance from the religious solemnities celebrated on Mount Zion. Some praise God in a manner decent for its solemnity, but gloomy in its temper. This was not David's mind. "I will rejoice in thy salvation." Blessed is he, who loves to praise and give thanks. Mudge, Edwards, and others regard vv. 13, 14, as containing the cry of the afflicted, mentioned in v. 12, and so Edwards put them in marks of quotation. But there is no evidence that these verses are words put into the lips of another. They are an appropriate part of this devotional composition. God's salvation is the deliverance God secures to believers and accomplishes in them. The word rendered rejoice is always in our version as translated, or be glad, or be joyful. And while God's people are shouting deliverance, his enemies are gnawing their tongues for anguish, for,

15. The heathen are sunk down in the pit that they made. For an explanation of the figure here employed, see above on Ps. vii. 15. The particular event or events here referred to are concealed, perhaps designedly, from our view. The wicked are always meeting such overthrows. Hengstenberg thinks the prophet here speaks of an "ideal past," but we have as good and as true a sense by making it a historical past. Some, yea, many of Israel's and of David's foes had actually fallen. Instead of the pit Alexander prefers a pit, and in the next clause a net. For David adds, In the net, which they hid is their own foot taken. The persons here spoken of are the same as before, the heathen, or the nations, see comment on v. 5. It is impossible to tell which is most detestable, the malice or the deceit of the enemies of God. The best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge. They have the cunning and venom of the serpent, the fierceness of wild beasts, the malice of fallen angels. They love to dig pits and spread nets. But cunning is not wisdom. Every device of the wicked, like the cannon of a captured fort, may be turned to the destruction of those whom it was designed to defend. Nothing is too hard for God. He taketh the wise in their craftiness. And so,

16. The LORD is known by the judgment, which he executeth. Even a child is known by his doings. Wise and foolish kings thus reveal their characters. Let God be known in the same way; by the worlds he has made; by the providence he exercises over them; by the laws he has given them; by the mercy he has revealed to sinners; and by the judgment, which he executeth, both for the righteous and against the wicked. So well is God's character known in this way that at times the wicked have the most fearful apprehensions of coming wrath. The whole ungodly world in Christian, Mohammedan and Pagan lands may in a moment be brought into the deepest distress by the terrors of God. For although when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, yet this very failure to do known duty is the greatest element of weakness in the cause and character of the wicked. Their counsels are so narrow compared with omniscience that they fall by the very means devised for their safety; and so the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands. The wicked, singular, each and every incorrigible sinner, is thus snared. There is more than one sense, in which every sinner is his own destroyer. The figure of being snared is as old as the days of Moses. Deut. xii. 30. This verse concludes with the words: Higgaion. Selah. For remarks on Selah see Introduction, § 15. The word Higgaion occurs here for the first time. It is also found in Ps. xix. 14, where it is rendered meditation; in Ps. xcii. 3, where it is translated a solemn sound; and in Lam. iii. 62, where we read device. In Ps. xix. 14, and in Lam. iii. 62, it clearly means meditation, a musing, or thought. Junius, Amesius, Henry and Scott, hold that the two words here are equivalent to a thing to be meditated on with the greatest attention. Edwards thinks Higgaion a term relating to the music. Morison inclines to the opinion that it was intended to mark with emphasis the sentiment of the Psalm. Calvin is of the same mind. Bythner says the word means a discourse, a meditation, a murmur, a sound, and thinks the import of the two words here much the same as that given by Junius, etc. Hengstenberg thinks it may be rendered a musing in every case, even in Ps. xcii. 3. He thinks the word here calls for reflection. The Doway Bible neither gives the word, nor any translation, or interpretation of it; though in his Explanation of the Psalms Bellarmine admits that it is in the Hebrew, and says, it signifies that the judgments of God afore-mentioned are to be assiduously and continually thought of. If the word signifies anything beyond a musical notation, the import of which is not now understood, there is no better explanation given of it than that of the old commentators first quoted. Clarke says it means, "Meditate on this."

17. The wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God. The wicked here are the same as mentioned in the preceding verse. The word is here plural. In the first Psalm and elsewhere it is rendered the ungodly. The wicked, universally and indiscriminately, shall be turned into hell. But what does this mean? There is nothing in the verb shall be turned that necessarily signifies evil. Some say the meaning is that the wicked shall all die and go into the grave. But that is as true of the righteous as of the wicked. The Hebrew word (Sheol) is in our version according to its connexion rendered grave, pit, hell. In this case it must be hell, else nothing happens to God's enemies but what comes on his friends also. It may be well to cite attention to a few places where it must mean hell. In Ps. cxxxix. 8, it is the opposite of heaven: "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold thou art there." In Pr. v. 5; vii. 27, it is said of the vile woman that her steps take hold on hell, and that her house is the way to hell. Does this mean no more than that those who visit her will die? In Pr. xv. 24: "The way of life is above to the wise, that he may depart from hell beneath." A good man, here called wise, does not escape the grave, but he does escape hell. In Isa. xiv. 9, it is said to Belshazzar, "Hell from beneath is moved for thee to meet thee at thy coming, it stirreth up the dead for thee," etc. Now the grave never received Belshazzar. He never was buried. In v. 19 it is said, Thou art cast out of thy grave as an abominable branch, etc. The word here rendered grave is not Sheol, but the word which in Ps. v. 9 is rendered sepulchre, and in Ps. lxxxviii. 5, 11 the grave. Besides the grave is silent. In Isa. xiv. 10-20 hell is spoken of as a place abounding in taunts and derisions. Something more than the grave must be meant in all these places. Horne says, "All wickedness came originally with the wicked one from hell: thither it will be again remitted, and they who hold on its side must accompany it on its return to that place of torment, there to be shut up forever;" Clarke says the full rendering is, The wicked shall be turned "headlong into hell, down into hell. The original is very emphatic;" Scott: "The future condemnation of the wicked seems to be intended; for as all men go down to the grave, the word, rendered hell, must in this connexion have a more awful meaning;" Henry speaks here of Sheol as "a state of everlasting misery and torment; a pit of destruction, in which the wicked and all their comforts will be cast forever." Nor shall any of the incorrigibly wicked escape this dreadful doom. The word and is not in the original. It would have been better omitted here, so that we might read, The wicked shall be turned into hell, all nations that forget God. Numbers on the side of the wicked shall not save them. If whole nations forget God, whole nations shall perish. How mild these words, yet how terrible their import, if we consider the sin here spoken of—forgetfulness of God. Henry: "Forgetfulness of God is the cause of all the wickedness of the wicked." To forget God, or the Lord, occurs very often in Scripture and is descriptive of irreligion. It is not confined as Venema seems to think to those who "tread all law and righteousness beneath their feet, and manifest that they have thrown off all regard to God, the Judge of the world, and the avenger of crime." That forgetfulness of God naturally leads to the worst open sins, and does actually lead many into the greatest excesses is true. The same may be said of unbelief. But both these are spiritual sins. They may both be practised while there is a decent exterior. Let the reader examine Deut. viii. 14; Ps. cvi. 21; Isa. xvii. 10; Jer. iii. 21, and parallel passages, and he will see that forgetfulness of God is not necessarily and in all cases accompanied with the most profligate morals. It is a sin of the heart, the seat of depravity.

18. For the needy shall not always be forgotten. That is, by a well-known figure of speech he says, they shall never be forgotten. We have a like figure in 1 Pet. iv. 3. There seems to be an allusion to the preceding verse. q. d., if the wicked, even nations of them, forget God, yet it is a glorious truth, publish it abroad, that God shall not always seem to have forgotten the needy. The word, For, if that is the correct translation, gives the reason, why the wicked shall be turned into hell. But the word is elsewhere rendered surely, certainly, truly, assuredly, doubtless. See Gen. xxix. 32; Ex. iii. 12; Josh. ii. 24; 1 Kings i. 13; Isa. lxiii. 16. Either of these words would here give a very good sense. The word rendered, for, is also sometimes translated when, while, whereas, Gen. iv. 12; Deut. xix. 6; Gen. xxxi. 37. If this is the rendering we may read the two verses thus: The wicked shall be turned into hell, all nations that forget God; while (or whereas) the needy shall not be always forgotten. And because they are not forgotten, they shall not be ruined. The expectation of the poor shall not perish forever. The word not is properly supplied from the preceding clause, or we may read this hemistich as a question, Shall the expectation of the poor perish forever? A strong mode of asserting, it shall not. The word rendered needy is always in our version rendered poor or needy, except once when it is translated beggar. This is the first place in the Psalms, where it occurs. The word rendered poor in the last clause is the same that occurred in v. 12., and is there rendered humble, or in the margin afflicted. It is elsewhere in our version translated meek, lowly. Ps. xxv. 9; Pr. iii. 34. In both clauses the persons spoken of are the pious sufferers. Their full deliverance may be lawfully prayed for, as David does in the next verse.

19. Arise, O LORD; let not man prevail. Some here render man by adding a word such as frail, or mortal. On that point see Introduction, § 16. The prevailing of man is the carrying of his counsels and measures against the laws of God and the principles of righteousness. God is invoked to arise to his throne, and put down this monstrous state of things where a worm seems to be strong, as the word prevail might read, against omnipotence. And so let the heathen be judged in thy sight. The heathen, or nations here are the same spoken of in the whole Psalm. They had long vexed the people of God. The prayer is that God as Judge would decide against their cruel and unrighteous course. But the verb judge is often taken in a good sense. See Ps. lxxii. 4; Ecc. iii. 17; Isa. i. 17, and many other places. In this very Psalm, v. 4, the corresponding noun commonly rendered judgment is translated right. See also Ps. lxxii. 1; Isa. xxxii. 1; xlii. 1, 3, 4, and many other places. So that the prayer, Let the heathen be judged might perhaps signify, Let them be brought under the power of truth and righteousness. The serious difficulty to this view arises from the fact that the phrase in thy sight, and the whole preceding structure of the Psalm refer to God sitting as a Judge, and not to his becoming the author of salvation to the wicked. The only reason for supposing the word Judge to be here as in some other cases used in a good sense is the fact that the next verse has been so interpreted by some. In our version it reads:

20. Put them in fear, O LORD that the nations may know themselves to be but men. John Rogers' translation: O Lord, set a scolemaster over them, that the heithen maye knowe themselves to be but men. Coverdale: O Lorde, set a scolemaster over them. Fenwick renders it thus:

Let them a guide and teacher have, O Lord!
Their helpless state make thou the nations know.

Moller: Set a teacher over them, but he thinks teacher means one who chastises, as Cyrus was the teacher of Belshazzar. He says it cannot signify that the Holy Spirit was to be their teacher. Piscator mentions this view and expresses no dissent from it; Horsley: O Lord, place a teacher among them. Brent uses a Latin translation, which reads, Place a teacher over them; The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate and Doway all read, Put a law-giver over them; Morison: Place a teacher or law-giver over them; The Arabic: Appoint a teacher of the law over them; Bellarmine thinks it a prophecy respecting Constantine and other Christian Emperors, who were afterwards set over the nations. Scott first gives the sense as indicated by our translation and adds, "The original word, rendered fear, by varying a vowel point, means a Teacher; and in this sense the prayer is for their instruction and conversion. Bythner allows it may read, Instruct them. Having given the view suggested by the English version, as specially applied to Anti-Christian powers, Gill says, "Or these words are a prayer for the conversion of many among the nations, and may be rendered put, O Lord, fear in them; that is, the true grace of fear, that the nations may know themselves, their sin and guilt and danger, and know God in Christ, and Christ, and the way of salvation by him; for at the word know should be a stop, concluding a proposition, since the accent Athnach is there; and then follows another, they are men, Selah: destitute of the fear and grace of God, are capable of it, but cannot give it to themselves. Some notice that the word rendered fear sometimes means a razor, and refer to Judg. xiii. 5; Isa. vii. 20. Calvin, Cocceius, Patrick, Edwards, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander reject the foregoing interpretations, and suppose that our version gives the true idea, taking the word fear in the sense of dread. They are probably correct. Calvin: "The scope of the passage requires that we should understand it of fear or dread; and this is the opinion of all sound expositors." There is nothing malevolent in this prayer. It is a mercy to any man so far to be put in fear as to make him know that he is but a man, a frail, dying, feeble creature. Calvin says that David's "language is as if he had said, Lord, since it is their ignorance of themselves, which hurries them into their rage against me, make them actually to experience that their strength is not equal to their infatuated presumption, and after they are disappointed of their vain hopes, let them lie abashed and confounded with shame. It may often happen that those, who are convinced of their own weakness do not yet reform; but much is gained when their ungodly presumption is exposed to mockery and scorn before the world, that it may appear how ridiculous was the confidence which they presumed to place in their own strength. With respect to the chosen of God, they ought to profit under his chastisements after another manner. It becomes them to be humbled under a sense of their own weakness, and willingly to divest themselves of all vain confidence and presumption. And this will be the case, if they remember that they are but men."

For the sense of Selah see Introduction, § 15.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. What a great teacher is experience! How it enriches the soul with knowledge and with confidence. The Christian's strength is acquired in exercising himself unto godliness. Of this truth, this whole Psalm is proof.

2. The first great element of true religion is godly sincerity. When we begin to worship and do other duties with our whole heart, we begin to live, v. 1. Without this all our doings are dead works, offensive to God.

3. Hengstenberg: "A spirit of thankfulness is one of the marks by which the family of God is distinguished from the world. He who cannot from the heart give thanks shall beg in vain. The receiver raises himself more easily to the hope of future kindnesses, when he throws himself back on the remembrance of former benefits derived from the giver. The foundation of despair is always ingratitude," v. 1.

4. It is no less a duty than a privilege to recount God's wonders, v. 1. What a great advantage in this respect is possessed by old Christians, who have seen many marvellous tokens of God's love to his chosen. He, who has been in the wars, is commonly listened to with interest.

5. One good work or purpose naturally leads to another. If the people will heartily praise God, they will soon have something to tell of his wonderful works, v. 1.

6. In true religion nothing will satisfy but God himself, v. 2. Dickson: "Not any benefit or gift received of God, but God himself, and his free favor is matter of the believer's joy." Calvin remarks that David means to say "that he finds in God a full and overflowing abundance of joy, so that he is not under the necessity of seeking even the smallest drop in any other quarter."

7. We should find out the most fitting way of making known God's praises, vv. 2, 11, 14, and not tire in that good work. Horne: "He, who, with the spirit and the understanding, as well as with the voice, 'sings praise to thy name, O Most High,' is employed as the angels are, and experiences a foretaste of the delight they feel." Let us learn to sing with grace in our hearts, making melody to the Lord, praising him for existence, for his many temporal gifts, and passing to the higher themes of redemption and glory.

8. We need never fear that God will be dethroned, or overreached, or defeated.

He is the Most High, v. 2. His natural no less than his moral perfections put him beyond the reach of all malice, earthly and infernal.

9. How easily the wicked are discomfited. Their flight is a rout, v. 3. Their ruin comes like an armed man. Saints and sinners commonly both die a natural death, but any wise man had rather die the death of the Christian a thousand times than the death of the sinner once.

10. God's presence will confound any foe, v. 3. Nor should we make much of the means, but only of the Author of our deliverances from dismayed enemies. Dickson: "The way of giving God the glory in every action, and in special of our victories over our enemies, is to acknowledge him to be the chief worker thereof, and the creatures to be but instruments, by whom he turneth the enemy back."

11. The side God is on is sure to conquer, v. 4. No other reason of victory need be assigned. This covers the whole ground.

12. Past defeats should forewarn the wicked of the sad disasters and inevitable destruction, that must speedily come on them, v. 4. Since the world began, they have never carried a point. Even the death of Christ was the most dreadful blow ever given to the empire of darkness. And before they leave the shores of time the great mass of them confess that sin is a lie and the world a cheat. Who ever heard "the people of the world speak well of it at parting?"

13. At earthly tribunals a good cause is not enough to ensure success; but God is always with the right, v. 4. He judges righteous judgment. Three things should make our confidence in God perfect—"God is ever the same, and his throne remains unshaken—his administration of the affairs of the world is one of strict justice—he is still his people's refuge, and still the hearer of prayer."

14. The men, the cities, the nations, that have perished, might well warn every man inclined to revolt against God to beware, v. 5. The fall of every rebel is God's advertisement that none can transgress with impunity. The persecutors and persecuting powers of earth, when found irreclaimable, have always had a dreadful overthrow. Nations, inflamed by ambition, lusting for conquest, and regardless of right, have always sooner or later met a terrible doom. Clarke solemnly warns "all the nations of the earth, who, to enlarge their territory, increase their wealth, or extend their commerce, have made destructive wars. For the blood, which such nations have shed, their blood shall be shed."

15. The wicked and the righteous are every way opposite, v. 6. If one is right, the other must be wrong; if one pleases God, the other must be continually provoking the heavenly majesty; if one is saved, the other must be damned. The converse is true. If one is wrong, the other is right; if one shall be damned, the other must be saved. God cannot love both. He must love him, whose moral character is like that of his Maker.

16. Amidst all the changing scenes of earth and men, how glorious is the truth that God endures and reigns forever, v. 7. In human governments one dies and another succeeds. But he, who alone hath immortality, is on the throne of the universe. If on earth we have a good chief magistrate, we know not that he will live a day, nor have we any certainty that his successor will not be a foolish or bad man.

17. Because God cannot deny himself, he must preside over all human affairs. He cannot vacate the throne of judgment any more than he can cease to exist. Dickson: "Courts of justice among men are not always ready to hear plaintiffs; but the Lord holdeth court continually; the taking in of no man's complaint is delayed so much as one hour, though thousands should come at once, all of them with sundry petitions." Morison: "Delightful is it to feel, that the reign of evil will not be everlasting; that however long it may be permitted to exist, it shall, at last, cease; nor is it less reviving to know, that the reign of peace, and truth, and righteousness, shall be everlasting."

18. The day of judgment will be a great revealer, v. 8. It cannot be otherwise.

19. How vain is a religion of forms. How idle it is to attempt to hide ourselves in ordinances and ceremonies, seeing Jehovah himself is the refuge of his saints, v. 9.

20. God can easily put his people beyond the reach of their mightiest foes. He is their high place, v. 9.

21. The true knowledge of God promotes quietude. Henry: "The better God is known, the more he is trusted."

22. What everlasting pillars of truth are set up through all the Scriptures for the comfort of the saints, v. 10. See also Heb. xiii. 5. Every such doctrine and promise is as durable as the throne of God.

23. The duty of publishing all the truth, that shall be honorable to God and advance his kingdom, is no novelty, v. 11. The Old Testament reveals many of the principles on which the missionary enterprise rests. And in this work we have great encouragement; for, as Dickson says, "The acts of the Lord for his people are so stamped with the impression of his divinity, that they are able to purchase glory to God even among the nations that are without the church, and to draw them to him, and so it is not a needless, fruitless, or hopeless work to declare his doings among the nations."

24. Let men be warned against all murder and against all malice, which leads to murder, v. 12. Scott: "The blood of many martyrs has been shed, and their persecutors have supposed that no inquisition would be made for it: but from time to time the Lord anticipates that day when 'the earth shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain.' He is ever mindful of the cry of the humble."

25. Let not those persecuted for righteousness fear lest they shall be overlooked or forgotten by God, v. 12.

26. An humble, fervent prayer is never lost, v. 12. Chrysostom: "Prayer is a haven to the shipwrecked man, an anchor to them that are sinking in the waves, a staff to the limbs that totter, a mine of jewels to the poor, a healer of diseases, and a guardian of health. Prayer at once secures the continuance of our blessings, and dissipates the clouds of our calamities. O blessed prayer! thou art the unwearied conqueror of human woes, the firm foundation of human happiness, the source of ever-enduring joy, the mother of philosophy. The man who can pray truly, though languishing in extremest indigence, is richer than all beside; whilst the wretch who never bowed the knee, though proudly sitting as monarch of all nations, is of all men most destitute." Never give up prayer.

27. How harmonious is the character of a good man. He is called humble, v. 12, and yet the very same word may be rendered by other words and there will be no error taught. He is meek, he is afflicted, he is lowly. One evil passion may expel another so as completely to take its place, but the graces of the Christian all dwell together in unity.

28. The old way of coming to God, stripped of self-righteousness, is the best, the only way. The holiest mere man that ever lived had great need to cry for mercy, v. 13.

29. Great notice should be taken of the marvellous escapes from death which we experience, v. 13. God lifts us up from the gates of that dark prison. I know a man who was puny all his childhood, and in youth had so little health that it was often said, he will soon be in his grave. Almost invariably he was attacked with every prevailing malignant disease until he was thirty years old. Once in his early childhood he was within a few yards of a huge, ravenous bear. Soon after he was felled to the ground by a terrible blow from an axe, unintentionally inflicted on his face. Once he fell from a great height, and barely escaped death. Once he was so nearly drowned that his life was saved only by his crawling to shore on the bottom of the river. Once it seemed impossible but that he should be pitched headlong down a precipitous bank, towards which he and his wagon were borne by a powerful and uncontrollable team. He has been in a storm at sea under the command of a drunken captain, who soon afterwards lost his vessel in a gentle breeze in broad daylight inside the capes. Repeatedly has the most furious personal violence been threatened him. Often has he been in the power of drunken drivers, who had not sense enough to guide the gentlest team. Yet after more than a half century of such narrow escapes he still lives to recount God's mercies. Ought he not to do it with glowing love? And yet perhaps half his cotemporaries might narrate things no less strange.

30. Till God undertakes our cause we must despair. But with his aid we may shout on the field of battle before a gun is fired, or a sword drawn, v. 14.

31. Clarke: "There is nothing that a wicked man does that is not against his own interest. He is continually doing himself harm, and takes more pains to destroy his soul than the righteous man does to get his saved unto eternal life," vv. 15, 16.

32. How dreadful must be the doom of the wicked, v. 17. By whatever sound law of language we interpret the words of Scripture respecting their doom, we must tremble when we think of their passing out of time into eternity. Morison says that the seventeenth verse of this Psalm undoubtedly contains "a threatening of punishment in an unseen state of existence; and establishes the position that a future state of rewards and punishments was not unknown to the ancient Jewish church. Whatever difficulties may arise as to the critical meaning of the word hell, two things perhaps will be admitted; first, that it is here introduced as a threatening; and second, that it is intended to describe a fate peculiar to the wicked. If it be a threatening, it cannot be the peaceful repose of the grave; and if it be intended to represent the ignominy of the wicked, it must, of course, involve conscious existence; and if so, the hell spoken of can be neither more nor less than that prison of darkness, in which the spirits of the lost are reserved till the judgment of the great day."

33. Let the distressed people of God know that the day of their deliverance is at hand, v. 18. Their time is coming; and a blessed time it shall be. Mal. iii. 16-18.

34. However far the wicked may go, they shall establish nothing. God will arise, and their plans will be dissipated like the morning mist, v. 19.

35. Every decision that God has ever made, or ever shall make, has been or shall be against the wicked, v. 19.

36. What a blessing it would be if men but knew enough of themselves to abate their extravagant folly, and still more to give them some genuine modesty. Augustine says that "all man's humility consists in a knowledge of himself." But alas, "Sin doth so beset ignorant and graceless people, that they forget that they are mortal, and that God is their judge."

37. This whole Psalm shows that the church is not likely to be called to endure more than she has already triumphed over.

38. Will not each reader lay to heart these great and awful truths? Surely we all have an interest in securing salvation. But when shall it once be? Chalmers says, "Faith is the starting post of obedience; but what I want is, that you start immediately—that you wait not for more light to spiritualize your obedience; but that you work for more light, by yielding a present obedience up to the present light which you profess—that you stir up all the gift which is now in you; and this is the way to have the gift enlarged, that whatever your hand findeth to do in the way of service to God, you now do it with all your might. And the very fruit of doing it because of his authority, is that you will at length do it because of your own renovated taste. As you persevere in the labors of his service, you will grow in the likeness of his character. The graces of holiness will both brighten and multiply upon you. These will be your treasures, and treasures for heaven, too,—the delights of which mainly consist in the affections, and feelings, and congenial employments of the new creature.” Surely if men have any reason or sense left, they will use them to urge their flight from the wrath to come.

PSALM X.

- 1 Why standest thou afar off, O LORD? why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble?
- 2 The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor: let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined.
- 3 For the wicked boasteth of his heart's desire, and blesseth the covetous, whom the LORD abhorreth.
- 4 The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God: God is not in all his thoughts.
- 5 His ways are always grievous; thy judgments are far above out of his sight: as for all his enemies, he puffeth at them.
- 6 He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity.
7. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud: under his tongue is mischief and vanity.
- 8 He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor.
- 9 He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net.
- 10 He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones.
- 11 He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten: he hideth his face; he will never see it.
- 12 Arise, O LORD; O God, lift up thine hand: forget not the humble.
- 13 Wherefore doth the wicked condemn God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it.
- 14 Thou hast seen it; for thou beholdest mischief and spite, to require it with thy hand: the poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless.
- 15 Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none.
- 16 The LORD is King for ever and ever: the heathen are perished out of his land.
17. LORD, thou hast heard the desire of the humble: thou wilt prepare their heart, thou wilt cause thine ear to hear:
- 18 To judge the fatherless and the oppressed, that the man of the earth may no more oppress.

IN the Septuagint this Psalm is merged into the ninth so as with it to form one Psalm, and so as to change all the numbers by one on to the 114th Psalm, into which the 115th is also merged. To complete the number of one hundred and fifty the Septuagint divides our 116th Psalm into two and our 147th into two also, so that in the Septuagint, Ps. x., corresponds to our Ps. xi., and so on. Only the first NINE and the last THREE Psalms correspond in number in all the Bibles. The Vulgate and Doway follow the Septuagint. We follow the Hebrew original. The Vulgate and Doway admit that the union of Psalms ix. and x. in one is not according to the Hebrew. The reason for uniting the two may probably be found in the similarity of topics and in the modes of treating them. But this reason would as much apply to many other Psalms confessedly distinct. It is also probable that the absence of any title invited to this union. Even Venema joins it with the ninth. No one claims any original caption for it.

Many have expressed the opinion that this Psalm referred to particular times and events. Some have supposed that it respected Saul's persecution of David. No solid reason is given for this. It certainly derives very little strength from the contents of the Psalm. Piscator thinks it relates to domestic enemies. Others apply it to the invasion of Canaan by the hordes of Philistines. This receives some countenance from the contents, but very few will think the amount of evidence sufficient. Mudge and Edwards think "that this Psalm was penned when the Assyrians made inroads under Hezekiah." Some have thought it was written during the Babylonish captivity. Morison: "It is not, by any means, an improbable conjecture that the envious and persecuting conduct of Sanballat and his associates occasioned its composition by some unknown bard of Israel." Clarke also: "It was probably made in reference to Sanballat and the other enemies of the Jews." Some contend that it refers to the dreadful persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes and the times of the Maccabees. See Venema on the place. Luther, Bugenhagenius, Cocceius, Tillius, Gill and Fry think it refers to Antichrist. Luther and Gill insist on this view. The Syriac version has this caption: "Of the attack of the enemy on Adam and his race, and how Christ shall put down his arrogance." Horsley regards this Psalm as a general account of the oppression of the righteous by apostate spirits, atheists, and idolaters. He seems to have followed Patrick, who says this Psalm "is a most lively description of the insolency of wicked atheistical men, when they have power and are in authority." Slade thinks it "describes the character of some wicked and cruel enemy, or enemies, who persecuted David and the church in his day; and, no doubt, was intended to describe the enemies of Christ and his church." Calvin regards this Psalm as a complaint "that fraud, extortion, cruelty, violence, and all kinds of injustice prevailed everywhere in the world." Although Scott is inclined to the opinion that this Psalm was composed with reference to the persecutions of David and other good men during the reign of Saul, yet he makes this very just remark: "Several of the Psalms seem intentionally to have been written in general terms, that they might serve to direct the devotions of the church in persecution, and those of every believer in his personal troubles and afflictions." Hengstenberg is strongly in favor of its general character: "No trace is anywhere to be found of an individual reference." This is probably the correct view. The fact of so great diversity among good men who would give it a historic origin or interpretation rather tends to confirm this opinion. The Psalm suits the pious of very different countries and ages. Surely sinners in power often show very much the same dispositions towards God's people.

Those who hold that this Psalm was written after David's time do not of course regard him as the author. But Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Henry, Scott, Hitzig, Hengstenberg and Alexander very properly ascribe it to the "sweet Psalmist of Israel." It is found in the midst of Psalms, confessedly Davidic in authorship. Hengstenberg notices the fact that the words rendered in times of trouble in the first verse are found nowhere else but in Ps. ix. 9, which was written by David.

The names of the Almighty occurring in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and El God, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4.

Of course the date of this Psalm is put down according to the views of different writers respecting its authorship and the events it notices. Clarke thinks it was written B. C. 445, and Scott B. C. 1058. Cocceius: "This Psalm is indeed not difficult in its matter or sense; but some difficulty arises from the changeable manner of its construction and from the ambiguity of some words found in it."

1. Why standest thou afar off, O LORD? The verb in this clause is generally given in the present tense in modern versions. The original is in the future; so also is the Chaldee. Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic and Vulgate use the preterite. Alexander says the futures here and in the next clause imply the present with a prospect of continuance. The expostulation is reverent and not unusual. A like form was employed by the Saviour on the cross. It is based on the belief that God sees what is going on, has power to give relief, is a righteous God, and will finally do justice. Why then does he seem to be an indifferent spectator and withhold aid when it is so much needed? The question is repeated in other words: Why hidest thou thyself in times of trouble? The why is brought forward from the first clause and thyself is also supplied. All the old versions make both clauses of the verse interrogative. Some moderns drop the why and read Dost thou hide, etc. So Montanus and Ainsworth. But Venema drops the form of question in this clause; so also does Alexander, both of them reading, Thou wilt hide, etc.; Jebb: Thou hidest, etc.; Hengstenberg: Thou coverest, etc. These various renderings do not materially affect the sense. Either gives an idea weighty and solemn, but the parallelism is best preserved by retaining the interrogative form. The expostulation is thus strengthened. On the phrase in times of trouble, see above on Ps. ix. 9.

2. The wicked in his pride doth persecute the poor. There seems to be no good ground for including this verse, as Edwards does, in the same sentence with the first, and rendering it, During the insolence of the wicked, whilst he persecutes, etc. The word wicked here is the same that is so rendered in Ps. vii. 9; ix. 5; in Ps. i. 1, 4, 5, 6 and iii. 7 it is rendered ungodly. The word rendered pride is in Ps. lxxviii. 34 and in Deut. xxxiii. 26, 29 translated excellency. This has led some to think the word here refers to the elevated position, occupied by persecutors, and employed to oppress the righteous. Yet the word is commonly rendered pride, and so most think it should be translated here. The poor of this verse are the humble of Ps. ix. 12 and the poor of Ps. ix. 18. The word persecute some would read is inflamed or burneth. Some of the old translations as well as some critics so read. Although the word may be so rendered yet it is given pursued, hotly pursued, chased, Gen. xxxi. 36; Lam. iv. 19; 1 Sam. xvii. 53. In Ps. vii. 13 the participle is rendered persecutors. Our version is probably the best. The wicked are often "exceeding mad," hot with rage, against the afflicted people of God. The next clause reads, Let them be taken in the devices that they have imagined. Edwards: And they are taken in the plots that they have devised. The word here rendered devices is in v. 4 thoughts. It may be taken in either a good or bad sense. Here it is evidently in a bad sense. Fry and Horsley render it "subtleties." Horsley: "I choose this ambiguous word; being in doubt whether the petition against the wicked be that they may be ruined by their own stratagems against the righteous, or that they may be the dupes of their own atheistical speculations upon moral and religious subjects." This goes on the supposition that the wicked are caught in their own traps. If so, the idea is the same as is presented in Ps. vii. 14-16; ix. 15, 16. Horne and Morison seem inclined to favor the reading, They shall be taken, etc. This is better than that of our version. But none of these seem to give the true sense. It is not probable that the Psalmist here offers a petition. He does that towards the close of the Psalm. He is now stating his case. The Septuagint and Vulgate read, They are caught in the counsels which they have plotted. Venema, Gill, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander favor the interpretation, That the poor are caught in the devices of the wicked. This makes the words harmonize with the context. If this view be followed, the best sense is obtained by reading, They [the poor] are caught in the counsels which they [the wicked] have plotted.

3. For the wicked boasteth of his heart's desire. This rendering closely follows the Chaldee. The Septuagint and Vulgate: The sinner is praised in the desires of his soul; Syriac and Arabic: The ungodly glories in the lusts of his soul; Seeker and Horsley: The wicked is mad upon the desire of his soul; Hengstenberg: The wicked extols the desire of his soul. The word rendered boasteth is also very often rendered praise, sometimes glory, commend, celebrate. The sense is that the wicked here spoken of has ceased to be ashamed of his vileness, but openly speaks of it in a commendatory strain. Clarke: "This shows the excess of a depraved and embruted spirit. He, who can boast of his iniquity, is in the broad road to ruin. Should such a one repent, and turn to God, it will be equal to any miracle." Hengstenberg: "When the wicked ventures to laud in public the shameful lusts of his heart, as what need not shun the light, this is the highest degree of depravity, and betokens, at the same time, how secure he has become in consequence of his impunity, how sad the condition of the poor, how much occasion there is for such to fear, how necessary it hence is for God to interfere, and what reason there was for the why in the first verse." He, who has thus far departed from God, goes further, and blesseth the covetous, whom the LORD abhorreth. Mudge and Edwards read, And the greedy of gain blesseth himself; the marginal reading is, The covetous blesseth himself, he abhorreth the LORD. Fry: He adoreth gain, despising Jehovah; Calvin: The violent man blesseth himself; he despiseth Jehovah; Hengstenberg: Whosoever makes gain blesses, despises God; Alexander: And winning blesses, despises Jehovah. The last two authors regard this clause as parallel to Zech. xi. 3, 4, 5. If this is the correct view, then blesses has God for its object, and the man, who is filled with unlawful gains, is represented as attempting to sanctify, or at least to sanction his iniquities by blessing God for his unrighteous possessions; and in so doing he despises God, contemns his moral character, as if he would make him a partaker of his evil deeds. But our version gives a good sense, and has long been approved by pious scholars. The original fairly allows it. When a wicked man is quite vile and secure in his own sins, the next thing is to practise that gratuitous kind of iniquity, which consists in having pleasure in the sins of others. Rom. i. 32. The reader may see that the word whom is not in the Hebrew. If any change is made in the reading it would perhaps be best to follow Calvin in this last clause: The violent man blesseth himself; he despiseth Jehovah. But there seems to be no good reason for using violent instead of covetous. That the wicked bless the vile, who are successful, is evident from Ps. xlix. 16-18.

4. As a natural consequence of despising the LORD, the ungodly fall into general irreligion: The wicked, through the pride of his countenance, will not seek after God. Here and in the Chaldee, the words after God are supplied. Kimchi: "To seek God or to seek after God is a common phrase to designate the whole of religion." Dimock and Jebb read seek God. A wicked man's devices, and boastings, and pleasure in evil doers are tokens of a ruinous pride, which excludes all honest desires after the knowledge, favor, image, service and fellowship of God. Ainsworth: The wicked inquireth not into the height of his [God's] anger; Fry: The wicked in the pride of his anger inquireth not. In the Psalms as elsewhere anger is the more common rendering of the word which we here render countenance. But the English translation in this case is to be preferred. Bad tempers are the basis of all the cruelty, persecutions and irreligion of evil men. Calvin would read, The wicked, etc. inquireth not; Edwards: He will make no inquiry. Calvin thinks that supplying any noun improperly limits the signification: "David simply means, that the ungodly, without examination, permit themselves to do anything, or do not distinguish between what is lawful and unlawful because their own lust is their law, yea, rather, as if superior to all laws, they fancy it is lawful for them to do whatever they please. The beginning of well-doing in a man's life is inquiry. . . The exercise of inquiry proceeds from humility, when we assign to God, as is reasonable, the place of Judge and Ruler over us;" but Hengstenberg, following Venema, who had followed Dieu, would read it: The wicked, in his pride (says) he (God) searches, or perceives not. The Hebrew verb in this sentence is that found in Ps. ix. 10, 12, rendered seek and make inquisition; and in vv. 13, 14 of this Psalm, rendered require and seek out. So that this makes the wicked deny a providence. In accordance with this view, Venema says of these men, "Their counsels and projects were such, that in their very nature they involved the denial of God, and if an inference might be drawn from these concerning the faith of those who entertain them, we should conclude them to be deniers of God." Either of these interpretations gives us a weighty doctrine consistent with truth elsewhere clearly revealed. Yet that which leaves the text very much as it is in our common version, will probably be found, on full investigation, the most satisfactory. The natural tendency of every error is to downright atheism. This ungodly man was ready for any gross opinion, and so it is added, God is not in all his thoughts. The is is here properly supplied. The literal rendering of the Hebrew is, No God, all his thoughts. The Septuagint and Vulgate read, God is not before his face; Arabic: God is not before him; Syriac: Nor is God in all his thoughts; Edwards: He will make no inquiry; There is no God, are all his wicked thoughts; Waterland: All his thoughts are without God; Jebb: There is no God, are all his thoughts; Brent: All his thoughts tend to this, that there is no God; the margin: All his thoughts are, There is no God; Mudge: No God is all his wicked politics; Horsley: No God is the whole of his philosophy; Hengstenberg: God is not, are all his purposes; q. d., his purposes are a continued practical denial of God; Alexander: He will not require, there is no God—are all his thoughts; Fry: "There is no God," is all his thought. For thoughts Ainsworth reads "presumptuous cogitations." Chaldee: He says in his heart that all his thoughts are not manifest to God. It will be remembered that the word rendered thoughts is in v. 2 translated devices. To say that God is not in all his devices, that is, that he lives, and plans, and feels, and thinks as if he were persuaded that there is no God is as good a sense and as consistent with the text and context as any other.

5. His ways are always grievous. The Septuagint: His ways are always profane; Arabic: He defiles his ways; John Rogers' translation: His wayes are allwaye filthye; Genevan translation: His wayes alway prosper; Schroeder: His ways are crooked; Calvin, Venema and Hengstenberg: His ways are always prosperous; Horsley and Fry: His ways are ever confident; Alexander: His ways are firm in all time; Bernard's Bible: His ways are always secure; Edwards: His ways are impious at all times. For grievous Edwards reads perverse; Slade, offensive and hurtful. These renderings are of three classes; one asserts his ways to be sinful, wicked, profane, defiled, filthy, crooked, impious, perverse; the second represents them as successful, prosperous, firm, confident, secure; i. e., he has no fears and no reverses; the third is that his ways are sorrowful, grievous, painful, vexatious, to himself at least, and perhaps to others also. The difficulty in the case arises from this, that all these explanations are in accordance with facts often existing in the lives of the wicked, and with the teachings of Scripture respecting them; and from the further fact that the original will bear various renderings, the translations differing according to the derivation of one word. A forcible reason for preferring the Genevan translation in this case is that it best suits the context. The Psalmist is expostulating with God on the existing state of things, and he brings in the persecutions, artifices, boastings, pride, and atheism of the wicked; and to crown all, he adds that this man is prosperous. Moreover he is as stupid as he is vile; for thy judgments are far above out of his sight. The mind of such a man is debased, "the thoughts are otherwise occupied, the taste is perverted, the conscience is seared, the judgment itself is bewildered; nothing, in short, pertaining to the spiritual world can be seen in its true character." God's judgments, whether by that term we understand the decisions of his word, his usual and righteous sway over the events of life, or the terrific displays of his anger sometimes made against atrocious rebels, are quite beyond the apprehension of such a besotted man, quite out of his sight. He is blind and cannot see afar off. This is the most obvious sense. But Hengstenberg thinks it has regard to his exemption from afflictions—"thy righteous chastisements are so far removed from him, that they never reach him." If this is the correct view, this clause is no advance on the last, but only a repetition. Alexander thinks this "clause describes him as untouched or unaffected by God's providential judgments." When a man ceases to fear God, he soon learns not to regard men, Luke xviii. 2, 4. So here: As for all his enemies, he puffeth at them. The Septuagint, Vulgate and Arabic read, He lords it over them; Chaldee: He is wrathful towards them; Ainsworth thinks it means that he defies them; Syriac: He despises them; Patrick's paraphrase: He contemns them all and values them not a straw; Clarke: "He whistles at them; insults God, and despises men. He overthrows them with his breath; he has only to give orders and they are destroyed;" Hengstenberg: He blows at them, i. e., he drives them away with little trouble, he has only to breathe and they vanish. This clause describes him, says Alexander, "as easily ridding himself of all his human adversaries." Venema, however, properly suggests that this language refers to his own estimate of what he can do. Using the plural instead of the singular respecting the wicked, Calvin gives this explanation of the whole verse: "As they enjoy a continued course of prosperity, they dream that God is bound or plighted to them; and hence they put his judgments far from them; and if any man oppose them, they are confident they can immediately put him down, or dash him to pieces with a puff or breath."

So confident is he that,

6. He hath said in his heart, I shall not be moved: for I shall never be in adversity. The first negative here is very strong, q. d., I shall not from age to age, I shall not generation upon generation, I shall not in all coming ages, I shall never, no never be moved. Edwards employs simply never. Hengstenberg says, The meaning is: Misfortune shall never overtake me. Horne gives the spirit of the passage: "Prosperity begets presumption, and he who has been long accustomed to see his designs succeed, begins to think it impossible they should ever do otherwise. The long-suffering of God, instead of leading such an one to repentance, only hardens him in his iniquity. Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, he thinks it will not be executed at all. He vaunteth himself, therefore, like the proud Chaldean monarch, in the Babylon which he hath erected, and fondly pronounceth it to be immortal. Such, it is too evident, are often the vain imaginations of triumphant wickedness." The word rendered adversity in the last clause is used to express both natural evil, and moral evil. Here it evidently means natural evil. In this sense it is also translated evil, wretchedness, hurt, trouble, affliction. This vain man says, he shall never see these things. So strong and so strange are these delusions of wicked men, that some have thought we have here an ideal personage. But it is not necessary to frame such a device. Many a wicked man thinks all this, see Isaiah xxviii. 15. That is he says it in his heart, in his wish, in his desire, and often he believes this horrid lie. He does not stop to think soberly or honestly, for wickedness, trouble, mischief, misery, travail, grievousness, iniquity, etc. The word vanity is in our version elsewhere rendered iniquity (the rendering also of Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Alexander) mischief (used also by Hengstenberg) affliction, wickedness, etc. Surely when the ruling power of a country was in the hands of a man or men ready to do such deeds, it was high time for the righteous to call on God, and it was time for him to work. Some think that the imagery of this verse is partly drawn from serpents, which carry their poison in their mouths, under their tongue. It may be so, Ps. cxl. 3. But it is probable that it refers to the sweet morsel under the tongue, Job xx. 12. Such vileness of character will show itself; and so, "From words the description proceeds to actions."

7. His mouth is full of cursing and deceit and fraud; under his tongue is mischief and vanity. The word here rendered cursing, is elsewhere oath, swearing, Jer. xxiii. 10; curse, Job xxxi. 30; execration, Jer. xlii. 18; Calvin adds, perjury; the word deceit is plural, deceits, and is elsewhere subtily, treachery; the word fraud is in our version always rendered so, or deceit. Calvin gives it malice; Fry, injury; Hengstenberg, oppression. For mischief the church of England reads ungodliness; Hengstenberg, sorrow; Alexander, trouble; in our version it is elsewhere rendered perverseness, sorrow,

8. He sitteth in the lurking-places of the villages: in the secret places doth he murder the innocent: his eyes are privily set against the poor. All the verbs in this verse are in Hebrew in the future, and are so given by Calvin and Alexander. Calvin says he leaves these verbs in the future, "because they imply a continued act, and also because this Hebrew idiom has extended even to other languages." Many have been perplexed with this and the two following verses by regarding them as a literal description of the wicked previously noticed, whereas they contain the language of bold comparison; q. d., he is like the lurking, cruel, sneaking felon. Thieves have long had their dens; murderers, their caves; and robbers, their plots. Striking parallel passages are in Job xxiv. 14-17; Ps. lvi. 6; Pr. i. 11, 12. John Rogers' translation is, He sytteth lurking in the gardens; the Bishops' Bible: He sitteth lurking in the thievish corners of the streetes; Horsley gives the whole verse thus, "He sitteth in ambush in the villages in secret places; he murdereth the innocent; his eyes are ever watching for the helpless." In a note he expresses a preference for another form of rendering the first clause: "He sitteth prowling about the farm-houses." He adds, "The image is that of a beast of prey of the lesser order, a fox or a wolf, lying upon the watch about the farm-yard in the evening." Perhaps no other commentator agrees with Horsley in this view. The assassin, murderer and robber seem to be in the writer's mind. Scott applies it to Saul's bloody and deceitful conduct; Clark, to the insidious behaviour of Sanballat and his companions. But it cannot be shown that the Psalm has a special reference to any particular person. The word rendered villages is often found. In the singular it generally signifies an enclosure or court as of the temple, or tabernacle, of a prison, or of a king's house. In the plural it is rendered courts in Ps. lxxv. 4; lxxxiv. 2, 10. It is also rendered towns, and in many cases villages. In our version it is never rendered palace or palaces. Yet upon the supposition that it may be so translated is based the remark of Gill that "the allusion is not to mean thieves and robbers, but to persons of note and figure. Hence the Septuagint, the Vulgate, Arabic and Ethiopic versions render it, he sitteth in lurking-places with the rich; and may be fitly applied to the pope and his cardinals." But there is no proof that this Psalm is prophetic of events under the gospel further than that what wicked persecutors are in one age they will in like circumstances be in all ages. All the enemies of God's people, when unrestrained, display the worst tempers. If intrigue, deceit, oppression, iniquity, blood-thirstiness and violence could have exterminated the church of God, there would not have been left of it a vestige. The word rendered poor in the last clause is found in this Psalm, vv. 8, 10, 14, and nowhere else. The rendering in our version is uniform. In many other places poor is equivalent to humble; here, to afflicted. Alexander uses the word sufferer. Calvin reads the last clause, His eyes will take their aim, etc., and adds that their eyes are bent or leering, by a similitude borrowed from the practice of dart-shooters, who take aim with leering, or half-shut eyes, etc. Mant uses the phrase peering eyes, and assigns the same reason as given by Calvin above. But the simile drawn from the felons of those ancient times did not cover the whole ground. Therefore it is said,

9. He lieth in wait secretly, as a lion in his den: he lieth in wait to catch the poor: he doth catch the poor, when he draweth him into his net. For den Gesenius and Horsley read lair. In Jer. xxv. 38, it is covert. The word twice rendered poor in this verse is not the same found in v. 8, but that found in vv. 2, 12 in the latter case rendered humble. It is also rendered humble in Ps. ix. 12 and poor in Ps. ix. 18. In this verse the comparison is changed from that of an assassin and murderer to that of a lion and then again to that of a hunter. Calvin and Alexander also very properly retain the futures in this verse, and for the reason given under the last. Violence, cunning and cruelty are the ideas here involved. There has never been an honest, candid, kind, gentle, tender-hearted persecutor of God's servants. Net, the same as in Ps. ix. 15.

10. He croucheth, and humbleth himself, that the poor may fall by his strong ones. There is much diversity in the rendering of this clause. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Vulgate: He will crouch and fall when he shall have power over (or overcome) the poor; Syriac: He shall lie low and fall, and in his bones are or shall be grief and pangs; Ainsworth: He [the lion] falleth with his strong paws on the troop of poor; Brent: He smites, he humbles, and violently casts down the poor; Edwards: The feeble are borne down, and fall by his superior strength; Calvin: He will crouch low, and cast himself down, and then shall an army of the afflicted fall by his strengths, or by his strong members; Fry: He croucheth, he stoopeth, and falleth down. The wretched are in his snares; church of England: He falleth down and humbleth himself, that the congregation of the poor may fall into the hands of his captains; Amesius: He lessens himself, he bends himself, he falls down flat in all his limbs as if they had no strength; Jebb: And the destitute fall by his strong ones; Hengstenberg: Crushed, he [the poor man] sinks down; and the poor falls through his strong ones; Alexander: And bruised he will sink; and by his strong ones fall the sufferers. The margin for croucheth reads breaketh himself. The following explanations are offered. The word rendered poor is here plural. It is a long word and some think it is composed of two words, the first of which means company, army, congregation, troop. Scholars of former times held this view more than those who have written in the present century. The teaching is precisely the same whether we say the afflicted generally, or the company of the afflicted. The word strong is also a plural adjective, and has no noun following it. Some think the figure of a lion is not kept up here, but suppose the wicked is spoken of as a persecutor in power and so they add ones, meaning men and captains. Others suppose he is here spoken of as a hunter and so they read snares, meaning strong snares. This gives us precisely the same idea of the enemy, on the whole, as if we suppose with many that the figure of a lion is to be preserved in the whole verse. In that case we read strong parts, limbs, bones, jaws, paws, members, teeth. The Assembly's Annotations gives teeth or paws. This explanation is probably to be preferred. It is harmonious throughout; it is drawn from the context; it is consistent with the habits of the lion; it suits the meaning of the words. Buffon says, "When the lion leaps upon his prey he gives a spring of ten or fifteen feet, falls on it, seizes it with his fore paws, tears it with his claws, and afterwards devours it with his teeth." Cumming gives quite the same account of the habits of this animal. Indeed they are notorious. If this view is correct then the sense is that the wicked imitates the lion in crouching, lying low, not showing himself, seeming even careless about his prey, but at the moment when without trouble he has his victims in his power, he pounces upon the harmless and defenceless, and they are overcome at once. If any more satisfactory exposition has been furnished let it be adopted. The simile of a lion is here dropped, and the wicked is next spoken of as an infidel or atheist, as in vv. 2-7.

11. He hath said in his heart, God hath forgotten : he hideth his face ; he will never see it. For the import of the first clause see comment on v. 6. Although all the Hebrew verbs here are in the preterite, yet our translation probably gives the sense of the whole by employing the past, present and future. See Introduction, § 6. The word rendered never would literally be not forever, not to eternity. The sense is that the wicked denies that God has a providence over the world, that he remembers, sees, or has his face turned towards human affairs, or holds men accountable to him. They deny his moral government. That the wicked rise to this awful height of presumption is elsewhere declared, Isa. xxix. 15. God's delay to punish sinners is not pardon of their sins ; it is not even connivance, though they often think it is. Such dreadful atheism makes the case urgent, and so David says :

12. Arise, O LORD ; i. e., arise to thy throne of judgment. See Ps. ix. 19. Try and decide this cause. O God, lift up thine hand. For the name here given to God, see Ps. v. 4. He is invoked not only to give a decision, but also to execute it. The hand is lifted up for various purposes. Here it seems to be equivalent to address thyself to this matter. Forget not the humble. The reference is clearly to v. 11. The same verb is used in both places. For remarks on humble see Ps. ix. 12. The import of the prayer is, Show all men that these thy enemies are mistaken in saying that thou hast forgotten the cause between thy people and their persecutors.

13. Wherefore doth the wicked contemn God? he hath said in his heart, Thou wilt not require it. The phrase in his heart is here found for the third time in this Psalm. See above on v. 6. For contemn many read despise. But in Hebrew it is the past tense, hath despised, hath contemned ; i. e., why has the wicked been allowed so long to despise or contemn God? The word here rendered doth contemn is in v. 3 abhorred. The church of England reads, Wherefore should the wicked blaspheme God, while he doth say in his heart, Tush, thou God carest not for it? This verb is rendered by provoke, abhor, blaspheme, contemn, despise. Besides the two places in this Psalm, see Ps. cvii. 11 ; Pr. i. 30 ; Nu. xvi. 30 ; Ps. lxxiv. 18. Why should the wicked do either or all of these things? He who does one of them will do them all. The Scripture word blaspheme does not necessarily imply scornful railing, but only evil speaking of any description. The oldest translations terminate the interrogation with the first clause, but Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander continue it to the end of the verse. The word here rendered require is found also in Ps. ix. 10, 12, and in vv. 4, 15 of this Psalm. See comment on Ps. ix. 12. Edwards' translation gives the sense, Why should the wicked despise God? Why should he say in his heart, Thou wilt make no inquisition?

14. Thou hast seen it ; for thou beholdest mischief and spite to requite it with thy hand. That is, Thou, who seest all things, hast seen all this wrong of which I complain ; although the wicked say the contrary, v. 11. Nor art thou indifferent to mischief and spite. Edwards has mischief and injustice ; church of England, ungodliness and wrong ; Calvin, mischief and vexation ; Hengstenberg, suffering and anger ; Alexander, trouble and persecution ; Doway, labor and sorrow. The word rendered mischief is the same that is so rendered in Ps. vii. 14, 16 ; in Ps. xxv. 18, pain ; in Ps. lv. 10, sorrow ; in Ps. lxxiii. 5, trouble ; in Ps. xc. 10, labor ; in Prov. xxxi. 7, misery. The word rendered spite is in Ps. vi. 7, rendered grief ; in Ps. lxxxv. 4, anger ; in Prov. xii. 16, wrath ; in Eccle. vii. 3, sorrow ; in 1 Kings xxi. 22, provocation. God sees and marks all these things whether we are the objects or the subjects of them. In particular he never fails to mark for retribution all the unwept and unforsaken cruelties and wrongs manifested to his people. The Chaldee reads, It is known (or clear) unto thee, that thou wilt send upon the wicked sorrow and wrath; thou lookest to render a good reward to the righteous. The word rendered requite here is in Ps. i. 3, bring forth; in Ps. ii. 8, give; in Ps. iv. 7, put; in Ps. viii. 1, set. Elsewhere it means to deliver, to grant, etc. To give what is due is the sense here. Thus confidence in God's moral character is maintained. And so the poor committeth himself unto thee; thou art the helper of the fatherless. The word poor is the same as in vv. 8, 10, found in this Psalm only. The word rendered fatherless is never in our version translated otherwise, yet it often has the sense of friendless, forlorn, comfortless. So we have a variety of versions of these clauses all good, though some are excellent. The Septuagint and Vulgate: The poor is left to thee, and to the orphan thou wilt be a helper; Arabic: In thee the poor is comforted; thou art the help of the orphan; Syriac: To thee the poor commits himself, and thou art the helper of the orphan; Chaldee: In thee the poor shall hope; thou wilt sustain the orphan; Calvin: Upon thee shall the poor leave [himself and his concerns]; thou shalt be a helper to the fatherless; church of England: The poor committeth himself unto thee; for thou art the helper of the friendless; Edwards: The feeble leaveth himself to thee; for thou art the helper of the friendless; Amesius: He, who is wanting in strength, commits himself to thy faithfulness, and thou art the helper of the orphan boy; Venema: To thee each sorrowful one leaves it, thou hast been the helper of the fatherless; Brent: On thee the poor is cast; to the orphan thou art a helper; Jebb: To thee the destitute committeth himself: The fatherless, it is Thou who art indeed his helper; Fry: Upon thee the wretched casteth himself: thou hast been the helper of the destitute; Hengstenberg: The poor surrenders to thee. The orphan, thou art the helper; Alexander: Upon thee the sufferer will leave [his burden]. An orphan thou hast been helping. Not one of these renderings teaches error. We have here a delightful illustration of the harmony of God's people in their views of practical truth, and of the rich and varied fulness of the promises of God.

15. Break thou the arm of the wicked and the evil man: seek out his wickedness till thou find none. To break the arm is utterly to destroy the power. Our version agrees with the ancient versions. For evil Edwards reads flagitious; church of England, malicious; Alexander, bad. Fry reads this clause, The arm of the wicked is broken; thus making the pious sufferer rejoice in a deliverance fully secured by relief already experienced, or by faith distinctly foreseen. The word man is supplied in our version. The word rendered evil may be either an adjective or a noun. As the latter it is found in Ps. v. 4; vii. 4, 9; x. 6. Commonly in the Psalms it points to a person. This has led some to terminate the first clause with the word wicked. Hengstenberg reads the last clause—and the evil, seek out his wickedness, find them not. The sense he gathers is, Thou mayest seek his wickedness, and not find it. That is, it will be utterly overthrown and, as it were, annihilated; Houbigant: Seek out for his iniquity, that it may not prevail; Fry: Thou mayest search for the wicked, thou canst not find him; Dimock: Thou shalt seek the wicked, but shalt not find him. But the word rendered seek is the same as is found in Ps. ix. 10, 12; x. 4, 13. Some think it has the same meaning here as in v. 13, require; Houbigant has it require his iniquity. And so they understand the Psalmist as asking God so to subvert and bring to naught this wickedness that not a trace of it shall be left even where it seemed most rampant. This view is confirmed by the next verse. Clarke paraphrases it, Continue to judge and punish transgressors, till not one is to be found. For the form of imprecation here used, see Introduction, § 6.

16. The LORD is King for ever and ever. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Vulgate read this clause in the future; The Lord shall be king, or shall reign forever. The verb is here supplied. See comment on Psalm ix. 5. Scott says, The original words rendered for ever and ever appear "always strictly to denote eternity." All comfort would at once fail God's people, if there was a shadow of doubt thrown over the stability and eternity of the divine government. In proof of the truth of the two preceding clauses a great and notorious fact is called up: The heathen are perished out of his land; Fry reads, from off his earth, i. e., God's earth, God's land; either the whole earth, or that part of it, which they once inhabited. The word is the same so often rendered earth in the early part of Genesis. It is also rendered land, country, ground. Hitherto in the Psalms it has been rendered earth. Ps. ii. 2, 8, 10; viii. 1, 9. The heathen here are called by the same Hebrew name as in Ps. ii. 1, 8; ix. 5, 15, 17, 19, 20.

17. LORD, thou hast heard the desire of the humble. It is often said God hears the prayers and cries of his people. In Ps. v. 1, he is asked to hear a meditation. Here it is said he has heard a desire. Right desires are in God's esteem good prayers. In v. 3, the wicked is said to boast of his heart's desire; but the righteous was too humble to boast; he longed; he had his desire; God heard it—the same word is used in both verses. The humble are the needy, the meek, the afflicted, the poor. The same word as in Ps. ix. 12, 18; x. 12, is rendered humble and poor. This clause may teach that God has been in the habit of hearing the desire of the meek, or that he has done so in this particular case. The latter is probably what is here intended. If so, then the sense may be that God has done so, either in the anticipations of a strong faith, or in the terrible overthrow already visited on the enemy. There was good cause for the favorable regard shown to the wishes of the righteous. Thou wilt prepare their heart, i. e. God by his Holy Spirit has always given his people right dispositions before him, and he always will do it. The mercy here spoken of is never to be discontinued, Rom. viii. 26. Of course God will honor and answer the desires put into the hearts of his people by the Comforter. This is the more obvious sense of the passage, and is adopted by Henry, Scott, and others. Clarke says, "See the economy of the grace of God; 1. God prepares the heart; 2. suggests the prayer; 3. Hears what is prayed; 4. Answers the petition. He who has got a cry in his heart after God, may rest assured that that cry proceeded from a Divine preparation, and that an answer will soon arrive. No man ever had a cry in his heart after salvation but from God. He, who continues to cry, shall infallibly be heard." The most common rendering of this and some other forms of the verb of this clause is to prepare or make ready. See Gen. xliii. 25; 1 Chron. xv. 1; Ps. lxxv. 9; Pr. xxx. 25. Yet good scholars have suggested other renderings. Some instead of prepare read direct. This is much the same as prepare. If God directs our hearts, that is the very preparation we need in prayer and in all duties. This rendering of the word is elsewhere sometimes found in our version. Fry, reads strengthenest, but in none of its forms is the verb ever so translated in our English Bible. Boothroyd, Horsley and Jebb, prefer establish. This is frequently the meaning of the word, and it is so rendered by our translators. Ps. lxxxix. 2, 4; 2 Chron. xvii. 5. With this substantially agrees the rendering of Hengstenberg, Make firm; and of Alexander, Settle (or confirm.) Yet how does God establish the hearts of his people but by giving them grace, which leads them to cry mightily to him for help, and then granting them strength? Perhaps most will prefer our common version. For, Thou wilt cause thine ear to hear. Calvin: "The meaning of this clause is, that it is not in vain that God directs the hearts of his people, and leads them in obedience to his command, to look to Himself, and to call upon him in hope and patience,—it is not in vain, because his ears are never shut against their groanings. Thus the mutual harmony between two religious exercises is here commended. God does not suffer the faith of his servants to fail, nor does he suffer them to desist from praying; but he keeps them near him by faith and prayer, until it actually appears that their hope has been neither vain nor ineffectual."

18. This verse is connected with the preceding. God will hear cries and grant desires offered to him, to judge the fatherless and the oppressed. The fatherless, the same word and of the same import as in v. 14. Oppressed, the same as in Ps. ix. 9, found four times, thrice rendered oppressed, once in Pr. xxvi. 28, afflicted. The word judge is the same as in previous Psalms. The meaning is that God will decide in favor of the defenceless and the wronged. And he will do this, that the man of the earth may no more oppress. There is benevolence in all God does. His government is amiable. So far as it is respected and honored, his creatures are happy. Indeed the only perfectly joyful society in the universe is one, where there is never an infraction of any law of God. But some men will not learn by words. Examples must be put before them. Such is "the man of the earth," a phrase found nowhere else, but like men of the world, found in Ps. xvii. 14, although in the Hebrew the two phrases have not a word in common. The man of the earth is earthy, terrestrial, in his aims, hopes and desires. The men of the world have their portion in this life. They may become persecutors and oppressors at any moment. Compare these verses. For oppress some read out-brave, withstand, terrify. Mudge gives this paraphrase: "This worthless mortal, how much soever a man of earth, cherished with all its favors, and supported with all its strength, shall no longer be able to terrify the people of Jehovah, the God of heaven."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is no new thing for God to seem for a while to leave his people to the power of their enemies, v. 1. This ought not to cast them down. God's servants of former days endured all this, and yet came off conquerors.

2. There is not in all the militant church of Christ a case of wrong suffered, or of persecution endured so bad as to render it doubtful whether we should at once bring it before God, v. 1. "Good people would be undone, if they had not a God to go to, a God to trust in, and a future bliss to hope for." Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you. It is God's office, work and personal delight to help the feeble and defend the injured.

3. However sore may be the trials of his saints, God never finally, nor totally forsakes them. True, as Henry says, "God's withdrawals are very grievous to his people at any time, but especially in times of trouble." But God's time of coming to the rescue is often the nearest, when we think it furthest off. "Man's extremity is God's opportunity." Amesius draws this as the first lesson from this Psalm, that "in their straits pious men chiefly complain of the absence of God; because they have found that in all that concerns them, God and his providence are chiefly to be regarded, because the absence of God is cause of the greatest consternation to all creatures, and because the presence of God brings adequate consolation against all evils."

4. The abuse of God's patience and mercy by each successive generation of his enemies does not seem to vary in the least particular. The cavils, and scoffs, and arts of the wicked, when they dare indulge them, have a tedious uniformity. The language of the wicked found in this Psalm has been repeated in every succeeding age. See other Psalms, the prophets, the evangelists, the last chapter of second Peter, and church history generally.

5. Persecution is no new thing, v. 2. When God's people have much of the Spirit of Christ, and when Christ's enemies have the power, the blood of the martyrs will flow. But blessed be God, it is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong. The temper of the wicked cares not for righteousness if they can have their way. Their pride will carry them on. Henry: "Tyranny, both in State and Church, owes its original to pride;" Horne: "Inconceivable is that malignant fury, with which a conceited infidel persecutes an humble believer, though that believer hath no otherwise offended him than by being such." Were there any mercy in the hearts of persecutors, the harmlessness and the helplessness of God's people would awaken their compassions. But they are relentless. Truly it is a great mercy to be kept out of the power of the wicked. No wonder God is aroused by the violence done to his saints.

6. Nor is it any new thing for the wicked to glory in their shame, v. 3. They have long been foaming it out.

7. But let men beware how they attempt to sanction their wickedness by pleading that God gives them power, v. 3; Isa. x. 12-15.

8. One of the most dangerous things man can do is to bless wicked men, to put bitter for sweet and light for darkness, v. 3. He, whose commendations are for the vilest, is utterly ruined.

9. Will men ever learn the evil of covetousness? It is the root of all evil. It is condemned in the moral law, in the Psalms, in the prophets, in the gospels, in the epistles, by conscience, by common sense, by the voice of mankind, by many dreadful examples made of men, who were greedy of gain. The covetous man abhorreth the Lord, and the Lord abhorreth him, v. 3. It is no more possible for a man to be saved without hating covetousness, than for him to be saved without hating lying or murder.

10. Pride is a sin of like description, vv. 3, 4. It turns all blessings into curses. It makes men shameless. It is denounced by all, renounced by few. One is proud of his humble origin, another of his noble birth, one of his fine clothing, another of his rough garments, one of his virtues, another of his vices. There is no ascertainable difference in the destructive tendency of the different kinds of pride, Pr. xvi. 18; xxix. 23.

11. One of Amesius' lessons drawn from this Psalm is that "In nothing does the impiety of the proud overleap all bounds more than in this that they are accustomed to praise themselves and those who resemble them in wickedness," v. 3; Deut. xxix. 19, 20, 21.

12. A sufficient cause of the irreligion of all wicked men is found in their bad passions, vv. 3, 4. What crowds of men, like King Saul, have convictions, and sometimes express them with seriousness and tenderness, but are hurried away into sin by their self-will, malice, worldliness, ambition, or jealousy.

13. And how can men be expected to come to a saving knowledge of divine things, when they will not seek to be informed? v. 4. No honest inquirer after truth has ever perished. The personal history of every infidel gives the clue to his skepticism. It is a fact that the history of the world has not yet told us of one calm, praying, unprejudiced rejecter of Gospel doctrine and Gospel mercy.

14. If sin had its way, it would both dethrone and annihilate God, v. 4. As far as it can, it acts and feels and thinks as if he existed not.

15. We should not be surprised at finding the sinner vile, v. 5. Security in sin is an infallible token of impiety, no less than gross outbreakings. All transgressions are the fruit of an unregenerate heart. It ought to confound us, if an evil tree brought forth good fruit.

16. Nor should we be surprised to find the ways of sinners grievous even to themselves, v. 5. The wicked always were and always must be like the troubled sea.

17. Nor should the prosperity of the wicked amaze us, v. 5. They get nothing worth having in eternity. They get all their good things in this life.

18. It is no new thing for sinful men to lack spiritual discernment, v. 5. They are so blinded by sin, so in love with delusion, that, without a supernatural change, they cannot perceive any beauty even in holiness.

19. "If thou seest the perversion of the poor and violent perverting of judgment and justice in a province, marvel not at the matter," v. 5. It was so in Solomon's day; it has always been so; but God will yet put all right.

20. Though wicked men do sometimes rise to wondrous heights of power, yet their arrogance commonly rises still higher, v. 5.

21. The incorrigibly wicked could not continue in the secure commission of his sins but for some strange delusions, some remarkable rejection of evidence, some wonderful capacity of false reasoning, v. 6. A living man may as wisely say, I shall never die, as a prosperous man say, I shall never be in adversity, or as a sinner say, I shall not lose my soul.

22. None will be more surprised than the wicked themselves at the depth and suddenness of their fall. This is unavoidable, if they remain in unbelief. An angel from heaven could not open their eyes to see their coming doom, if they have no willingness to know the truth, vv. 6, 7.

23. There is a consanguinity between all sins. Compare v. 6 with several preceding and succeeding verses. Pride, cruelty, cunning, boasting, lust, covetousness, false peace, want of docility, practical atheism, spiritual blindness, contempt, cursing, deceit, fraud, mischief and vanity are a frightful sisterhood.

24. The apostle James told us no new thing when he depicted (chap. iii. vv. 2-13) the dreadful evils of a wicked tongue, v. 7. Death and life are in its power. There is no greater wickedness than that, which breaks out in words.

25. It is amazing what mean artifices are resorted to by the best of the opposers of God's truth and people, even by people commonly fair in other matters, vv. 7, 8.

26. The fawning, crouching, sycophantic part often played by the cruel and wicked can deceive none but the simple and inexperienced, v. 10.

27. The Scripture account of the folly of sin, is fully sustained by the defences which it sets up. No maniac ever reasoned more illogically than the unbeliever, vv. 6-11.

28. It is very safe for those, who have a good cause, to petition the infallible judge to proceed at once to decide the controversy between them and their enemies, v. 12. Calvin: "This verse contains the useful doctrine, that the more the ungodly harden themselves, through their slothful ignorance, and endeavor to persuade themselves that God takes no concern about men and their affairs, and will not punish the wickedness which they commit, the more should we endeavor to be persuaded of the contrary; yea, rather their ungodliness ought to incite us vigorously to repel the doubts, which they not only admit, but studiously frame for themselves."

29. When men see the lengths to which sin leads the ungodly, v. 13, is it unreasonable to suppose that every sinner would be appalled and scream out in horror, if at the beginning of any course of folly the end should be clearly seen by him?

30. The divine omniscience is as comforting to saints as it is terrible to sinners, v. 14.

31. The divine vengeance, which seems so slow to do its work, will not tarry: Its approach is more swift than is thought by many. It lingereth not; it slumbereth not, v. 14.

32. When we consider what a friend the poor and the orphan have in God, it is not wonderful that they rise from the dunghill and sit among princes. Their very hardships are a good school for them. Their very helplessness makes them fit objects of divine compassion. Let all such remember God's readiness to help them, v. 14. Divine power can crush any number of foes to save its friends.

33. The destruction of the wicked will be utter, v. 15. God will leave them neither root nor branch.

34. If we did not read history like atheists, we must learn some awful and salutary lessons, v. 16. Where are all the ancient empires and emperors? Where are the nations that forgot God? Dickson: "Earthly kings cannot live still to help their friends, followers, or flatterers, or to persecute and molest God's church: but Christ is the Lord and King forever and ever to defend his people, and punish his foes."

35. If we are sure we have good desires, we should be encouraged to hope for their fulfilment, v. 17.

36. It is as really a mercy as it is a revealed truth that we are dependent on God for everything, even for one right thought or feeling. If he did not prepare our hearts, they would never be fit for any part of his service, v. 17.

37. It is not possible that scriptural prayer should not be heard and answered, v. 17. It must be so because God is God.

38. It is a great mercy that God judges in the earth, v. 18. The Lord reigneth, let the earth rejoice.

39. In all ages wickedness is much the same. The most learned men are not agreed whether this Psalm best suits Saul and his courtiers, Antiochus Epiphanes, Belshazzar, Sanballat and his coadjutors, or the Pope and his myrmidons. The fact is that the temper and arts of the haters of God's church are so much alike in disposition, that as they have opportunity, they act very much alike.

40. The Assembly's Annotations says, "This whole Psalm may serve for an ample confutation of the error of those, who make the worldly success of great undertakers an argument of the goodness of their cause; as also for the consolation and confirmation of those, who suffer though it be much and long."

41. It is unquestionably wise to serve God. The last account will bring all right. Here there is darkness about some things. But saints and sinners will in the last day have the same judgment respecting the folly of sin and the wisdom of piety.

42. Cobbin: "Our ground of glorying in God is that he is just. He tries the righteous as gold is tried in the furnace, but he punishes the wicked. The one is corrected, the other is destroyed. Both may suffer; but the one for his present and eternal good, the other as the prelude to everlasting ruin." "Cecil was pacing to and fro in the Botanic Garden at Oxford, when he observed a fine specimen of the pomegranate almost cut through the stem. On asking the gardener the reason, he got an answer which explained the wounds of his own bleeding spirit. 'Sir, this tree used to shoot so strong, that it bore nothing but leaves. I was, therefore, obliged to cut it in this manner, and when it was almost cut through, then it began to bear plenty of fruit.' Ye suffering members of Christ, be thankful for every sorrow which weakens a lust or strengthens a grace. Though it should be a cut to the heart, be thankful for every sin and idol shorn away. Be thankful for whatever makes your conscience more tender, your thoughts more spiritual, and your character more consistent. Be thankful that it was the pruning-knife and not the weeding-hook which you felt: for if you suffer in Christ, you suffer with him; and if with him you suffer, with him you shall also reign."

43. What an awful lesson this Psalm teaches to tyrants, tyrant monarchs, tyrant judges, tyrant executive officers, tyrant landlords, tyrant husbands, tyrant masters, tyrant creditors, tyrant teachers. O how the down-trodden of earth will yet rise up, and clank their chains, and show their scars, and call to mind their cries for mercy when all were in vain.

44. To the weary, tempted, persecuted follower of Christ, how sweet the rest of heaven will be. Scott: "From heaven alone will all sin and temptation be excluded: no Canaanite shall find entrance there; no lust shall then remain in the heart of any inhabitant; no imperfection will be known; but all shall be complete in love, purity, and joy."

PSALM XI.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 IN the LORD put I my trust: how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?
- 2 For, lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart.
- 3 If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?
- 4 The LORD is in his holy temple, the LORD's throne is in heaven: his eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men.
- 5 The LORD trieth the righteous: but the wicked and him that loveth violence his soul hateth.
- 6 Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup.
- 7 For the righteous LORD loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright.

FOR remarks on the caption, see on Psalm iv. The words A Psalm are not found in the Hebrew, but are properly supplied in the Septuagint, and other versions ancient and modern, including the English. There is no good reason for doubting that David was the author of this ode.

Commentators have frequently expressed the opinion that David here describes some part of his troubled life during the reign of Saul. Theodoret thus held. This view is favored by Calvin, Moller, Fabritius, Patrick, Edwards, Henry, Gill, Dodd, Scott and Morison. Hengstenberg thinks quite differently: "How little color the Psalm affords for a personal construction is evident from this, that among those, who take that view, it is a subject of perpetual controversy, whether it refers to the times of Saul or of Absalom." To this it may be replied that such controversy does not disprove its reference to either time, or even to both, so far as they were alike. But nothing is gained by fixing on a given time or event to suit a Psalm, if it has as much fitness to many other conditions of its author, or of the just man, whom he personifies. It is entirely probable that much of the language is suggested by occurrences in the eventful life of David. Rosenmuller: "The occasion of this Psalm is wholly uncertain, but we may reckon it, with De Wette, among those, which, in the name of the people, implore divine aid against barbarous enemies." Yet this view is not sustained by the contents. Brent's first remark is, "This Psalm is not a prayer, but a confession of faith, against calumniators;" Amesius; "The scope of David in this Psalm is openly to declare that consolation, which he possessed, and which he studied more and more to enjoy, in opposition to all those temptations, which assailed him on every side." Hengstenberg quotes with approbation Claus, saying, "Confidence in the Lord and his protection, even against the huge force of the wicked, is the one subject of this Psalm." Throughout the Psalm the original for LORD is Jehovah. See on Ps. i. 2. Some have thought that this Psalm was put next the tenth on account of a general similarity of contents, and especially of a resemblance between Ps. x. 8; Ps. xi. 2. But no such reason seems to have governed in making the arrangement, else many other changes would have been made, differing from the present order.

1. In the Lord put I my trust; how say ye to my soul, Flee as a bird to your mountain?

The first verb in this verse is the same as is found in Ps. ii. 12; v. 11; vii. 1. Our version always gives it trust, or put trust in, except in Ps. lvii. 1, where it is rendered make my refuge, and in Pr. xiv. 32, where we read, hath hope. Many Latin versions read confide in. Trust in God is a vital matter in religion. It is at the foundation of all rational piety. The Chaldee has: In the word of the Lord do I hope; Ainsworth: In Jehovah do I hope for safety. Commentators are not agreed as to the persons addressed by the pronoun ye. Luther says that they are "erroneous and fanatical spirits, who draw away men . . . characters having the peculiar mark of hypocrites,—that they arrogantly, proudly, and with high looks despise and deride the truly godly;" Slade supposes that "David's friends recommended him to fly;" Patrick thinks "David's friends" were here his tempters; Morison calls them "his short-sighted and misjudging friends;" Alexander speaks of them as "timid and desponding friends rather than taunting and exulting enemies;" Scott supposes "timid friends" to be addressed; Gill holds the same view; so also does Clarke; but Hengstenberg regards the tempters here as "godless enemies;" Amesius also speaks of the language as that of "adversaries." If they were friends, they were very much like Job's wife. Cowardice is always dangerous. Nothing is so rash. It is commonly criminal, proceeding from unbelief. Any advice to desert a post of duty is unwise and wicked. On the words to my soul, see comment on the same expression in the Hebrew in Ps. iii. 2. What they said distressed him, wounded his feelings. The advice given him was, Flee as a bird to your mountain. The word rendered bird is commonly so rendered, but in Ps. viii. 8; cxlviii. 10, and some other cases, it is rendered fowl; and in Ps. lxxxiv. 3; cii. 7 it is rendered sparrow. Morison: "The words which denote the names of most animals in the Hebrew admit of application to the individual or the species." Some have thought this clause proverbial, but if so, the evidence seems not to have been afforded. It is clear that Pr. xxvii. 8, relied on by some, does not prove it. There is some diversity in the rendering also. Hammond: "The Hebrew reads, 'To your mountain, a sparrow;' all the ancient interpreters, uniformly, 'to your mountain as a sparrow;' and so possibly the reading anciently was. However, if it be, 'fly, sparrow, to your mountain,' the sense will be the same;" Horsley: Flee, sparrows, to your hill; Alexander: Flee (to) your mountain (as) a bird. But none of these variations materially alter the sense. We get the same idea whether we read bird or sparrow, and whether we suppose David is called a bird and bid to flee, or whether he is told to flee as a bird. In each case we have the same general idea. But instead of reading, Flee to your mountain, some would read from your mountain, meaning Zion, or the hill country of Judea, or some particular hiding-place. The first who suggested this rendering were certain Jewish expositors. Gill names Kimchi and Ben Melech, and Morison speaks of "many of the Jewish writers" as taking this view; and adds, "It must be admitted that the word [rendered flee] does signify more the act of passing from than that of fleeing to." This remark is hardly borne out by the use of the word. But some have proposed to read in or through the mountain. If the word rendered flee is to determine the preposition following, this would be as good as either of the others, if not better. The participle is in Gen. iv. 12, 14 rendered vagabond. If they said to him, Go, wander in the mountain, having no certain place of resort, then we have the whole sense contended for by Calvin, though he reads into, and not in or through. He says that "men advised David to leave his country, and retire into some place of exile, where he might be concealed, inasmuch as there remained for him no hope of life, unless he should relinquish the kingdom, which had been promised to him." Calvin: "I do not, however, think that any particular mountain is pointed out, but that David was sent away to the desert rocks, wherever chance might lead him." To, into, in, or through, gives a better sense than from. But the pronoun your and the verb flee are in Hebrew plural. So this counsel given is not merely to David, but to all his associates, all, who made common cause with him. The church of England version is therefore not good: How say ye to my soul that she should flee as a bird unto the hill? Instead of as a bird, Brent reads swiftly. Our translators never so render the word. No doubt swiftness is implied in the flight, so also are danger, fearfulness and helplessness.

2. For, lo, the wicked bend their bow, they make ready their arrow upon the string, that they may privily shoot at the upright in heart. The translations of this verse vary. Edwards: For behold the wicked bend the bow, they fix their arrows upon the string to shoot in the dark at the upright in heart; Fry: For, lo! the wicked bend their bow; they have fixed their arrow upon the string; to shoot secretly at the upright in heart; Jebb: For behold, the ungodly bend the bow; they make ready their arrow upon the string, to shoot at them in darkness, even at the upright in heart; Calvin: Surely, behold! the ungodly shall bend their bow, they have fixed their arrows upon the string, to shoot secretly at the upright in heart; church of England: For lo, the ungodly bend their bow, and make ready their arrows within the quiver, that they may privily shoot at them which are true of heart; Hengstenberg: For, lo! the wicked bend the bow, place their arrow upon the string, to shoot in the dark at the upright. The word rendered string is in our version never translated quiver, and ought in no case to be. For quiver two other and very different words are found in the Hebrew. Gen. xxvii. 3; Ps. cxxvii. 5. The bending of the bow here is to be explained as in Ps. vii. 12. The word rendered arrow is in the singular. The tenses of the verbs in our version will be found as good as in any other translation. See Introduction, § 6. But are the words of this verse spoken by those who advised David to flee, or by David himself? The former opinion is embraced by Boothroyd, Edwards, Gill, Horne, Slade, Scott, Clarke, Morison, Hengstenberg and Alexander. But Calvin thinks that David "here continues his account of the trying circumstances in which he was placed. His design is not only to place before our view the dangers with which he was surrounded, but to show us that he was even exposed to death itself. He therefore says, that wherever he might hide himself, it was impossible for him to escape the hands of his enemies." This view is probably to be preferred. If so, then in the first verse David tells us what others said, and in this informs us of the actual state of things. Everywhere the enemies of David and his associates were surrounded by foes already armed and prepared in the most stealthy manner to shoot at the upright in heart, the men of rectitude. Vitringa: "It is implied in the idea of rectitude, that there is some canon, rule, or common measure, according to which judgment may be given in regard to all spiritual operations. What is conformed to this standard is morally straight, as that is also called in architecture, which is done according to the line or plummet." God's people, so far as they are sanctified, are not crooked, but straight, straightforward, upright. The same word is found in Ps. vii. 10, and in the 7th verse of this Psalm.

3. If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do? There is great diversity in the renderings of this verse. Septuagint: They have destroyed the things which thou hast prepared: but what has the righteous done? Chaldee: For if the foundations be destroyed, why does the righteous work good? Arabic: They have destroyed that which thou hast prepared: but what has the innocent done? Boothroyd: When the foundations of justice are subverted, what can even a righteous man do? Calvin: Truly, the foundations are destroyed: what hath the righteous One done? Edwards: When the foundations are pulled up, what has the righteous man to do? church of England: For the foundations will be cast down; and what hath the righteous done? Amesius: When the foundations themselves are destroyed, what shall the just man do? Jebb: For the foundations will be cast down: the righteous, what can he do? Fry: For the foundations are overthrown: what has the Just One done? Hengstenberg: For the foundations are destroyed: the righteous, what does he do? Alexander: For the pillars (or foundations) will be (are about to be) destroyed; what has the righteous done, i. e., accomplished? The word rendered foundations is also in Isa. xix. 10, where it is translated purposes in the text, but in the margin foundations. By foundations Jerome understands laws. But this is not defining the word, but interpreting it. Some Jewish writers suppose the reference to be to the counsels, plots and snares of wicked men, which are broken and overthrown by the Lord, and not by men, for what can the righteous do in a matter of so cunning and extensive devices? Some apply it to the destruction of the priests of Nob. 1 Sam. xxii. The other opinions are that the word should be rendered pillars or foundations. Figuratively pillars may signify princes or nobles. But the more common impression is that David is speaking of the foundations of justice as Boothroyd and others. Alexander: "The pillars or foundations are those of social order or society itself;" Clarke: "They have utterly destroyed the foundations of truth and equity;" Venema: "The foundations are destroyed in communities remarkably corrupt, in which the laws of right and equity are wantonly trodden under foot." Hengstenberg regards the clause as descriptive of a general state of moral dissolution, which deprived the righteous of any footing, subverting the basis of society, which is the supremacy of justice and righteousness." This is pretty certainly the correct view. The verb be destroyed is in Hebrew future. The idea is that this dreadful disorder now exists and is likely to continue. If so, what can the righteous do? Some put this in the past tense, literally rendering the Hebrew, What has the righteous done? They understand the question to be in substance, What has the righteous effected to hinder this dreadful state of things? But the obvious sense gathered from our version is very good, i. e., This state of things continuing, what can a righteous man accomplish? The grammar will admit of this rendering. There is no evidence that for righteous man we should read Just One, meaning Messias. Calvin understands the question, What hath the righteous done? as equivalent to, what evil hath he done? But this is pretty certainly a misapprehension of the sense. The Psalmist thus distressed looks around for relief. Nor is his faith without an object.

4. The LORD is in his holy temple. This doubtless should read, The LORD is in the palace of his holiness. The word here rendered temple is repeatedly rendered palace, plural palaces. 2 Kings xx. 18; Ps. xlv. 8, 15; cxliv. 12; Pr. xxx. 28; Is. xiii. 22, and many other places. It is true that the name of temple is given to the tabernacle before David was born, 1 Sam. i. 9; iii. 3, so that no argument can be drawn from that source. But the connection shows that David is here speaking of God as a Judge and King, governed by righteousness, sitting in heaven, not presenting himself in the Shechinah of the tabernacle. See Comment on Ps. v. 7. Calvin renders this clause, Jehovah is in the palace of his holiness; Alexander: Jehovah (is) in his palace (or temple) of holiness; Fry: Jehovah is in his holy habitation; Venema and Patrick also use palace. That David here refers to heaven, the true sanctuary of which the temple was but a figure, is evident from the next clause, where he says expressly, The LORD's throne is in heaven; q. d., On earth at present all is confusion, one can obtain no justice or equity, but I do not trust in man, but in him whose kingdom ruleth over all, ever dealing in righteousness, ever lifted up above the power of malice, and never relinquishing his rights as Governor and Judge of all. Calvin: "There is in these words an implied contrast between heaven and earth; for if David's attention had been fixed on the state of things in this world, as they appeared to the eye of sense and reason, he would have seen no prospect of deliverance from his present perilous circumstances. But this was not David's exercise; on the contrary, when in the world all justice lies trodden under foot, and faithfulness has perished, he reflects that God sits in heaven perfect and unchanged, from whom it became him to look for the restoration of order from this state of miserable confusion.

He does not simply say that God dwells in heaven; but that he reigns there, as it were, in a royal palace, and has his throne of judgment there." Such is David's confidence in the existence and efficiency of the providence of Jehovah that he immediately adds: His eyes behold, his eyelids try the children of men. God is an earnest spectator of all that passes even in states of the wildest confusion. His book of remembrance is continually recording all that occurs whether good or bad. There is no authority for adding, as the Septuagint and Fry, after behold the words "the poor one," or "the afflicted one." The verb rendered behold is found also in v. 7. There is no better translation of it than that of our version. The verb rendered try is found also in v. 5. It is often rendered by the verb prove, Ps. xvii. 3; lxvi. 10; lxxxi. 7. In Ps. xxvi. 2 it is rendered examine. Eyelids is parallel to eyes in the preceding clause. The children of men, literally, the sons of Adam. See Introduction, § 16. Patrick's paraphrase of this verse is striking. He makes David say to those who tempted him and to all these sad disorders, "My answer is, that the world is not governed by chance, nor can men carry things just as they please: but the LORD into whose holy palace no unjust counsels can possibly enter, and whose throne is infinitely above that of the highest king on earth: He, I say, is the supreme and most righteous Ruler of all affairs; and no mischief can be so secretly contrived, no wicked design so artificially dissembled, but it lies open before his eyes, and he sees through it: nor need he take any pains to discover it; for at the first glance, as we speak, he perfectly discovers how all men are inclined, and looks to the very bottom of their hearts." So grateful is this view of the Divine government that David dwells on it in the next verse.

5. The LORD trieth the righteous. God proves, examines his people. See v. 4. For trieth Edwards uses explores. The word rendered righteous is the same as in Ps. i. 5, 6; v. 12; vii. 9. In Hebrew the verb try here and in v. 4 is in the future, thus declaring that God does this thing and will continue to do it. There is no danger that he will ever cease to do it. Some think that this clause ought to be extended so as to include the word wicked, and so as to read, The LORD trieth the righteous and the wicked. This is favored by the Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Arabic, and by Ainsworth, Brent, Edwards and Fry. Alexander also regards this division as admissible. On the other hand the Chaldee and Syriac with Calvin, Amesius and Hengstenberg retain the division of our version. There seems to be no good reason for adopting the suggestion of some so as to read, The righteous Jehovah trieth, i. e., God proceeds as a righteous Judge. This is indeed true, but is not the truth here taught. If we adopt the pointing suggested above, then the last clause reads, And him that loveth violence his soul hateth. For loveth Edwards gives delighteth; Calvin and Fry, approveth. The cruelty, rage and pride of violence are utterly repugnant to the divine nature. Luther says this clause "is spoken emphatically, in that the prophet does not simply say that God hates, but his soul hates, thereby declaring that God hates the wicked in a high degree, and with his whole heart." In our version hardly any word has so uniform a rendering as the last verb in this verse. When given as a verb it is uniformly translated hate. Not fire is so opposed to water as the nature of God to sin. To him it is a horrible thing. Consequently,

6. Upon the wicked he shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup. In this verse the word snares has occasioned considerable discussion. Hare and Edwards think it does not belong to the Hebrew text, and ought to be stricken out. They object that it injures the metre. But the Psalms have never been shown to be metrical in the original. They further object that this word injures the sense. But this will be easily answered. Edwards indeed translates it, putting it in Italics. But he thinks that if any word be used, it should be another word than the one commonly found in the Hebrew Bible, and so reads hot cinders. Brent also reads hot cinders. The word rendered coals in Pr. xxvi. 21; Isa. xlv. 12; liv. 16, very much resembles the word here rendered snares. But it is not the same. The word rendered snares is found in the singular or plural in the Psalms nine times, and in our version is uniformly translated. In some other parts of Scripture our version uses the word gin as a fit rendering, but a gin is a snare. Jebb regards the word much as Edwards does, and connects it with the next word and reads the whole, He shall rain upon the ungodly coals of fire, and brimstone, and a wind of horror; Boothroyd: On the wicked he raineth flakes of sulphureous fire, a horrible tempest is the portion of their cup; Waterland: Upon the wicked he shall rain snares: Fire and brimstone and a tempestuous wind shall be the portion of their cup; Horsley: Upon the impious he shall rain glowing embers: Fire and brimstone, and a tempestuous blast, is the portion of their cup; Fry: He will rain upon the wicked lightning, fire, and sulphur; and the hot "wind of the desert," shall be the portion of their cup. Amesius reads, burning coals; the margin, quick burning coals; Lowth prefers live coals or hot burning coals. He says, "This is certainly more agreeable to the context than snares. Michaelis and others say that the Arabians call lightnings, snares, i. e., fiery ropes. The verb rendered shall rain expresses a great abundance of anything good or bad descending from above. Thus it is applied to the descent of manna and of quails in the wilderness. Ex. xvi. 4; Ps lxxviii. 24, 27. So also it is applied to the descent of hail, Ex. ix. 23. In Gen. xix. 24 it is used to show how Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed by fire and brimstone, viz.: by a copious descent of those destructive elements. That the wicked are to be caught in snares is frequently asserted in Scripture. In Job xviii. 9; Ps. lxix. 22; Pr. vii. 23; xxii. 5; Ecc. ix. 12; Is. viii. 14; xxiv. 17, 18; Jer. xlviii. 43, 44 the same word is used as is found in the text, showing how familiar to inspired writers was the idea of the destruction of the wicked by snares. And even where the same word is not used, the same idea is often presented in other words as in Ps. vii. 15; ix. 15, 16; Is. viii. 15; xxviii. 13. So that destruction by snares is not, without better cause than has yet been shown, to be rejected from this place. Hengstenberg: "While the wicked believe that they have the righteous in their snares, and are now able, with little difficulty, to destroy them, suddenly a whole load of snares is sent down upon them from heaven, and after all flight is cut off for them, they are smitten by the overpowering judgment of God." Calvin: "The Psalmist, with much beauty and propriety, puts snares before fire and brimstone. We see that the ungodly, while God spares them, fear nothing, but give themselves ample scope in their wayward courses, like horses let loose in an open field; and then if they see any adversity impending over them, they devise for themselves ways of escape: in short, they continually mock God as if they could not be caught, unless he first entangle and hold them fast in his snares. God, therefore, begins his vengeance by snares, shutting up against the wicked every way of escape; and when he has them entangled and bound, he thunders upon them dreadfully and horribly, like as he consumed Sodom and the neighboring cities with fire from heaven." No doubt the figure of fire and brimstone is taken from the overthrow of the cities of the plain. An horrible tempest shall also beat on the wicked. The word rendered horrible is found also in Ps. cxix. 53 where we read horror and in Lam. v. 10 where we read terrible. Bythner thinks it signifies a sudden tempest that burns and scorches as it goes. It is literally a wind of horrors or of terrors. Some commentators think the figure is drawn from the wind, which the Arabs call Smum, Samum, or Samoom, as it is variously spelled. But this wind never blows in Palestine, and would hardly be here mentioned. Hengstenberg: "The only well-grounded exposition is strong wrath." Edwards reads it stormy tempests; Alexander, raging wind, literally wind or (blast of furies); church of England, storm and tempest; Calvin, a storm of whirlwinds. The last phrase, the portion of their cup, is probably originally taken from the custom of putting into the cup of each guest the portion designed for him at feasts. It is a common figure of Scripture denoting the allotments of providence. It is often taken in a bad sense. Ps. lxxv. 8; Isa. li. 17; Ezek. xxiii. 32-34; Matt. xx. 22, 23; xxvi. 39; Luke xxii. 42. The prominent ideas presented in the whole verse are the abundance, the suddenness, the terribleness, the destructiveness and the irresistible violence of the calamities, which shall at last come on the wicked, however appearances may for a long time be to the contrary. Morison: "All these terrific images are but sensible, and therefore defective representations of invisible and spiritual realities. The most fearful objects, with which the human eye or the human imagination is familiar, can furnish no just [adequate?] representation of that scene of horror and dismay upon which the wicked enter at death. Enough, however, is revealed of it, to awaken salutary fear, and to cause every man to tremble lest he should come into this place of torment." Nor is the punishment of the wicked, nor the treatment of the righteous capricious. God acts as he does because he is what he is. And so it is said,

7. For the righteous LORD loveth righteousness; his countenance doth behold the upright. For doth behold, Calvin reads approveth. Edwards reads the whole verse, For Jehovah is righteous; he loveth upright actions; his countenance beholds with pleasure that which is just; Hengstenberg: For righteous is the Lord, he loves righteousness, his countenance beholds the upright; Alexander: For righteous (is) Jehovah; righteousness he loves; the upright (man) shall his face behold. Instead of the upright, the church of England reads the thing which is just. The sense given by each of these renderings is good and scriptural. None of them is any improvement on our English version, which is concise, and well corresponds to the original. There is no good reason for reading with Dimock, Jehovah will justify him that loveth righteousness, etc. The word behold is the same that is so rendered in v. 4. There it is said his eyes behold, here his countenance doth behold, i. e., the aspect of his countenance is friendly towards the upright. In the former part of the Psalm David had argued from God's office as King and Judge that he would be against the wicked. Here he argues from the divine nature that he will favor the righteous. Calvin appropriately says, "It is a strained interpretation to view the last clause as meaning that the upright shall behold the face of God." The reason why such a rendering has been thought of is that the verb is singular, and the word upright is singular, while the word countenance is plural. But it is not inconsistent with Hebrew usage to have a singular verb and a plural nominative. See Introduction, § 6. This is especially the case, where the doctrine of the Trinity may be supposed to be brought to view, as here. The aspect of every person in the Godhead is unitedly benignant towards God's people.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Faith in God is necessary under all dispensations and in all situations. It is impossible to proceed a step in the right way without it, v. 1.
2. There is always ground of hope to one who trusts in God. All is not lost, that is brought into jeopardy. While God lives and reigns, there is hope for a good cause and for a good man. We may boldly challenge all who would drive us to despair, v. 1.
3. He, who purposes to do his duty, must make up his mind to know no man after the flesh, and to listen to no counsel however kindly it may seem to be given, if it conflicts with the known will of God, v. 1.

4. How extreme is the folly of sin. Nothing seems more justifiable in the eyes of carnal men than flight in time of peril. Yet we must often cry out, How say ye, etc., v. 1.

5. It is always wise to stand in our lot, v. 1. The post of duty is a high tower. Henry: "That which grieved David in this matter, was, not that to flee would savor of cowardice, and ill become a soldier, but that it would savor of unbelief, and would ill become a saint, who had so often said, In the Lord put I my trust." Calvin: "This verse teaches us, that however much the world may hate and persecute us, we ought nevertheless to continue steadfast at our post, that we may not deprive ourselves of a right to lay claim to the promises of God, or that these may not slip away from us, and that however much and however long we may be harassed, we ought always to continue firm and unwavering in the faith of our having the call of God."

6. In maintaining an unwavering profession and steadfastness we must carefully avoid all influence from the wisdom of the flesh, v. 1. Men, who are Christians, may yet be carnal to a sad degree, 1 Cor. iii. 1. When they are so their advice often is much the same as that given by ungodly men.

7. Good men should not be surprised at any amount of wickedness they shall witness. Bad men have always been very bad, v. 2. The wicked always shall do wickedly. It is in their hearts. Every generation has its Cain, its Ahithophel, its Sanballat, its Judas, its Demas, its false brethren, its dogs, its unprincipled cowards and brutal tyrants.

8. There is a nice adaptation between the proceedings and purposes of evil men. Stealthy acts befit stealthy plans, v. 2. Many a sinner shoots privily, who has too much shame to enable him to attack openly. Deeds of darkness befit the children of darkness.

9. It is important that we often ask ourselves, Are we upright? v. 1. If we are, we are also downright, outright, straight, straightforward. Crooked ways belong not to godliness. When we find ourselves inclined to an uncandid course, we may know all is not right.

10. It is always necessary to adhere to first principles, v. 3. This is as important in religion as in anything else. Henry: "If you destroy the foundations, if you take good people from off their hope in God, if you can persuade them that their religion is a cheat and a jest, and can banter them out of that, you ruin them, and break their hearts indeed, and make them of all men the most miserable." With care and examination adopt first principles. When adopted, stick to them.

11. In temptations, which lead us to deny first truths in religion, there is one advantage, viz., we see at once that we must hold fast our integrity, or give up conscience, peace of mind, principle, God and salvation. It is a great point when we are able to see the bearings of our conflicts. If the foundations shall fail, all is lost, v. 3.

12. What an inestimable blessing is a good government, established and conducted on true, just and uniform principles. If those, who complain of ordinary burdens in a good government, were placed even for a short time under the terrors of misrule or anarchy, they would find a state of things, which would probably make them thankful for a return to any form of regular and free government, v. 3.

13. But if we are placed by God in states of social and civil life, wholly unsettled, let us remember that others before us have seen all order subverted, all justice denied, v. 3. Through God they have outlived such a state and come to better days; and so may we. A Roman would not despair of the republic. A Christian should hope well of all affairs in the government of God. Horne: "All is not over, while there is a man left to reprove error, and bear testimony to the truth; and a man, who does it with becoming spirit, may stop a prince, or senate, when in full career, and recover the day. . . No place on earth is out of the reach of care and trouble. Temptations are everywhere; and so is the grace of God."

14. We see what would be the state of things if infidels had the sway. All virtue and with it all justice and all order would perish. Every foundation would be destroyed. Morison: "Such men are wont to boast of liberty; but wo to the righteous of the land when left to their tender mercies! Those, who have impiously shaken off their allegiance to the Almighty, cannot be supposed to treat with much deference his humble and devoted servants. The liberty, of which infidels talk so much, is but an exhibition of that selfishness, above which their system can never elevate them, and it only requires that the same selfishness should dictate a line of persecution, for them instantly to adopt it. In the absence of all principle they are necessarily driven wherever passion, or prejudice, or interest may impel them."

15. However wild confusion may reign around us, and the true ends of government be forgotten, yet it may well make the hearts of the righteous to rejoice that God is not, and cannot be dethroned, v. 4. All other sceptres shall be broken and all other crowns fall to the ground, but the pious shall ever shout, Alleluiah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.

16. The more wholly the springs of earthly comfort go dry, the more should we come to the wells of salvation, and with delight draw thence all needed refreshments, v. 4. Calvin: "Being destitute of human aid, David betakes himself to the providence of God. It is a signal proof of faith to borrow light from heaven to guide us to the hope of salvation, when we are surrounded in this world with darkness on every side. All men acknowledge that the world is governed by the providence of God; but when there comes some sad confusion of things, which disturbs their ease and involves them in difficulty, there are few who retain in their minds the firm persuasion of this truth." Yet that is the very time, when faith is most needed and may be most illustrious.

17. How consolatory to the humble soul is the doctrine of God's omniscience, v. 4. If one such is ashamed of his own imperfections and shortcomings he can appeal to God for his sincerity. If men misunderstand and misconstrue his best actions and designs, he is sure that Jehovah approves them. If he feels that wicked counsels are more than a match for his penetration, he has an almighty Friend, who fathoms all wicked devices. Henry: "God not only sees men, but he sees through them, not only knows all they say and do, but knows what they think, what they design, and how they really stand affected, whatever they pretend. We may know what men seem to be, but he knows what they are, as the refiner knows what the value of the gold is, when he has tried it."

18. It should make men solemn to know that God searches and tries them, v. 5. Many make in words very solemn appeals to their Maker, but in their hearts they are light and vain. The heart-searcher has no pleasure in fools. He trifles with none. He will not be trifled with by any.

19. Wicked men have no more right to believe that God will favor their evil doings than that he will change; for his whole moral nature is set against the workers of iniquity, v. 5. Calvin: "God hates those who are set upon the infliction of injuries, and upon doing mischief. As he has ordained mutual intercourse between men, so he would have us maintain it inviolable. In order, therefore, to preserve this his own sacred and appointed order, he must be the enemy of the wicked, who wrong and are troublesome to others." Society is God's ordinance. All that tends to its subversion God will punish.

20. Because God is what he is, it is impossible that the righteous and the wicked should forever fare alike, much less that the wicked should always have the righteous in his power, and be able to torment him, v. 5.

21. If God does try the righteous, it is for their good; and so there is a vast difference between the sufferings of saints and of sinners, not in the degree, so much as in the design, end and effects, v. 5. Morison: "We here perceive the unspeakable difference between fatherly chastisements and the infliction of God's displeasure on his enemies. The one is for correction, the other is for punishment; the one is an expression of covenanted regard, the other is an intimation of righteous displeasure and approaching judgment; the one is the rebuke of a father, justly offended; the other is the uplifted rod of a judge, who will, ere long, smite down all his foes."

22. The calamities, that shall overtake the wicked, are inconceivably dreadful, v. 6. The Bible beyond all books is sober, and even in its boldest figures gives no exaggerated view of the future misery of wicked men, who die impenitent. How intolerable must the wrath of God be, when it is expressed by such terrific words as are used in this Psalm and elsewhere in the Bible. I marvel not that great and good men, who have proclaimed salvation in a loud and earnest manner, have commonly spoken on the loss of a soul in subdued tones and with many tears. But there is nothing to excuse silence on so awful a matter, Ezek. iii. 18; xxxiii. 7, 8. Damnation is more dreadful than it has ever been represented.

23. Henry: "Though honest good people may be run down, and trampled upon, yet God does and will own them, and favor them, and smile upon them, and that is the reason why God will severely reckon with persecutors and oppressors, because those whom they oppress and persecute are dear to him; so that, whosoever toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye," v. 7.

24. This whole Psalm teaches us that if tempted, we must not comply, but resist the devil, and he shall flee from us.

25. Nor can we read such Psalms without seeing that there is a difference betwixt saints and sinners, those that serve God and those that serve him not.

26. All the evils, which in this life come on the ungodly, are but the beginning of their sorrows, but the righteous has all his evil things before he reaches eternity.

27. One thing should greatly cheer the saints in their approaches to God, viz: that it is now known not only that he reigns, but that he reigns by one, Jesus Christ. God is surely on his throne. He is as surely in Christ Jesus.

28. Morison closes his comments on this Psalm thus: "Impenitent sinner! read this Psalm, and mark your approaching doom! To flatter yourself with the hope of escape is vain. The elements of omnipotent wrath are all prepared, and the tempests which will hurl you to perdition will speedily begin to blow. Already the moral heavens are covered with threatening clouds, and the lightning's flash is seen playing around your devoted head, the gulf from beneath is yawning wide to receive you; but one more stage in impenitence, and you are undone forever; the Judge stands at the door, the last call to repentance is about to be addressed to you, the knell of judgment shall speedily be heard, and through the gloomy shade of death you shall pass into a region where the wrath of God shall be the everlasting portion of your cup. Hasten then, O sinner, to the cross of Christ. He who died on that cross welcomes you, after all your impenitence he welcomes you. Your hard and flinty heart he can soften and change. Your sins of crimson dye he can pardon and remove; but forget not that the day of your merciful visitation hastens to a close, and that the insulted compassion of a dying Saviour will realize a fearful vindication in the ceaseless torments it will produce."

PSALM XII.

To the chief Musician upon Sheminitih, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Help, LORD; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men.
- 2 They speak vanity every one with his neighbor: with flattering lips and with a double heart do they speak.
- 3 The LORD shall cut off all flattering lips, and the tongue that speaketh proud things:
- 4 Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail; our lips are our own: who is lord over us?
- 5 For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the LORD; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him.
- 6 The words of the LORD are pure words: as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times.
- 7 Thou shalt keep them, O LORD, thou shalt preserve them from this generation for ever.
- 8 The wicked walk on every side, when the vilest men are exalted.

FOR an explanation of the title see above on Psalms iv. and vi. at the beginning. There is no good cause for doubting that David wrote this Psalm.

Many attempts have been made to fix a time and place for the composition of this Psalm, but without success. Hengstenberg quotes Geier as rightly describing this Psalm when he says it contains "the common complaint of the church of all times." Many a period of David's history and of the history of every good man is here set forth. But it cannot be shown to have any more distinct fulfilment in the times of Doeg and the Ziphites, or of Absalom than in the days of the Babylonish captivity or of Antiochus Epiphanes. Rampant wickedness has always shown itself in the manner here described.

Two words, used as names of God, are found in this Psalm—Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4.

1. Help, LORD; for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men. By far the most common rendering of the first verb in this verse is save; after that deliver, preserve, avenge, rescue, help. The same word in the same form is found in 2 Sam. xiv. 4; 2 Kings vi. 26; and is rendered help. It is found in Ps. iii. 7; vi. 4; vii. 1, and is rendered save. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Arabic read, Save me; church of England, Help me. But the Syriac and Chaldee simply, Save. Luther well says, "It sounds more impressive, when one says, Deliver, or give help, than to say, deliver me. As one therefore says in our language, under circumstances of great distress, or approaching death: Help, thou compassionate God, crying aloud with the utmost vehemence, and using no prefatory words upon the danger in hand; so does the prophet, as one inflamed with zeal on account of the oppressed state of God's people, cry out without any prefatory words, and implore in the most impressive manner, the help of God." The language of strong emotion is commonly abrupt and elliptical, but not therefore the less intelligible, or impressive. The word help does not call for merely some aid, but for full and effectual deliverance. The reason assigned comes next, for the godly man ceaseth; for the faithful fail from among the children of men. There is considerable diversity in rendering these words. The Septuagint: For the holy (man) has left, and truths have become few among the children of men; Vulgate: For the holy (man) has failed; for truths are diminished from among the children of men; the Ethiopic follows the Septuagint; Arabic: For the just (man) has failed, and truth is diminished among the sons of men; Syriac: For the virtuous has failed, and fidelity is wanting in the earth; Chaldee: For the righteous are consumed; for the faithful fail from among the sons of men; Calvin: For the merciful man hath failed, and the faithful are wasted away from among the children of men; Amesius: For the beneficent (man) is wanting, for the truthful have failed from among the sons of men; Brent: For the man that does good is rare; and few are the sincere among the sons of men; Edwards: For the good man is no more; for the faithful are not to be found among the sons of men; Fry, (applying the Psalm to Gospel times): For the Beloved hath failed, for the faithful have expired among the children of men; church of England: For there is not one godly man left: for the faithful are minished from among the children of men; Jebb: For there is a ceasing of the godly: for there is a minishing of the faithful among the children of men; Alexander: For the merciful (or the object of divine mercy) ceaseth, for the faithful fail from (among) the sons of men. The word rendered godly is (in the plural) most frequently rendered saints; (in the singular) sometimes holy; thrice, Holy one; sometimes merciful; once, good; in Ps. iv. 3; xxxii. 6, godly. No better rendering can be given to the second adjective than faithful or truthful. The verbs rendered cease and fail are in the preterite in the Hebrew, showing that the state of things here described was not merely beginning to exist, but even now was a sad reality. These words, descriptive of the dreadful state of society, are not to be taken as denying that there were some good men left, as the faithful band, who adhered to David, and others; but as asserting that good men were already scarce, making the call on God to be urgent. Micah vii. 2, is a parallel passage. Patrick well speaks of this part of the Psalm as "a sad complaint of the corrupt manners of that age, in which it was hard to find an honest plain-dealing man, in whom one might confide." Children of men, literally sons of Adam. Lacking holiness and truth, the mass of the people were ready for any enormity, and so he says,

2. They speak vanity every one with his neighbour. For vanity the Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic have vain things; Chaldee, a lie; Syriac, Mudge, Edwards and Fry, falsehood; Luther, profitless things; Calvin, deceit. In our English version the word is more commonly rendered vanity, or in vain, as twice in the third commandment, Ex. xx. 7; but sometimes it is translated by false, lying, etc. Ainsworth has it false vanity, or vain falsehood; Alexander translates it "vanity, i. e., falsehood;" Hengstenberg suggests that the word neighbour in this case points to a very intimate relationship. It may be so, but it is the same word found once in the 9th and three times in the 10th commandments. It is the word used in Lev. xix. 18, which Jesus Christ has explained, Luke x. 29-37. It is indeed sometimes rendered friend, fellow, companion, brother. Deut. xxiv. 10; Jud. vii. 13; 1 Sam. xiv. 20; 2 Sam. xvi. 17; 1 Chron. xxvii. 33. But it is also often rendered by the simple word another. Gen. xi. 3, 7; xv. 10; 2 Kings vii. 9. In the Psalms it is always rendered by one of these words, neighbour, friend, or companion. Ps. xv. 3; xxxv. 15; cxxii. 8. The parallel clause is With flattering lips and with a double heart do they speak. Edwards: They speak with smooth tongues and double hearts; Jebb: With a lip of flatteries, with a double heart they speak; Horsley has smooth lips, and explains that they are "not smooth with flattery, but with glossing lies, with ensnaring eloquence, and specious arguments in support of the wretched cause which they espouse." Flattering lips are smooth lips, slippery lips. Literally it would read a lip of flatteries; of blandishments, of smoothnesses. The word rendered lip is often translated by language or speech, as in Gen. xi. 1, 6, 7, 9; Ps. lxxxi. 5; Pr. xvii. 7. The phrase with a double heart is in the Hebrew literally with a heart and a heart. This form is retained in the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, several Latin, and some of the French versions. This is a form of speech unknown among us. The sense according to English idiom is given in the text of our version. The English word, duplicity, seems to convey the precise idea.

That is, these men thought one thing, and spoke another; they said one thing to one man, and a different thing to another; they did not speak the truth in their hearts. Ps. xv. 2. The phrase is found nowhere else but in 1 Chron. xii. 33, where as here it is rendered a double heart. Hengstenberg seems to think it much the same as that of a "double-minded man," in Jas. i. 8. Yet he gives weight to the explanation of Venema: "With a double mind, the one which they express, and another which they conceal, the former bland and open, the other impious and malignant;" and of Umbreit, "That is that they have one for themselves, and another for their friends." The phrase is probably parallel to that of "divers weights" and "divers measures," in Deut. xxv. 13, 14, which literally would be a weight and a weight (or a stone and a stone,) and a measure and a measure (an ephah and an ephah.) Clarke: "They seem to have two hearts; one to speak fair words, and the other to invent mischief." This state of things should not last always; for,

3. The LORD shall cut off all flattering lips. Edwards: May the Lord cut off all smooth lips; Jebb: The Lord shall cut off all lips of flattery; Calvin: Let Jehovah cut off all flattering lips; church of England: The LORD shall root out all deceitful lips; Fry: Jehovah will cut off all flattering lips; Hengstenberg: The Lord cut off all flattering lips; Alexander: May Jehovah destroy all lips of smoothness, i. e., flattering lips. The form of the verb is here best rendered in the future and is so given in a majority of cases in our common version, The Lord shall cut off. Flattering lips, the same words in the Hebrew as in the preceding verse, except that lips is plural. To cut off is by far the most frequent rendering of the verb, though it is sometimes given cut down, etc. The meaning is that God will in wrath remove these sinners from their earthly possessions, and that he will separate them from the congregation of the blessed. Excision from the congregation of the holy shall come on flatterers. Nor is this all. God shall also cut off the tongue that speaketh proud things. The word rendered proud occurs about thirty times in the Psalms, and is in every other case translated great. Here and in Ps. lxxi. 19, it is plural and in the latter case it is rendered great things. This rendering is favored by the Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Syriac, Calvin, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The same word is found in Jer. xlv. 5 and is translated great things. Hengstenberg renders it, The tongue that speaks big; Morison gives the sense when he says "proud boasters" are pointed out—"those who talk big, who speak great things;" Hengstenberg regards these phrases as designating the same class of persons as those mentioned in Isa. xxviii. 15, who say, "We have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves." When men flatter, lie and slander, they are on the road to hell; when they boast of their skill in these things and rely on them to bring them through, they are ready to drop into hell.

4. Who have said, With our tongue will we prevail. Hengstenberg: Through our tongue we are strong; Alexander: By our tongues will we do mightily; Edwards: We are masters of our tongues; Horsley: We will flay the man with our tongue; Calvin: We will be strengthened by our tongues; several ancient versions: We will magnify our tongue. None of these renderings give the sense more clearly than our translation; though several cast light on it. This clause is one of those proud things mentioned in the preceding verse. Shocking as is the wickedness thus bursting forth, it is but an expression of the depravity common to men. Only hundreds may say it, yet millions think it. The forms of speech, on which wicked men rely, are slander, flattery, boasting, scorning, lying, misrepresentation of every kind. But all such boasting is evil. It cannot stand because the truth is not its basis. Men may affect but can never effect independence of God. These same rebels say, Our lips are our own. Calvin: Our lips are in our own power; Brent: Our speech is in our own hand; church of England: We are they that ought to speak; Alexander: Our lips are with us, meaning either that they are our own, at our disposal, or, they are on our side; Fry: Our lips for us; Edwards, Jebb, and the Doway agree with the authorized version. Morison gives the sense: "We may utter what we please. We have skill, power, and liberty to speak. . . They think and speak as if their lips were their own, by absolute right. In the utterance of imprecations, falsehood, impurity, and irreligion, they have no feeling that they are strictly accountable. Their lips they consider as their inalienable property, and they uniformly employ them in the service of a depraved heart." And so they add, Who is lord over us? This form of irreligious speech seems to be peculiarly congenial to depraved minds. It expresses in the form of a challenge the atheism of the heart. The sense is, Who is so our master, as to hinder us from saying and doing what we please? Fry: Who shall be our master? But such cruelty and wickedness cannot last always. The triumphing of the wicked is short. Accordingly we next read,

5. For the oppression of the poor, for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise saith the LORD; I will set him in safety from him that puffeth at him. For means because of, on account of. The word rendered poor is found in Ps. ix. 12 and is there rendered humble. That rendered needy is found in Ps. ix. 18. See on those verses. This whole verse is quite variously rendered. Calvin: Because of the spoiling (or oppression) of the needy, because of the groaning of the poor, I will now arise, Jehovah will say; I will set in safety him whom he snareth, i. e., him for whom the wicked lay snares; Edwards: For the oppression of the afflicted, for the groaning of the needy, I will now arise, saith Jehovah; I will set him, whom he would ensnare, in safety; Horsley thinks "cruel treatment of the helpless" would be better than "oppression of the poor," and instead of "sighing of the needy," he prefers "outcry of the poor;" church of England: Now for the comfortless troubles' sake of the needy: and because of the deep sighing of the poor; I will up, saith the Lord, and will help every one from him that swelleth against him, and will set him at rest; Hengstenberg: Because of the desolation of the poor, because of the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the Lord; place will I in safety him who sighs after it: Alexander: From the desolation of the wretched, from the sighing of the poor, now will I arise, shall Jehovah say, I will place him in safety that shall pant after it; Fry has the last clause: I will set him in safety from him that panteth after him, understanding a panting like a savage beast, with eager desire to devour his prey; Houbigant: I will procure them safety, that they may breathe. Instead of puffeth at him, the Italian reads, speaketh boldly against him; Chaldee: I will ordain redemption to my people, but against the wicked I will testify evil. For the meaning of the word, arise, see above on Ps. iii. 7; vii. 6; ix. 19; x. 12, where the same verb is used, though in a different tense. God sees the wrongs and hears the sighs of his people, however needy, poor, humble and afflicted, and will in due time arise to judge and avenge them, seems to be the sum of what is meant in the first part of the verse. The verb rendered, saith in the original is in the future, but so it is in many other cases, where it is rendered in the present and even in the past tense. Ps. xi. 1; xli. 5; lv. 6; lxxvii. 10; Isa. i. 11; xxxviii. 21. The sum of what is promised in the second clause is rest, deliverance, salvation from proud, insidious, taunting foes. All this is made sure by the promise of God to all the humble and needy, who long for repose in the bosom of God. No marvel that such promises are very precious to the saints. They praise them, saying:

6. The words of the LORD are pure words. The word rendered pure is translated clean in Ps. xix. 9; li. 10, and in many other places, and pure in Hab. i. 13; Mal. i. 11. It often occurs in connection with the word gold, and is then always rendered pure, i. e., free from alloy. The reference here seems to be, not to gold, but to another precious metal, for it is added that God's words are as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times. God's words are pure from all error, all mistake, all equivocation, all deception, all encouragement to sin, all weakness. They are more replete with meaning, with faithfulness, with grace than the best minds and the strongest faith have ever conceived or alleged. There is something amazing in the power of God's word. It differs from all other writings. Some confine the sense of this clause to the words of God spoken in the preceding verse. Although they are included in this statement, the proposition here laid down respecting God's words is a universal truth. There is considerable diversity in rendering a part of this verse. Calvin and Amesius: Silver melted in an excellent crucible of earth; Edwards: Like silver refined in an earthen vessel; Jebb: Silver tried in the furnace from the earth; church of England: Even as the silver, which from the earth is tried; Fry: Silver refined from the crucible; Horsley: Silver assayed in a crucible of earth; Alexander: Silver purged in a furnace of earth. The intelligent reader will probably find his confidence in the common version strengthened by these renderings. But Hengstenberg would have it that David here says God's words are purified silver of a lord of the earth; and he has a long comment to show that this is the only correct rendering. But his argument will hardly satisfy many. Still it must be admitted that this clause is not without difficulties on account of the unusual collocation of words. Venema, besides his own learned exposition, gives a note from a learned friend, showing that great difficulties attend the philology of the clause. The number seven was among the Jews a number of perfection. Seven times purified is the same as perfectly purified. Notwithstanding the difficulties in some of the words, yet the general sense is remarkably clear. Even the Doway Bible does not lead us astray in the practical truth taught: The words of the Lord are pure words: as silver tried by the fire, purged from the earth, refined seven times. God's words are full of consolation as well as of purity.

7. Thou shalt keep them, O LORD, thou shalt preserve them from this generation forever. The persons referred to by the pronouns of this verse are those mentioned in verse 5. These pronouns, because they designate the same persons, are properly both given in the plural, them, though in the Hebrew the latter is singular, him. But Hammond thinks them refers to the words of the Lord mentioned in the preceding verse, and him to the just man, and so he would read, Thou, O LORD, shalt keep, or perform, those words; thou shalt preserve the just man from this generation forever. The word rendered keep is applied to keeping covenant, keeping truth, as well as keeping one in safety, or preserving one. It has probably as great a variety of signification as our English word, keep. The idea is well given in the English version. Some have supposed that by putting him in the second instance there is a reference to the small number of the pious, but such things belong to the idiom of the language, and it is not wise to strain things in this way. For him, Edwards has each one of them; Chaldee: Thou wilt preserve just (men), thou wilt guard them. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Arabic and Fry have us instead of them. This reading rests on the authority of one manuscript, an insufficient support. By this generation is meant this sort of men, viz., those described in vv. 2, 3, 4. Calvin says, that from this expression "we learn that the world, at that time, was so corrupt, that David, by way of reproach, puts them all, as it were, into one bundle. Moreover it is of importance to remember that he does not here speak of foreign nations, but of the Israelites, God's chosen people." The wicked shall not have power either to corrupt and debauch, or to destroy and exterminate the saints. Forever is a correct rendering. Hengstenberg: It always means eternity. See above on Ps. ix. 5, 7. Blessed be God, by and by the wicked shall cease from troubling and the weary shall be at rest. Though the wicked shall not be annihilated, they shall be outcasts and deprived of power to torment the saints.

8. The wicked walk on every side, when the vilest men are exalted. Perhaps no verse of Scripture has been more variously rendered than this. Hare acknowledges that he does not understand it. John Rogers' translation: And why? when vanyte and ydlenes getteth the overhande among the chyldren of men, all are full of the ungodly; Bishops' Bible: The ungodly walke on every syde: when they are exalted, the children of men are put in rebuke; the Genevan translation: The wicked walke on every side: when they are exalted it is a shame for the sonnes of men; Doway, following the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Ethiopic: The wicked walk round about; according to thy highness, thou hast multiplied the children of men. Other old translations are also variant. Calvin: The ungodly walk on every side; when they are exalted, there is reproach to the children of men; Edwards: The wicked walk up and down on every side; as thou art high exalted, thou art become contemptible to the sons of men; church of England: The ungodly walk on every side: when they are exalted, the children of men are put to rebuke; Brent renders it as our English, except that he reads vain for vilest; Clarke: The wicked walk on every side, as villany gains ground among the sons of Adam. As Hengstenberg's views are quite peculiar, his translation is given together with so much of his comment as may convey his full idea: "The wicked walk round about, they have compassed the righteous on all hands, so that without God's help deliverance is impossible. Comp. Ps. iii. 6. As elevation is depression to the sons of men, i. e., although now the righteous are overborne by the wicked, yet their distress is to be regarded in the light of prosperity, because God forsakes not his own, but will rightly recompense them for the sufferings they have endured." Perhaps the general verdict will be that our common version is better than any of these, and that among those, which materially vary from it, one is hardly to be preferred to another. Clarke: "Were we to take this in its obvious sense it would signify that at that time wickedness was the way to preferment, and good men the objects of persecution." There seems to be no good reason for Patrick's paraphrase: It "will make the wicked not know which way to turn themselves; but be ready to burst with anger and vexation, when they see these poor men, whom they contemned and vilified, not only preserved, but exalted by thy favor to dignity and honor."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is no new thing for the church to be small. In the old world it was reduced to the family of Noah. In the days of Elijah there were in all the kingdom but seven thousand, who did not bow the knee to Baal. In the days of David the godly ceased, grew scarce, v. 1. Jacob has commonly been small. Once the cry was, The world against Athanasius, and Athanasius against the world. Christ's people are a little flock. The strength of the church consists not in the number of her visible members, but in the almightiness of her Head.

2. If the church is small, let us pray for her enlargement, v. 1. No matter of prayer is more pleasing to God. True followers of God are the light of the world and the salt of the earth. "The Lord make his people a hundred times so many more as they be."

3. One of the ways in which good men become scarce, is by death. Some think there is a reference to such an event in v. 1. It is right to lament the death of good men. How sadly does Isaiah say, "The righteous perisheth, and no man layeth it to heart: and merciful men are taken away, none considering that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come," Is. lvii. 1. The children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days, Deut. xxxiv. 8. So devout men carried Stephen to his burial and made great lamentation over him, Acts viii. 2.

4. In all our troubles, in particular in our sadness respecting the low state of religion, let us rely on none but God. Help, LORD, v. 1. Desertion of our post of duty is no good sign in any man. Go where we will, we shall never be beyond the reach of trouble. Slade: "Temptations are everywhere, and so is the grace of God." The sooner we go to God with our cares the better for us.

5. So marvellously is society bound together that if one member rejoices, and is saved, or suffers, errs, and perishes, others are thereby deeply affected, v. 1. Every human being adds something to the vice or virtue, to the happiness or misery of his generation. For good cause there is mourning or shouting at the death of every human being. None of us liveth to himself.

6. Unchecked depravity manifests itself with great uniformity. One by one faithful, godly, honest, candid men disappear from the community; as when clouds arise in the night star after star is covered till not a ray of light comes down to cheer the traveller, v. 1.

7. The church of God has never been perfect. In this world spots and wrinkles and blemishes are ever found on her. Calvin: "David does not here accuse strangers or foreigners, but informs us that this deluge of iniquity prevailed in the church of God. Let the faithful, therefore, in our day, not be unduly discouraged at the melancholy sight of a very corrupt and confused state of the world." No new thing has happened. People who glorify past ages as all purer than the present, must forget the church in the days of the prophets and apostles. Every generation has had much to deplore. Horne: "The universal depravity of Jew and Gentile caused the church, of old, to pray earnestly for the first advent of Christ; and a like depravity among those who call themselves Christians, may induce her to pray no less earnestly for his appearance the second time unto salvation."

8. Wherever sin is dominant, it is sure to manifest itself in vanity, falsehood, flattery and deceit, v. 1. In other words as society forsakes God, it becomes hollow; hollowness requires deception to disguise its baseness; and so instead of hearty good wishes we hear idle compliments; instead of serious profitable discourse we have froth and vanity. The manner in which God everywhere condemns these sins, shows their utter contrariety to holiness. Henry: "The devil's image complete is a complication of malice and falsehood."

9. Some sins imply others. He that will steal will also lie. He who blasphemes God will live without prayer. Horne: "When men cease to be faithful to their God, he who expects to find them so to each other will be much disappointed," vv. 1, 2.

10. Nothing so deforms the church of God as disingenuous, hypocritical members, v. 2. Morison: "Honest-hearted worldlings, who shrink not from the avowal of their proper characters, are innocent members of the community, compared with those who wound character and feeling under the hallowed garb of friendship, formed and fostered in the sanctuary of God."

11. Dickson: "Vain talk, cozening speeches, flattering words are unbecoming honest men, and argue in so far as men affect them, ungodliness, unfaithfulness, and deceitfulness in man," v. 2.

12. Truth and kindness are elements of society so essential, that their absence will induce general wretchedness among all thinking men, v. 2. Morison: "It is a mournful thing when those who are brethren cannot confide in each other. It is still more mournful when deceit and falsehood are resorted to, in order to impart a coloring and a complexion to events, which they would not otherwise wear."

13. Horne: "They who take pleasure in deceiving others, will at the last find themselves most of all deceived, when the sun of truth, by the brightness of his rising, shall at once detect and consume hypocrisy," v. 3.

14. Calvin: "Certainly falsehood and calumnies are more deadly than swords and all other kinds of weapons," v. 3. "Life and death are in the power of the tongue," is a divine decision.

15. No set of men are more vain than boasters—those whose talk is big, v. 3. "He that boasteth himself of a false gift is as clouds and wind without rain." One reason why men should not tell all the good they know of themselves, is that such are apt, for lack of something veracious, to tell something quite beyond the truth.

16. The temporal judgments, which often befall the wicked, are forerunners of worse things to come. They who in wrath are cut off here (v. 3) are cut off from the life everlasting.

17. How dismal are the prospects of the wicked. All their hopes rest on the most monstrous errors, such as that God does not care what they do, and that their tongues are omnipotent, v. 4. Because for awhile they can make a lie pass for a truth, they hope to do so always, but they shall be sorely disappointed. A day is coming when eloquence will all be vain. There may be as much eloquence in hell as in heaven. The wicked now say all religion is vain superstition, that true philosophy is about to gain the ascendancy, and that the world will soon be better by reason of a new era in thought, but they are mistaken. All their brightest hopes shall fail them.

18. None but wicked men would dare to deny their perfect accountability, saying, Our lips are our own, v. 4. "By thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned."

19. The denial of God's ownership of us does not in the least impair its perfection, any more than a denial that he created us would change the fact in that case, v. 4. God is our Master, our Owner, our Lord. To deny this may prove us atheists, but it cannot weaken his claims to our hearty and cheerful obedience.

20. Dickson: "From the faults of the wicked, v. 4, we must learn three contrary lessons; to wit: 1. That nothing which we have is our own. But, 2. Whatsoever is given to us of God is for service to be done to him. 3. That whatsoever we do, or say, we have a Lord over us to whom we must be answerable when he calleth us to account."

21. Blood and tears both have voices. They cry louder and are heard farther than thunder, v. 5. They travel even to the throne of God, though shed in some secret place on earth.

22. When God undertakes our cause deliverance must come, salvation cannot be far off, v. 5. The wicked may puff and blow, may exert their fury and their power, but God is a munition of rocks. And when God delivers it is with a strong arm. He did not enable the Israelites to outrun the Egyptians; he utterly destroyed the latter. To the Jews in Babylon he not merely sent deliverance from Belshazzar; he sent them to rebuild their city and temple. Calvin: "To the unjustly oppressed God promises an entire restitution."

23. How excellent is holy Scripture. It is pure from all tendency to sin. It countenances no iniquity, unrighteousness, or crime. It denounces all error, deceit, falsehood. The words of the Lord are pure words, etc. Henry: "This expression denotes (1.) The sincerity of God's word; everything is really as it is there represented, and not otherwise; it does not jest with us, nor impose upon us, nor has it any other design toward us than to do us good. (2.) The preciousness of God's word; it is of great intrinsic value, like silver refined to the highest degree; it has nothing in it to depreciate it. (3.) The many proofs that have been given of its power and truth; it has been often tried, all the saints in all ages have trusted it, and so tried it, and it never deceived them, or frustrated their expectations; but they have all set to their seal that God's word is true." Their experience and their faith well agree. To add to the truth of Scripture is superstition; to take from it is sacrilege. Morison: "O Christian! bind God's word to your very heart. Read it with care, study it with diligence, pray over its hallowed contents with fervor and importunity. Ask the teaching of the divine Spirit, that you may understand and obey its pure dictates, and only quit the study of it with existence itself." The promises are all confirmed with an oath.

24. Therefore what Christians need is not less trial, or lighter affliction, but stronger and simpler faith. There are but few men who impiously deny the truth of Scripture. But Calvin well observes that "those, who while lying in the shade and living at their ease, liberally extol by their praises the truth of God's word, when they come to struggle with adversity in good earnest, although they may not venture openly to pour forth blasphemies against God, often charge him with not keeping his word. Whenever he delays his assistance we call in question his fidelity to his promises and murmur just as if he had deceived us. There is no truth which is more generally received among men than that God is true; but there are few who frankly give him credit for this when they are in adversity."

25. When God is our keeper and preserver, all enemies are vain, v. 7. The chaff cannot contend with the whirlwind, nor the feather with the burning fiery furnace; neither can sinful worms war against the Almighty. Neither the multitude of God's enemies, nor the fewness of his friends at all affects the certainty of deliverance to the righteous. A bundle of wheat is worth more than ten thousand fields of tares. God's people are not saved by their own wisdom, strength, righteousness, or numbers. Some eminent Christian men have enumerated hundreds of instances, in which God marvellously rescued them from imminent perils. God never deserts his people so that their enemies can compass their ruin.

26. Civil and political broils and commotions are no novelty, v. 8. Those, which occur in modern times are often as nothing, compared with the agitations and turmoils of David's day.

27. It is clearly a right as well as a duty to pray for our rulers, that they may be wise, good, useful and happy men. Such rulers are the richest blessings, 2 Sam. xxiii. 4.

28. What a vast difference there is in all things between saints and sinners. Their hopes and fears, joys and griefs, tastes and aversions, ends and aims all differ. The state of things described in this Psalm greatly afflicted David, but to the unprincipled wicked it was a time of great rejoicing. The same is seen now. The sinners of our day complain of bad crops, decay of trade, heavy taxes, low wages, war and pestilence. In their esteem these and such like things make bad times. But the practical judgment of the pious is that times are bad when God is dishonored, Christ rejected, the Spirit resisted, the gospel despised, or, as Henry has it, "when there is a general decay of piety and honesty among men; . . . when dissimulation and flattery have corrupted and debauched all conversation; . . . when the enemies of God, of religion and of religious people are impudent and daring, and threaten to run down all that is just and sacred; . . . when the poor and needy are oppressed, and abused, and puffed at; . . . and when wickedness abounds and goes bare-faced, under the protection and countenance of those in authority, then the times are very bad."

29. To the righteous the darkest night is followed by the bright morning. There is hope always left for the humble. Slade: "However the wicked may prevail, their triumph is but short; as Jesus said to his enemies who came to take him, 'This is your hour, and the power of darkness.'" Sadness shall one day take her eternal flight from the redeemed. "The LORD shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended," Isa. lx. 20. "From the uttermost part of the earth have we heard songs, even glory to the righteous," Isa. xxiv. 16.

30. There is a day coming, when peace and righteousness shall greatly prevail, when the church of God shall receive as much favor from earthly potentates, as in former ages she received disfavor, when kings shall be her nursing fathers, and queens her nursing mothers, and "earth shall keep jubilee a thousand years."

PSALM XIII.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 How long wilt thou forget me, O LORD? for ever? how long wilt thou hide thy face from me?
- 2 How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily? how long shall mine enemy be exalted over me?
- 3 Consider and hear me, O LORD my God: lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death;
- 4 Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him; and those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved.
- 5 But I have trusted in thy mercy; my heart shall rejoice in thy salvation.
- 6 I will sing unto the LORD, because he hath dealt bountifully with me.

FOR remarks on the title, see above on title of Ps. iv.

Theodoret thought this Psalm was written by David, not during his troubles with Saul, but during the rebellion of Absalom. For this opinion he assigns this reason, "that the trouble which Saul gave him was before his great sin, and so he was full of confidence; but that of Absalom was after it, and this made him cry out in this doleful manner." Patrick and Scott favor this view. Morison argues in favor of it. He says it "seems by no means void of support. There is a pensiveness of feeling evinced in its different parts, exceedingly characteristic of the state of mind, which the repentant monarch must have cherished on that mournful occasion. When he fled from Saul, his heart was not bowed down by the remembrance of 'presumptuous sins;' but when he hastened from the face of Absalom, the cloud of outward sorrow was but a faint emblem of that more than midnight darkness, which brooded over his soul." Although many have thought there was a tincture of sadness in the Psalms written by David after his fall beyond that found in his earlier compositions, yet it is not manifest that this Psalm is any more sad than others which were confessedly written to commemorate events occurring in the days of Saul.

Clarke says this Psalm "is supposed to have been written during the Captivity; and to contain the prayers and supplications of the distressed Israelites, worn out with long and oppressive bondage." But against this view, we have the authority of the title, which expressly ascribes it to David; we have also the whole structure of the Psalm. Hengstenberg: "The situation [of the author] is that of one, who, through lengthened persecutions and continued withdrawal of divine help, has been brought to the limits of despair, and is plunged in deadly sorrow. This particular state of mind may be recognized in the four times repeated question, how long?"

Luther: "This is a prayer full of the sighings and groanings of an afflicted heart in the hour of darkness, and almost overwhelmed, under that darkness, with the extreme of grief and sorrow, and driven to the greatest strait of mind." He understands it of every pious man, who was persecuted as David was. The Arabic has this title: "In this Psalm mention is made of the insolence of his enemies, with a prophecy concerning the presence of Christ."

Scott dates this Psalm B.C. 1057; Clarke B.C. 540. The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see respectively on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. How long wilt thou forget me, O LORD? for ever? How long wilt thou hide thy face from me? The Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Chaldee, Syriac, Calvin, Fabricius, church of England, Brent, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander, make but one question closing with for ever. Venema without good reason drops for ever, out of his translation; Piscator and Amesius read: How long O Lord? Wilt thou forget me for ever? Edwards and Jebb give the pointing as in our English version. This is perhaps to be preferred. Instead of for ever, Hengstenberg reads continually; and he says the original word "marks the uninterruptedness, and consequently the entireness of the forgetting. The Psalmist's darkness was enlightened by no ray of divine favor, his misery had no lucid intervals." Yet he subsequently expresses doubt whether this is the correct view. In Pr. xxi. 28, the same word is rendered constantly. Yet this is the only instance. It is commonly translated always, for ever, and with a negative never, literally not for ever. Used as an adjective it is also translated perpetual. Fry has still, and Houbigant utterly, instead of for ever. Luther and Gesenius prefer entirely. The same view is taken by Muis: "Thou showest thyself to me such as if thou hadst entirely forgotten me." In our version the word is never rendered still, utterly, or entirely, nor is there any instance, except this verse and Pr. xxi. 28, where it is known that any one contends for such a meaning. Alexander thinks both words may be preserved in the same sentence, sense and reason crying out for ever? but faith, how long? But all these difficulties are avoided by adopting the punctuation of the English Bible, or that of Piscator and Amesius. The words how long? are found four times in this and the next verses. Some have thought that this was on account of the fourfold captivity of Israel, viz. the Babylonish, the Median, the Grecian, and the Roman, so making this Psalm an enigmatical prophecy. But this is an unsafe way of interpreting God's word. Luther speaks much more to the purpose. "In Hebrew the word how long is four times repeated without alteration; instead of which, however, the Latin Translator has substituted another word at the third repetition, because he wished to make some variation. But we would rather preserve the simplicity of the Hebrew dialect, because by the fourfold use of the same word, it seeks to express the affection of the prophet, and the impressiveness of which is weakened by the change adopted by the Latin interpreter." Morison: "The words, how long, express the utmost distress, and the most earnest cry for deliverance." Calvin: "The words, how long, for ever? are a defective form of expression; but they are much more emphatic than if he had put the question according to the usual mode of speaking, Why for so long a time? By speaking thus, he gives us to understand, that for the purpose of cherishing his hope, and encouraging himself in the exercise of patience, he extended his view to a distance, and that, therefore, he does not complain of a calamity of a few days' duration, as the effeminate and the cowardly are wont to do, who see only what is before their feet, and immediately succumb at the first assault." As to forget God is a form of expression denoting wickedness in us, so for God to forget us is for him to withhold his needed aid, Ps. ix. 12, 18; x. 12. To hide the face is to refuse to look into an affair so as to grant relief, Ps. x. 11, or to withhold smiles of approbation. The Chaldee has it, "How long wilt thou hide the glory of thy face from me?" Morison: "The hiding of Jehovah's face is an expression borrowed, in all probability, from the sensible manifestations of the divine presence in the tabernacle." Horne: "While God permits his servants to continue under affliction, he is said, after the manner of men, to have 'forgotten, and hid his face from' them."

2. How long shall I take counsel in my soul, having sorrow in my heart daily? The how long is the same as before. This part of the verse is variously rendered. Hare renders the first part thus: How long shall I have vexation in my soul? Boothroyd: How long shall I be distressed in mind? Indeed all the part of the verse quoted above is given with some variety. Edwards: How long shall I grieve in my soul, and have sorrow in my heart? Calvin: How long shall I take counsel in my soul? and have sorrow in my heart daily? Jebb: How long shall I take counsel in my soul, with sorrow in my heart daily? church of England: How long shall I seek counsel in my soul, and be so vexed in my heart? Fry: How long shall I lay up anxiety in my soul, sorrow in my heart all the day? Alexander: Till when, how long, shall I place (or lay up) counsels, plans, in my soul, grief in my heart by day? Morison says, The Alexandrine Septuagint reads the last clause afore given: How long shall I have grief day and night? Boothroyd: How long [shall I] be all day grieved in heart? The word rendered counsel is in the original plural, counsels. It occurs nearly ninety times, is once rendered advice, once advisement, twice purpose, in all other cases counsel, or where united with another noun counsellor, i. e., man of counsel. Morison: "It is evidently the act of painful rumination that is here described." Luther: "When the unhappy man finds that God feels towards him in the manner described, it then happens to him as follows:—That is, his heart is as a raging sea, in which all sorts of counsels move up and down; he tries on all hands to find a hole through which he can make his escape; he thinks on various plans, and still is utterly at a loss what to advise. . . As soon as the face of God is turned away from us, presently follow consternation, distraction, darkness in the understanding and uncertainty of counsel, so that we grope, as it were, in midnight, and seek everywhere how we may find escape." Alexander: "By day is elsewhere put in opposition to by night, as for instance in Ps. i. 2 above. Here it may possibly mean all day, but more probably it means every day, daily, as in Ezek. xxx. 16." The last clause of this verse is, How long shall mine enemy be exalted over me? Calvin and Jebb's rendering of this is identical with our version; church of England: How long shall mine enemies triumph over me? Edwards: How long shall my enemy exalt himself against me? Hengstenberg: How long shall my enemy exalt himself over me? Alexander: Till when shall my enemy be high above me? To be high or exalted is to be successful, to be beyond the reach of effectual opposition. The word here rendered enemy, occurs some hundreds of times, and is always rendered enemy, in the plural enemies, except once, where it is foes. It may point to any foe, visible or invisible, human or diabolical.

3. Consider and hear me, O LORD my God; lighten mine eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death. This verse is variously rendered. Calvin: Behold [or look upon me,] answer me, O Jehovah my God; enlighten mine eyes lest I sleep in death; Edwards: Look upon me; answer me, Jehovah my God; enlighten my eyes, lest I sleep the sleep of death; Alexander: Look, hear me, Jehovah, my God, lighten my eyes, lest I sleep the death. The verb rendered consider does not occur more than seventy times in the Hebrew Bible. It is commonly rendered look, behold, see, but it is sometimes rendered consider, sometimes regard, have respect. Ps. cxix. 6; Lam. v. 1; Hab. i. 5. The word here seems to signify, Consider favorably. The verb rendered hear is found in Ps. iii. 4. It is more commonly rendered answer. That is the sense here. The meaning is, kindly regard and answer me. Everywhere else this form of the verb lighten is rendered, cause to shine, or make to shine. Ps. xxxi. 16; lxxx. 3, 19; cxix. 135; Dan. ix. 17. Perhaps it would be better to retain that form here, Cause mine eyes to shine, i. e., to have that peculiar lustre, which evinces health, gladness and confidence. The Chaldee has it: "Enlighten mine eyes in thy law, lest I sin, and sleep with them which are guilty of death." But no such spiritual sense is naturally suggested by the words. All these petitions seem naturally to arise out of the sad state of things described in the former verses. To consider is the opposite of forgetting to answer, of hiding the face; and to enlighten is the very mercy needed by one who has been perplexed and filled with distrust and sorrow. Calvin and Hengstenberg explain the enlightening of the eyes by a reference to the effect the honey had on Jonathan's eyes, 1 Sam. xiv. 27, 29. Hengstenberg also thinks that to sleep the sleep of death is a phrase like that in Jer. li. 39, 57. Luther: "When the Lord lifts upon us the light of his countenance, and turns his face towards us, listening to our cry, then are our eyes again enlightened, and we have no difficulty in obtaining counsel." The third verse does not produce a pause in the sense as is seen from the beginning of the next verse.

4. Lest mine enemy say, I have prevailed against him. The enemy here is the same mentioned, v. 2. Whether Saul, or Satan, or any other particular person is intended, the scorn and contempt he manifested were terrible to David. Cruel mockings either from men or devils are not easily borne. That is a very bitter cry in Ps. cxliii. 3, 4: "We are exceedingly filled with contempt. Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud." No trial has a keener edge than the insults and exultations of enemies. Where they are clearly the enemies of God, their derisions terribly pierce the righteous. But as they greatly dishonor God, we may appeal to him not to permit his name to be evil spoken of through the audacious success and open triumph of ungodly enemies. But David had many foes, to none of whom he desired triumph in their evil course. And so he prays for mercy and deliverance, assigning this reason, lest those that trouble me rejoice when I am moved. The wicked are greatly emboldened by success, even though it be but temporary. Calvin reads it, And [lest] those who afflict me rejoice if I should fall; Edwards: And [lest] my enemies exult, when I am fallen; church of England: For if I be cast down, they that trouble me will rejoice at it; Fry: My adversaries rejoice because I am moved; Alexander: And [lest] my adversaries shout when I am shaken, or because I shall be shaken; Doway: They that trouble me will rejoice when I am moved. The last verb in this clause is commonly rendered as here, or be removed; yet in Ps. lxxxii. 5 it is rendered are out of course. In Ps. xli. 5, and Isa. liv. 10, it is applied to the convulsions of nature; in Deut. xxxii. 35 it is rendered slide, and in Ps. xvii. 5 slip. The moving here spoken of may regard either the dismay, the defeat, the death, or the spiritual discomfiture of David. Any failure, which would give occasion of exultation to the enemy, was here prayed against. After moved the Chaldee adds from thy ways.

5. But I have trusted in thy mercy. Calvin and Hengstenberg: I trust in thy goodness; Edwards and Jebb: But as for me, in thy mercy I trust; Fry: But I, I have trusted in thy tenderness; church of England: But my trust is in thy mercy; Alexander: And I in thy mercy have trusted. The past tense, have trusted, agrees with the original, and gives the fullest and best sense. Trust in God's mercy was an old habit of mind with David, and was still kept up. It should never forsake him. Such a one may well say, My heart shall rejoice in thy salvation. Morison: "The word rendered rejoice involves in it the idea of ardent exultation corresponding to the great salvation." There is no better assurance of final victory than that drawn from the grace which enables us to trust in the divine mercy in the darkest hours. The church of England reads: My heart is joyful; Hengstenberg and Fry also use the present tense, rejoices; Calvin, Edwards and Jebb use the future, shall or will; Alexander: Let my heart exult in thy salvation. Salvation in every Scriptural sense of the term has long been owned by the church of God to be exclusively from the Lord. In him alone is safety and protection. Even deliverance from temporal ills can be wrought by none except God be with him. How much more then is spiritual deliverance, the salvation of the soul, the work of God. He alone devised the wondrous plan. He alone executed it by his Son. He alone applies it by his Holy Spirit. But every effectual deliverance is from Jehovah. One thing is very noticeable in God's dealings with his people;—his interpositions are so arranged as to show that relief comes from him alone. He interposes, when all other helpers fail. If we adopt the rendering, Let my heart exult in thy salvation, then the prayer is that all other trust may be excluded, and all disposition to fix any time for his rescue be laid aside.

6. I will sing unto the LORD, because he hath dealt bountifully with me. The order of this Psalm is natural and beautiful. In vv. 1, 2, David four times cries out, How long? In v. 3, he begins earnestly to pray for help. In v. 4, he uses that argument so often prevalent with God to vindicate his name and that of his chosen against the wicked. Thus pleading, he increases in faith. Thus believing, he rejoices in God. Thus rejoicing, he breaks forth into songs of praise. Alexander prefers another form of gradation: "First a fact is stated: 'I have trusted in thy mercy;' then a desire is expressed: 'let my heart rejoice in thy salvation;' then a fixed purpose is announced: 'I will sing unto Jehovah.'" The verb rendered dealt bountifully is rendered in the same way in Ps. cxvi. 7; cxix. 17; cxlii. 7. Elsewhere it is rendered by the verb rewarded. Parkhurst contends for that sense here, applying the Psalm to Messiah. The word recompense is also used to translate it, 2 Sam. xix. 36; Joel iii. 4. In Pr. xi. 17, the participle from it is rendered doeth good. Amesius here renders it, hath done me good. Our version cannot be improved. It agrees with Luther, Hengstenberg and many others. But God's favors should awaken gratitude, and gratitude demands a song for its expression; and so David says, I will sing unto the LORD. A good resolution is a capital thing. If any man ever glorifies God in thought, word, or deed, it must be consequent upon a solemn, humble, deliberate purpose to do so. Edwards reads: I will sing to Jehovah for having been gracious to me; church of England: I will sing of the Lord because he hath dealt so lovingly with me. In the Septuagint and the versions which follow it, this clause is added to the end of the verse: I will make a Psalm (or sing) to the name of the Lord most high. But these words are not found in the Hebrew text. Jebb and Merrick follow Lowth in supposing that they ought to be added in order to complete the usual form of Hebrew poetry. In the Septuagint the clause added is precisely the same as the last clause of Ps. 7, which see.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Dark days are to the people of God no new thing, vv. 1, 2. David saw such times. All the saints have seen them. Dickson: "Trouble outward and inward, of body and spirit, fightings without, and terrors within, vexations from heaven and earth, from God deserting and men pursuing may fall upon a child of God." No temptation befalls good men now but such as has always been common to the saints.

2. No darkness is so dreadful as spiritual darkness, v. 1. Job's misery reached its height when he said, "O that I knew where I might find him. . . Behold, I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him: on the left hand, where he doth work, but I cannot behold him: he hideth himself on the right hand, that I cannot see him." Luther says that David here "paints this most pungent and bitter grief of mind, in the most graphic words, as one that feels he has to do with a God alienated from him, hostile, unappeasable, inexorable, and forever angry. For here hope itself despairs, and despair hopes notwithstanding, and there only lives the unutterable groaning with which the Holy Spirit intercedes in us, Rom. viii. 26, who moved upon the darkness which covered the waters, as is said at the beginning of Genesis. This no one understands who has not tasted it."

3. When God delays his visits of relief, he has wise reasons for his conduct. God's time of deliverance is commonly further off than man's ignorance esteems best, vv. 1, 2. Yet it is often nearer than man's unbelief allows him to hope. The reason is, God is wiser and greater than man.

4. To cry out under the hidings of God's countenance is not sinful. Even the man without sin cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Let us imitate his lowliness and his faith. We must guard our souls against the great error of inferring refusal from postponement of deliverance. We must give God his time.

5. Because God's people love him above all else, therefore the thought of final and total rejection is intolerable, v. 1. They can bear anything but this. They will die, if they behold not his face in peace and in righteousness.

6. All repetition in prayer is not forbidden, but only vain repetition, vv. 1, 2. Four times does David cry out, How long?

7. It is well for us often to ask ourselves in the midst of trials, Will this thing much affect me a month, or a year hence? what will I think of it in a dying hour? in eternity will I regard it as of any moment? Calvin says that by crying out, How long? forever? David "teaches us to stretch our view as far as possible into the future, that our present grief may not entirely deprive us of hope."

8. Yet what poor creatures the greatest and best men are, if forsaken of God! vv. 1, 2. How bitter is the cry of the soul, unsustained by God. Henry: "Nothing is more killing to a soul than the want of God's favor, nothing more reviving than the return of it. . . Long afflictions try our patience and often tire it. It is a common temptation, when trouble lasts long, to think it will last always; despondency then turns into despair, and those that have long been without joy, begin, at last, to be without hope."

9. Calvin: "It is the peculiar office of God to repress the audacity and insolence of the wicked, as often as they glory in their wickedness." Therefore let us at all times carry our cause to him as David did, vv. 1, 2, 3. God's character forbids that he should abandon the righteous to the power and derision of his and their enemies. That be far from thee, O Lord.

10. There must be a great deal of dross in even good men to make daily and long-continued sorrow necessary to their sanctification, vv. 1, 2.

11. Let none be surprised that the haughty wicked often have for a time considerable success, and carry things with a high hand. It has long been so, v. 2. Their time of defeat and disaster is coming.

12. How marvellous it is that God should often permit his people to be for a time under the power of cruel, tyrannical husbands, parents, masters and rulers, v. 2. Daniel and his pious cotemporaries must live under those capricious Chaldean monarchs. Abigail lives with a husband, who is such a son of Belial that a man cannot speak a word to him. Such is the school, where the saints are often disciplined for usefulness and even for glory. Intolerable hardship leads to bliss and victory.

13. If faith had no victories and comforts, it would quite despond, v. 3. Blessed be the name of God, he never leaves himself without witness, nor permits his people to be tempted beyond what they are able to bear.

14. That is good for us, which leads us to pray, v. 3. It is better to be praying in the whale's belly than asleep in the ship. How prayer here helps David. "God's mercy supported his faith; his faith in God's mercy filled his heart with joy in his salvation; his joy in God's salvation would fill his heart with songs of praise."

Henry: "It is some ease to a troubled spirit to give vent to its griefs, especially to give vent to them at the throne of grace, where we are sure to find one, who is afflicted in the afflictions of his people, and is troubled with the feeling of their infirmities."

15. We cannot too often plead our covenant relation to God, v. 3. How uniformly do the saints cry, O Lord my God. Let them never disuse so excellent a practice. It is a great nourisher of the soul. If men will not consider our cause, God will.

16. Nothing so cheers the heart and lightens the eyes as the gracious presence of God, v. 3. It is the life of the soul.

17. How dreadful is the malice of the wicked. They often rejoice when God's people suffer in character, or person, or plans, v. 4. The hatred, which rejoices at calamities on the good, will surely be requited, Pr..xvii. 5. How much does wickedness on earth resemble that of the world of woe! How justly and inevitably hell follows unpardoned, unrepented sin!

18. How essential at every stage of the Christian life is faith, v. 5. Calvin: "It is not in a human way, or from natural feelings, we recognize in our misery that God cares for us, but by faith we apprehend his invisible providence. So David, as far as he could gather from the actual state of things, seemed to himself to be deserted by God. Still, however, having previously enjoyed the light of faith, he penetrated, with the eye of his mind, into the hidden grace of God; else how should he have directed his groans and desires to him?"

19. To the believing sinner or sufferer how sweet is mercy, v. 5. He lives by it. He hopes in it. He prefers it to all other sources of joy. He is never more blessed than when he thinks of no other resource.

20. However long the time of suffering to the righteous, it shall not last always, but be soon followed by a time of joy, v. 5. Tholuck: "A great number of our own [German] hymns were composed in the gloomy days of the thirty years' war." All God's people should here begin the work of praise, and so tune their souls to immortal songs.

21. No change is so great or so sudden that God will not effect it for his people, if it is for their good. David begins his song in sadness, but he ends it in joy.

22. The salvation which succeeds warfare, temptation and sorrow, will be wonderful, v. 5. The rest of Canaan was a delightful successor to the weary journey of the wilderness.

23. The trials and victories of the saints of all ages are so uniform that the same complaints and songs suit successive generations of God's people. This Psalm is as applicable to believers in this as in any preceding age.

PSALM XIV.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 THE fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good.

2 The LORD looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, and seek God.

3. They are all gone aside, they are all together become filthy: there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

4 Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread, and call not upon the LORD.

5 There were they in great fear: for God is in the generation of the righteous.

6 Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor, because the LORD is his refuge.

7 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! when the LORD bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

THE title has not the word Psalm in it, but it is properly supplied in our English Bible. Calvin and Hengstenberg propose to read the title thus: To the chief musician of David. This is a literal rendering of all that is in the Hebrew title. But Alexander agrees with the sense of the English version, and renders it: To the chief musician, by David. This is probably correct.

In either case the inscription indicates the date of the Psalm, i. e., some period in David's life. That he is its author is made sufficiently to appear by Hengstenberg, although Edwards, Rosenmuller and others employ a very confident tone of denial, arguing especially from the seventh verse. But there is no evidence that the language of that verse is in its true intent more applicable to times hundreds of years after David than during his life. Good men always longed for the coming salvation.

The attempt of some to apply this general description of evil men to the heathen, and not to human nature generally, is an awkward failure. For first the descriptions elsewhere given of man quite correspond with the statements here made; and secondly, the inspired apostle quotes this Psalm in proof that both Jews and Gentiles are all under sin, Rom. iii. 9, 12. Not only are the heathen sinners; all men are sinners also.

The resemblance of this Psalm to Ps. liii. has been often noticed. It is not certain, though it is probable this is the older composition. Venema well says that between these Psalms there is "no variation, which does not provide a sense excellent in both Psalms, and suited to the scope." The strain of the liii. is more elevated in some points than this. Venema properly adds that "the style of this Psalm is plain, easy and simple." The whole composition is well adapted to the use of the church in all ages.

In this Psalm we have Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. The fool here spoken of is the sinner. Diodati says the fool is "the sensual and profane man, not enlightened with the lively light of God's Spirit: who, through the malice of his heart, puts out as far as in him lieth the natural lights of knowledge, and of conscience, concerning God, his providence, law and judgment, that he may run headlong to all manner of evil." Morison: "The Hebrew word, rendered fool, is derived from a verb, which signifies to fade and wither, as the falling leaves of autumn; and which connects with this primary signification, as applied to persons, the idea of moral decay and worthlessness. As a verbal it seems to denote not only an individual foolish and vaporing, but one who is very depraved and ungodly. It is worthy of notice that the corresponding word in Arabic signifies an atheist, an unbeliever." For fool Fry reads wretch, and in a note explains the word as signifying "a fallen, decayed, vile, contemptible, or foolish wretch." Calvin: "As the Hebrew word, translated fool, signifies not only a fool, but also a perverse, vile and contemptible person, it would not have been unsuitable to have translated it so in this place; yet I am content to follow the more generally received interpretation, which is, that all profane persons, who have cast off all fear of God, and abandoned themselves to iniquity, are convicted of madness." The meaning is not that in their own eyes, nor in the eyes of worldly men they are fools; but that they are so in the eyes of God and of sound reason, and the result will show it. The word rendered fool is in Isa. xxxii. 5, 6, rendered the vile person; but elsewhere it is in our version invariably rendered as here fool or foolish. The corresponding noun is in the English text rendered folly, villany, so vile a thing, and in the margin wickedness. Gen. xxxiv. 7; Isa. xxxii. 6; Jer. xxix. 23; Josh. vii. 15; Jud. xix. 24. There is no evidence that the word fool designates merely open libertines and profane persons; much less is it confined to the heathen.

The fool hath said. Edwards reads saith; Luther and Hengstenberg, speaks; the Syriac also uses the present tense, says. But in the Hebrew the verb is in the preterite, hath said. Alexander: "The preterites [of this verse] include the present, but suggest the additional idea that the truth here asserted is the result of all previous experience and observation." There seems to be no ground for a play on the word said, such as Lord Bacon supposes, in opposition to thought. In his heart. By this term Fry understands "secretly." Chillingworth: He is "both a resolute, secret atheist, and withal wise enough to keep his folly to himself;" Alexander: "To himself, if not to others;" Morison: "The word signifying heart has reference, as used among the Hebrews, more to the intellect than the feeling. It seems here to refer to the evil thoughts and surmises of a depraved and atheistical mind." On the other hand Hengstenberg thinks "the discourse here is not of the atheism of the understanding, but of the atheism of the heart." The word rendered heart is found more than five hundred times in the Hebrew Bible. It is used in Gen. vi. 5, 6, twice in Gen. viii. 21. It is often used in Exodus where the hardening of Pharaoh's heart is mentioned. See also Ps. iv. 7; ix. 1, and many other places. In moral judgments the heart has great power. "The wish is father to the thought." There is no God. The words there is are supplied by the translators. Morison and Alexander argue that the translators correctly supply, There is. Perhaps they are right. The same is done in the last clause of the verse, where all admit its propriety. Yet some learned men have supposed that it was best to omit There is, and read, "No God, i. e., Let there be no God—I wish there was no God." However this may be we know there are these kinds of atheists: 1. Those who wish that there was no God. They are atheists in desire. Henry: "The fool cannot satisfy himself that there is no God, but he wishes there were none, and pleases himself with the fancy that it is possible there may be none; he cannot be sure there is one, and therefore he is willing to think there is none." Could the wicked have it their way there would be no God. They hate him and do not like to retain him in their knowledge. 2. We have practical atheists. Chillingworth: "They live as if there were no God, having no respect at all to him in all their projects, and therefore, indeed, and in God's esteem, become formally, and in strict propriety of speech, very atheists. In heart and life many are and act very much as if there was no God. Luther: "The fool speaks there is no God, not with the mouth, gesture, appearance, and other external signs, for in such respects he often boasts before the lovers of God that he knows God—but in heart, that is, in his inward sentiments. These in the ungodly are deluded, and thence presently follows blindness of understanding, so that he can neither think rightly of God, nor speak, nor direct his conduct properly. Accordingly, those alone have God who do not believe in God with hypocritical faith. All besides are fools, and say in their hearts: there is no God." 3. There are speculative atheists whose foolish heart is so darkened, whose conscience is so defiled, and whose minds are so alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, that they prevailingly doubt or in word deny that there is a God. There have been such persons. They have shown great zeal for their opinions, and even a readiness to die for them. 4. But many who admit the divine existence deny the divine government and providence. How it can evince wisdom or do good to admit that there is a God, who yet does nothing, sees nothing, cares nothing, regards nothing, punishes nothing, rewards nothing, has never been shown. Many suppose that this is the class of atheists here referred to. First, there are such persons described in this book, Ps. xciv. 7. Secondly, the word used here is not Jehovah but Elohim. They do not say there is no self-existent, independent, eternal, unchangeable being, but "there is no Elohim, no Judge or Governor of the world, no Providence presiding over the affairs of men." The Chaldee paraphrases it, There is no (power or) government of God in the earth. It very naturally follows respecting such, They are corrupt. The Chaldee reads, They corrupt their works; Edwards: They corrupt themselves; Alexander: They have done corruptly. From any and every kind of atheism flows a corruption so horrible that nothing on earth can be worse. Atheists not only become corrupt after embracing their huge error, but their corruption made them atheists. The verb here used is in the preterite. It is sometimes rendered marred, frequently corrupted, more frequently destroyed. The wicked have marred themselves, broken themselves, destroyed themselves by their corruption. They have done abominable works. Edwards: They commit abominable actions; Mudge: They are abominable in their frolics; Jebb: They are abominable in their doings; Horsley: They are abominable in their profligacy; Fry: They have done abominable deeds; Hengstenberg: They are abominable in their actions; Calvin: They have done abominable works; church of England: They are become abominable in their doings; Alexander: They have done abominably (in) deed (or act); Doway: They are become abominable in their ways; Syriac: They are become corrupt in their artful devices. Each of these gives a good sense, though some are rather too free translations. There is none that doeth good; Septuagint: There is none that doeth good, no, not one; Edwards: There is not one that doeth good; Alexander: There is none doing good. The most literal rendering is, There is not (any) that doeth good. The works of sinners are themselves sinful. Their ploughing is sin, Pr. xxi. 4. Their sacrifice is an abomination, Pr. xv. 8. Even their solemn meeting is iniquity, Is. i. 13. Wicked men may do that which is right for the matter of it, but their motives are all wrong. They do nothing that God esteems a good work, for he looks at the heart. "Love is the fulfilling of the law," and they have no love. "Without faith it is impossible to please God," and they are swayed by unbelief. Sin mars and ruins all the works of the wicked.

2. The LORD looked down from heaven upon the children of men to see if there were any that did understand and seek God. Edwards and Hengstenberg put the first verb in the present tense, looks or looketh. But not without cause, Calvin, Fry, Jebb and Alexander agree with the English version in using the past tense, looked. The last of these writers well says however that "the force of the preterite is the same as in the preceding verse." The tense used denotes here a continuous act. From the beginning God has done this thing, Gen. vi. 12; xi. 5; xviii. 21. There is an all-seeing eye, and it has always been inspecting human affairs. While men rave against God, that very God upholds them in existence, or banishes them to hell. In this verse "the infallible judgment and scrutiny of God" determine the universal corruption of human nature. Man's depravity is a doctrine, not of human invention or of sourness of mind. It is the clear teaching of him, who loves purity, and has searched the earth with the scrutiny of omniscience, and found all men very far gone in sin. This depravity manifests itself chiefly in two ways, blindness and aversion to God. Men neither understand, nor do they seek God. If their minds were not darkened they would see the beauty of divine things, and then they would love them. And if men loved and so sought divine things, they would soon perceive something, yea, much of their beauty. We cannot see beauty without loving it, and we cannot feel a lively and pleasing interest in anything without being in such a state as readily to embrace true perceptions respecting it. The participle here rendered understand is elsewhere rendered wise, prudent, expert, skilful, Dan. xii. 10; Amos v. 13; Jer. i. 9; Dan. i. 4; it is also rendered to teach, to behave wisely, 2 Chron. xxx. 22; 1 Sam. xviii. 14, 15. Other forms of the word are rendered by the verbs to consider, to prosper, to instruct, to be instructed, to have good success, to deal prudently, Job xxxiv. 27; Jer. x. 21; xx. 11; xxiii. 5; Neh. ix. 20; Pr. xxi. 11; Josh. i. 8; Isa. lii. 13. In their soul's affairs the wicked are neither wise, nor prudent, nor expert, nor skilful, nor do they behave wisely, nor teach correctly, nor are they well instructed, nor do they duly consider, nor do they deal prudently, nor have they good success, nor do they prosper. They are all silly. There is not one element of wisdom in all their behaviour concerning duty and salvation. The remark of Hengstenberg that the word rendered understand is "always used of the conduct, to act prudently," does not appear to be well founded. The word rendered seek is often so translated, as in Ps. ix. 10; xxii. 26; and many other places. It is also rendered to inquire, Deut. xiii. 14; to search, Jer. xxix. 13; to regard, Job iii. 4; to care for, Deut. xi. 12; Ps. cxlii. 4. The wicked are very vile. They neither regard God, nor care for him, nor inquire after him, nor search for him, nor seek him. The correlative verb in some cases is to find. True wisdom consists in seeking and finding God. The next verse contains God's decision respecting man's character.

3. They are all gone aside. Chaldee: They are all turned backward; Arabic: They have all gone astray at once; The Doway agrees with the authorized version; Edwards; They are all gone out of the right way; Calvin: Every one of them has gone aside; Fry: They are all gone astray; church of England: They are all gone out of the way; Jebb: They are all gone aside together; Hengstenberg: All are gone away; Alexander: The whole has apostatized. Venema reads this whole verse as if it was a continuation of the inquiry begun in the previous verse. But for this there appears to be no good reason. Calvin: "Some translate the verb rendered, gone aside, to stink, as if the reading were, Every one of them emits an offensive odor, that it may correspond in meaning with the verb in the next clause, which in Hebrew signifies to become putrid or rotten. But there is no necessity for explaining the two words in the same way, as if the same thing were repeated twice." Ainsworth: The all, that is, the whole universal multitude is departed; All in general, and every one in particular. It is added: They are all together become filthy. The word all is supplied from the preceding clause, these here spoken of being the same as those there mentioned. The word rendered filthy is found but three times in the Hebrew Bible, is in each case rendered the same way, and in each case applied to man. Ps. liii. 3; Job xv. 16. For filthy Edwards, Fry, Hengstenberg, and the Arabic use corrupt; Calvin: putrid or rotten; the Septuagint, Vulgate and Doway, unprofitable; Alexander: Together they have putrefied; Morison: The allusion, perhaps, is to an animal substance in a state of dreadful decay. In whatever else mankind may differ, in this they are agreed, that they have deeply revolted against God, and are become offensive. They are together, or in like manner become filthy. There is union, agreement, verisimilitude here. He adds: There is none that doeth good, no, not one. In the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and the Vulgate, this clause is precisely like the last clause of the first verse, which see. How the variation in the English was brought about is not certain. In some editions of the Septuagint the words, No, not one, are wanting. In the common editions of that version they are found both here and in the first verse. Some contend that later editors inserted them in the text of the Septuagint bringing them from Rom. iii. 12. But this is hardly probable. The Septuagint Interpreters gave what they regarded as the sense of the author, and Paul approves of this as the true meaning of the Psalmist, and so adopts it. There is no sufficient ground for believing that Paul misquoted the Greek version. The church of England here inserts several verses from Rom. iii. but quite without authority. They are not found in the Hebrew, nor even in the Syriac, or Chaldee, though they are in the Septuagint.

4. Have all the workers of iniquity no knowledge? Many unregenerate men make great proficiency in science, in literature, in the arts of war and peace, of government and civilization; but in religious matters they are left to themselves, and "an archangel left to himself would be a fool." In religious matters, in his soul's affairs, every wicked man sets at defiance every maxim of sound wisdom, every dictate of divine knowledge. Sin is as great a madness as it is a wickedness. Edwards renders this clause, Do not any of the workers of iniquity observe? church of England: Have they no knowledge, that they are all such workers of iniquity? The chief reference in this clause is thought by some to be to the great self-ignorance of the wicked. They know not their own sinfulness, or guilt, or misery, or ruin. Who eat up my people. Horsley and Morison connect these words with the first clause of the verse, and make a full pause in the sense at the word people. They then read the residue of the verse: They eat bread, and call not upon the name of the Lord. The word as, in our version, has nothing in the original to correspond to it. This reading also gives a good sense. The great mass of the wicked are slaves to sense and lust and appetite. They know nothing but what they know naturally as brute beasts. They are fond of the good things of this life; but they are averse to prayer and praise. They call not upon the Lord. This may be the teaching of the place; but it has not been the common understanding of the passage. None of the ancient versions so read the verse. Most moderns approve the sense given in our version. The cruelty of the wicked is well expressed by their eating up the saints, both here and in Ps. xxvii. 2; Mic. iii. 3. Eat, often so rendered, also to consume, to devour. Eat is the best word here. Luther: "Those eat the people, who draw only profit from them, and who do not employ their station for the glory of God, and the salvation of those over whom they are placed." Persecutors eat up the church when they vex, torment, and murder the saints.

5. There were they in great fear. Literally, There they feared a fear. So Jebb. Calvin: There they did tremble with fear. Our version gives the true sense. There seems to be no good reason for the rendering given by Fry: Tremble with fear. The word is never so rendered in our version, although in Job iv. 14 a kindred word shake is used. But the verb is in the preterite, just as several other verbs in this Psalm. The best sense is obtained from the common version. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Ethiopic and church of England add the words, Where no fear was. These words are brought here from Ps. liii. 5; but they are not in the Hebrew, Chaldee, or Syriac of this Psalm. The wicked have their fears so roused at times as to make earth like hell. One cried, "O hell! if thou canst cover me, take me." Another: "O the insufferable pangs of hell and damnation." Many of the profane and blasphemous speeches of ungodly sinners are signs of the fearful strife in their minds. The late school-boy whistles as he passes by the grave-yard. One great fact troubles the wicked. They have not the favor of God themselves, and they fear. For God [Elohim] is in the generation of the righteous. Chaldee: For the word of God is in the generation of the just. But the original justifies no such limitation of the sense. God himself is so remarkably with his people that the heathen have been struck with it, Esther vi. 13. The sense of in Calvin thinks is with or for. John Wesley, dying, said: "The best of all is, God is with us." In this world sinners are often overwhelmed and brought to repentance by a full conviction that God is with his people, 1 Cor. xiv. 25.

6. Ye have shamed the counsel of the poor because the LORD is his refuge. The word rendered counsel is always so translated, or by the words advice, advisement, purpose,

Ps. i. 1; xiii. 2. The poor is the suffering, the afflicted, in the singular. In Ps. ix. 12 the word is rendered humble. See comment on that place. The word rendered shamed is often rendered confounded. The wicked often fill the hearts of God's people with grief, shame and confusion by opposing and defeating all their wise and benevolent plans and counsels for the glory of God and the good of men, even for the salvation of their opposers and contemners. The verb in Hebrew is in the future. And so Alexander reads: The plan of the sufferer ye will shame; Edwards makes it a question: Will ye laugh at the resolution of the afflicted because Jehovah is his refuge? Venema also makes a question of the first clause: Will ye shame the counsel of the afflicted and poor? Mudge: Will ye now shame or laugh at the poor oppressed people for making God their refuge? But I find no ancient and few modern versions using the interrogative form. There seems to be no propriety in translating the first clause as Horsley: The counsel of the helpless man shall put them to shame. If our version is correct, then the sense is that the very piety of the afflicted provokes the contempt of the wicked, as we know it often does, Ps. xxii. 8; Matt. xxvii. 43. Some have thought the language ironical: You may confound the plan of the righteous if you can. But this is hardly authorized. Instead of because, Diodati proposes to read but, and this is authorized by our translation of Gen. xvii. 15. This gives a good sense. The wicked may laugh at the poor, the sufferer, as they please, but Jehovah is his refuge. He is as safe when the world blasphemes as when it utters its idle praises. Boothroyd also has it, But Jehovah will be his refuge. Hardly any word is more variously rendered than that translated because. Refuge, elsewhere twice translated shelter, Job xxiv. 8; Ps. lxi. 3; and twice hope, Jer. xvii. 17; Joel iii. 16; in all other places refuge.

7. Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! There is great diversity in rendering this clause. Most of the ancient versions read, Who shall give out of Zion deliverance to Israel? Chaldee: "Who shall bring forth out of Zion the redemption of Israel? Calvin: Who shall give salvation to Israel out of Zion? Montanus: Who will give from Zion the salvation of Israel? Edwards: Oh that the deliverance of Israel might be granted from Zion; Boothroyd: O that some would give from Zion the salvation of Israel; Jebb: Who will give from Zion salvation to Israel? Fry: O that the salvation of Israel were given out of Zion! Hengstenberg says it is literally, Who will give from Zion the deliverance of Israel? Yet he does not reject the sense given by the English version, which is as good as any. Fabritius and Alexander say that the phrase who will give is an idiomatic optative in Hebrew. All the pious associations of the Israelites were with Zion as the capital of the theocracy, the city of their solemnities, and the prophetic source of deliverance, Rom. xi. 26. The salvation sought is for the church and is deliverance from the wickedness and wicked men above described; and that these foolish people may have a better mind, and no longer deny God, or providence, but piously confess both. When the LORD bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad. Calvin agrees with our version except that for bringeth he reads shall have brought. The word rendered bringeth back has very varied significations. It is found in precisely the same form in Ps. liii. 6; cxxvi. 1. Often elsewhere it is found in connection with captivity. See Job xlii. 10; Jer. xxix. 14; Eze. xvi. 53. In Ps. xxiii. 3 it is restoreth. It is often rendered turn, return. Edwards has it, When Jehovah restoreth his captive people, Jacob will exult, Israel will be glad. But this rendering is based on the supposition that this Psalm was written during the Babylonish captivity, which is a mistake. Edwards is followed by Fry. Hengstenberg connects the whole verse and reads, Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion, and the Lord returned to the imprisonment of his people! Then let Jacob rejoice and Israel be glad; Alexander: Who will give out of Zion salvation to Israel, in Jehovah's returning the captivity of his people? Let Jacob exult, let Israel joy. The chief difficulty arises from the phrase, bringing back the captivity. Whoever will examine all the places where it (or in the original the same phrase turn again the captivity) occurs, will at once see that it has no reference to literal imprisonment, or bondage. Job was never sent to prison, nor was he ever sold into captivity. To turn or bring back captivity is to set free from any great evil or distress. And so when God gives his people deliverance there is joy, and the greater the deliverance, the greater the joy. Jacob [infirmity] shall rejoice. Israel [a prevailing prince] shall be glad. These names are given to the whole church. When she is weak she is strong. There seems to be no good reason for supposing as Calmet and Patrick, that Jacob means Judah, and Israel the ten tribes. Ainsworth: "Jacob is a name that noteth infirmity; for he strove for the birth-right, but obtained it not, when he took his brother by the heel in the womb, and thereupon was called Jacob. But Israel is a name of power and principality; for after he had wrestled with the angel, behaved himself princely, wept, prayed, and prevailed, his name was changed from Jacob to Israel, as a prince or prevailer with God." Alexander: "Let Jacob exult, let Israel joy. . . This is both an exhortation and a wish, but the latter is the prominent idea, as the parallelism of the clauses show."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The leading truths of natural religion are so clear that it is folly to deny them, v. 1. Rom. i. 19, 20.

2. The boast of philosophy and wisdom, so often made by sinners, is all vain, v. 1. Fabritius: "Impiety has its birth in folly, that is, in ignorance of God;" Dickson: "Every man, so long as he lieth unrenewed and unreconciled unto God, is in effect nothing but a madman, running to his own destruction in losing his soul and eternal life, even when he seems most to gain the world;" Calvin: "There is no stupidity more brutish than forgetfulness of God."

3. No utterances are decisive of character but the utterances of the heart, v. 1. Words are cheap; but what a man says in his heart shows whether he is a wise man or a fool, a saint or a sinner. The seat of all goodness and of all wickedness in man is his heart.

4. While wicked words disprove all claims to piety, right words cannot establish a character for godliness, if in actions we deny God, v. 1. The life must be holy as well as the profession.

5. As all error has its rise in the practical atheism of the heart, so all error naturally leads to open and avowed atheism in belief, v. 1. To one who is fairly started in a career of false doctrine, there is no guaranty that he will stop short of the disbelief of the divine existence. Horne: "Infidelity is the beginning of sin, folly the foundation of infidelity, and the heart the seat of both."

6. It is no novelty to see men avowing the most horrible opinions and indulging the vilest practices, even mocking at sacred things. Calvin: "David does not here bring against his enemies the charge of common foolishness, but rather inveighs against the folly and insane hardihood of those whom the world accounts eminent for their wisdom. We commonly see that those, who, in the estimation both of themselves and of others, highly excel in sagacity and wisdom, employ their cunning in laying snares, and exercise their ingenuity in despising and mocking God."

7. The doctrine of the universal depravity of man is and always has been true, since the fall of Adam. It is asserted in all the Scriptures, vv. 1, 2, 3, 4. See many parallel passages, also Jer. v. 1; Matt. xv. 19; Rom. i., ii., iii. Luther: "See how many redundant words he uses, that he may comprehend all men in the charge, and except none. First, he says all, afterwards once and again, that there is not so much as one; Calvin: "All of us, when we are born, bring with us from our mother's womb this folly and filthiness manifested in the whole life, which David here describes, and we continue such until God makes us new creatures by his mysterious grace."

8. It is a great advantage in learning human nature from the Bible that we there find the results of divine, omniscient and infallible scrutiny, v. 2. Dickson: "God is the only right judge of regeneration and unregeneration, and the only true searcher of the heart."

9. The reason, why hearts and motives are properly brought into view in deciding our real characters in God's esteem, is that God's kingdom is not only over us but within us. If the heart is wrong, all is wrong, vv. 2, 3.

10. The human understanding no less than the human heart needs renewal, v. 2. It is marvellous that any should have denied this. The Scriptures make it clear. Eph. i. 17, 18; iv. 18; Ps. cxix. 18; 1 Cor. ii. 14, 15. If men saw the real beauty and excellence of divine things they would seek them.

11. If the Scriptural designations of things should determine our views, then we cannot have too terrible conceptions of moral evil, vv. 1, 2, 3, 4. It is folly, corruption, abomination, lack of understanding, refusal to seek God, apostasy, going astray, filthiness, iniquity. Those who commit evil are sinners, rebels, unjust, wicked, enemies of God, fools, haters of God, accursed.

12. The agreement of the unrenewed in sinning against God is perfect, v. 3. They are all together become filthy. In stature, in complexion, in intellect, in disposition, and even in the outward acts of sin there is diversity; but in hardness of heart, which is the core of depravity, in unbelief and rebellion all sinners are agreed.

13. In the treatment of divine things the wicked show that they are destitute of every principle of sound knowledge, v. 4. The workers of iniquity have no knowledge of God or of themselves, of truth, duty, privilege, or obligation. Luther: "Will they then not once perceive that they are such people, as occasion sorrow to themselves? There is not one sound principle of conduct entering into the behaviour of the enemies of God and of his church." Calvin: "The effect of the habit of sinning is, that men grow hardened in their sins, and discern nothing, as if they were enveloped in thick darkness."

14. The greediness, with which sinners devour the saints is amazing, v. 4. They eat them as bread. They make nothing of injuring the church of God. Dickson: "The nature of all unrenewed men is to bear deadly enmity against those that are really God's people, and delight to undo the godly, as contemners of all that live not as they do."

15. A sufficient cause for the spirit of persecution in sinners against the godly is found in the prayerless lives they lead, v. 4. They so lightly esteem Jehovah as not to call upon him, and so they naturally hate those, whose example condemns their irreligion.

16. Wicked men may rage and blaspheme, may boast and be confident; but they will all prove themselves the veriest cowards at last, v. 5. Not one of them will have boldness in the day of judgment. They cannot fortify even here against fears the most idle, yet the most terrible. Lev. xxvi. 17, 36; Pr. xxviii. 1; 1 Thess. v. 3. Often are they a terror to themselves and their friends. Jer. xx. 4. Dickson: "The near conjunction which God hath with the godly is the reason of the greatness of the sin of persecuting them for godliness; for here it is given as a reason why there they were in fear." Morison: "When least anticipating any sorrowful reverse, and when least prepared to meet it, the wicked are often thrown into a state of consternation as alarming as it is unexpected. Either the dispensation itself is very awful, or their minds, being full of guilty recollections, are an easy prey to the first onset of alarming events. The courage of which ungodly men not unfrequently boast, in general forsakes them in the hour of sudden overwhelming calamity. With a heart all corroded with care, and all distracted with bitter anguish and remorse, they are but ill prepared for a transition from sensual ease and pleasure, to a prospect all gloomy and terrific."

17. Men may now laugh at the divine protection of the saints; but when all God's mercies to his people shall appear, the wicked themselves will pronounce them blessed, v. 6.

18. No such refuge is found as God himself, v. 6.

19. What remarkable words are found in all the Scriptures respecting God's people. This Psalm is the third, in which we find the word salvation, v. 7. Ps. iii. 8; ix. 14. There is no sweeter word than this! It is a word of constant recurrence in the worship of the temple not made with hands.

20. Our dependence on God is complete and absolute. We are always in captivity until he sets us free, v. 7.

21. God's saving interpositions occasion unfeigned joy in the true church of all names and ages, v. 7.

22. The minds of the prophets are full of the great theme of salvation, and often turn to it with apparent abruptness, v. 7. That the salvation spoken of in the last verse is that of which Christ is the author has been held by many. Diodati applies it to David, but especially to the great Saviour of the world, of whom David was only a type, to gain everlasting salvation for his church. Hengstenberg: "The wish here expressed found its highest fulfilment in Christ, and this is also to reach its highest stage of development in the future, when the triumphant church shall take the place of the militant. Till then we shall have occasion enough to make the wish of the pious Psalmist our own." This application to Christ seems to be supported by such passages as Luke i. 68-74; iv. 18. Gill: "The Jews refer this to the times of the Messiah." He is clear and decided in doing so himself. Morison: "To whatever extent this prayer might apply to existing outward calamities, it seems, beyond all reasonable doubt, to have had an ultimate reference to the coming of Messiah, and to the mighty achievements of his spiritual reign." Cobbin: "Oh that Christ the Saviour of Israel were come out of Zion." Horne not only applies this verse to the salvation from the captivity under sin and death, but like Hengstenberg regards its most glorious fulfilment as yet future: "How doth the whole church, at this time, languish for the consummation of her felicity, looking, even until her eyes fail, for that glorious day of final redemption, when every believing heart shall exult, and all the sons of God shall shout aloud for joy." Henry, Scott and Clarke also refer the last verse to the coming of Christ.

23. Venema: "This whole Psalm may very well be applied to all times, when the church is afflicted and her hope derided by the ungodly, and is most admirably adapted to confirm the hope of the pious, and to prevent despairing thoughts."

PSALM XV.

A Psalm of David.

1 LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill?

2 He that walketh uprightly, and worketh righteousness, and speaketh the truth in his heart.

3 He that backbiteth not with his tongue, nor doeth evil to his neighbour, nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour.4 In whose eyes a vile person is contemned; but he honoureth them that fear the LORD. He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.5 He that putteth not out his money to usury, nor taketh reward against the innocent. He that doeth these things shall never be moved.

THE title is the same with the first part of the title of Psalm iii. remarks on which see. No name of God but Jehovah LORD is found in this Psalm. See above on Psalm i. 2.

It seems very fitting that this Psalm should immediately follow the fourteenth. That delineates the character of the sinner; this shows us the character of the saint; that, of the bad man; this, of the good. From the resemblance of this Psalm to the twenty-fourth some have supposed that it was written on the occasion of the removal of the ark to Mount Zion. This may be so, but the evidence is not conclusive. It is certain however that David is the author of it, for the title ascribes it to him. Some think that the use of the word tabernacle as applied to the resting place of the ark shows that it could not have been written later than the reign of David, or the beginning of that of Solomon. After that period it is alleged that the word tabernacle is used, if at all, not more than once in application to the abode of the ark of God, and then figuratively, or as a designation of the holy city. Lam. ii. 4. After that time the temple is spoken of, or some term employed that avoids the word tabernacle. Nor could it have been written earlier than the time of David, for he removed the ark to Mount Zion.

Tholuck thinks this Psalm is quoted in Isa. xxxiii. 14-16. If so, it can have no historic reference to the Babylonish captivity.

1. LORD, who shall abide in thy tabernacle? who shall dwell in thy holy hill? Calvin: O Jehovah, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle? Who shall rest in the mountain of thy holiness? In this he very nearly agrees with the Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, Ethiopic and church of England. Edwards: Jehovah, who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle? Who shall lodge upon thy holy mountain? Jebb: LORD, who shall sojourn in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell in the hill of thy holiness? Fry: Jehovah! who shall abide in thy tabernacle? Who shall dwell on thy holy hill? Other translations generally agree with some of the foregoing. There has been much said to show that one of the verbs in this verse has more respect to permanency of abode than the other. If this were so, it would not support the theories that have been based upon this interpretation. Each clause of the verse evidently has the same general import, and so the parallelism is here preserved. But there is a discrepancy among critics, as to which is the stronger word. Fry thinks the first verb refers to perpetual residence, and for proof refers to Ps. lxi. 4. Clarke and Jebb maintain (the former at some length) that the first verb implies a brief abode, and that the latter work regards a long continued residence. That the latter verb has necessarily no reference to permanent abode is evident from Gen. xxii. 5; Ex. xxiv. 14; Nu. xxii. 19. Mount Zion was a type of the Gospel Church, and Jerusalem was a type of the heavenly abode of the redeemed. And so the questions of this verse inquire, Who shall be an acceptable worshipper of God on earth, and so be prepared to worship God in the temple not made with hands? Diodati: "Who shall be a true member of thy church, never to be cast out of it? and who shall enter into thine everlasting tabernacles of glory?" The tabernacle in David's time on Mount Zion was a new one prepared by that royal prophet, and not that which had been used in the wilderness which remained at Gibeon. The holy hill, or mountain of holiness, is Mount Zion in Jerusalem. See above on Ps. iii. 4. The Chaldee reads: The mount of the house of thy holiness; Tholuck: "The fundamental thought of Psalm xv. is this: He only who shows his piety not only in God's public worship, but in his life, is worthy of the prerogative of dwelling in the house of God. As it is the object of this Psalm to show the indissoluble connection between the adoration of God in the temple and its evidences in life, it cannot seem strange that it insists upon our duties towards man." Who then is accepted of God in his worship on earth, and so has the essentials of a character fitting him for heaven? This question is of the greatest weight and the most solemn moment. It is answered in vv. 2, 4 positively, and in vv. 3, 5 negatively.

2. This verse has in it three clauses responding to v. 1. Perhaps each of them, and certainly the first, relates to the habit of the life. It is, He that walketh uprightly. Chaldee: He that walketh in perfection; Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syriac, Ethiopic and Doway: He that walketh without blemish [or spot.] The Septuagint in translating the word rendered uprightly uses the word, which in Eph. i. 4 is rendered without blame; in Eph. v. 27, without blemish; in Heb. ix. 14, without spot; in Rev. xiv. 15, without fault; in Jude 24, faultless; and in Col. i. 22, unblamable. Calvin and Venema: He who walketh in integrity; Edwards: He who walketh with integrity; church of England: Even he that leadeth an uncorrupt life; Fry: He that walketh in sincerity; Hengstenberg: He who walks blamelessly; Alexander: Walking perfect. The accepted worshipper is as the Scriptures use these terms perfect, blameless, sincere, uncorrupt, a man of integrity, faultless, unblamable, upright, etc. The word rendered uprightly is in the Old Testament applied to lambs to be offered in sacrifice, which were to be without blemish. In Ps. cxix. 1 it is rendered undefiled. A servant of God must keep himself unspotted from the world. The good man's heart is the best part about him. He loves holiness. He hates sin. Indwelling sin and out-breaking sin greatly annoy and distress him. He hates vain thoughts. He loves God's law. If he could have his wish he never would sin again. He abhors iniquity. He despises the crooked ways of carnal men. He is honest with God, with men, with himself. Deceit is no part of a gracious character. The second clause of the description is, and worketh righteousness. All the ancient versions render this clause the same way. The Doway Bible here as commonly elsewhere uses justice for righteousness. Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Fry: Doeth righteousness; Alexander: Doing right. In the English Bible the word is commonly rendered righteousness, a few times justice, right. No child of God is a worker of iniquity. It is his habit to do justly. And speaketh the truth in his heart. There is a remarkable agreement in ancient versions with our English Bible in rendering this clause; though Venema, Edwards, Fry and the church of England read from the heart. Calvin well says: "To speak in the heart is a strong figurative expression, but it expresses more forcibly David's meaning than if he had said from the heart. It denotes such agreement and harmony between the heart and tongue as that the speech is, as it were, a vivid representation of the hidden affection or feeling within." The first clause of this verse requires rectitude or sincerity in the largest sense; the second, honesty and justice; the third, truth, or a correspondence between the signs of language or gesture, and one's real thoughts. Alexander thinks the last phrase, in his heart, qualifies both working righteousness and speaking truth.

3. The next verse describes this same man negatively. He that backbiteth not with his tongue. Chaldee: Does not practise detraction with his tongue; Septuagint and most of the versions which follow it: Who hath not used deceit in his tongue; Syriac: Neither is he crafty in his tongue; Arabic: And he does not deceive any one with his tongue; Calvin: He that slandereth not with his tongue; Edwards: That detracteth not with his tongue; Jebb: He backbiteth not with his tongue; Fry: Who hath no slander on his tongue; Hengstenberg: He slanders not with his tongue; Alexander: (Who) hath not slandered with his tongue. The word backbiting is found but twice in our translation of the Old Testament, viz.: here and in Pr. xxv. 23. But in the latter case the word is not the same as here, but a word meaning covert or secret, or hiding. The word here rendered backbiteth is but once so translated, and once, slandered, 2 Sam. xix. 27. It is commonly in our version rendered by the verb spy, and the participle by the noun spies. The verb means literally to go, to walk. And as slanderers are restless bodies and go about, spying out other peoples' affairs and spreading injurious or false reports, the word came to designate the act of backbiting. Hengstenberg thinks there is an allusion to Lev. xix. 16. He is probably correct.

The next thing said of this good man is, Nor doeth evil to his neighbour. Chaldee: Nor brings evil on his neighbour; Septuagint, Vulgate, and Ethiopic: Nor has done evil to his neighbour; Arabic, Syriac and Venema: Nor doth he evil to his neighbour; Calvin: Nor doeth evil to his companion; Edwards: Doth no evil to his friend; Jebb: He doeth not to his neighbour evil; Fry: Who hath done no evil to his friend; Hengstenberg: He does not evil to his friend; Alexander: (Who) hath not done his neighbour harm. The word rendered evil is elsewhere commonly so translated in our English Bible, and frequently wickedness, bad, [as opposite of good,] hurt, harm, ill, sorrow, mischief, wrong, displeasure, affliction, adversity, trouble, calamity. The word rendered neighbour is commonly so found in our version, also sometimes friend, fellow, companion. See above on Ps. xii. 2. Neighbour is the best rendering if we follow Christ's explanation of that word, Luke x. 29-37. A good man will not of choice do anything to harm, wrong, or needlessly displease, trouble, or afflict any human being. Calvin well explains the word companion and neighbour found in his rendering of this verse, as designating "all men, to whom we are bound by the ties of humanity and a common nature." One, who thus far does well, will be safe in other respects, and so it is added, Nor taketh up a reproach against his neighbour. The word rendered take up is elsewhere translated bear, spare, accept, stir up, suffer, respect, exalt, contain, raise, regard, bring, help, and often lift up. Reproach, always so rendered in the Psalter but once, where it is rebuke. In Dan. xii. 2 it is shame. It is found in Ps. xxii. 6; xxxi. 11; xxxix. 8. A good man is not willingly even the repository of evil rumors against any of his kind. The word here well rendered neighbour is not the same as in the preceding clause. It is often applied to those who are near of kin. Neighbour is a good translation. It points out any one, with whom we have the intercourse of life. Though the words here are so few and clear, yet this clause has occasioned considerable difficulty and is quite diversely rendered. Gill explains it that this good man "does not himself raise any scandalous report on his neighbour, nor will he bear to hear one from another, much less will he spread one; nor will he suffer one to lie upon his neighbour, but will do all he can to vindicate him, and clear his character." This is very good, if our translation is to be preferred. But other renderings are suggested. Chaldee: Does not sustain or support a reproach, etc.; Calvin: Nor raiseth up a calumnious report, etc.; Alexander: And a scandal hath not taken up against his neighbour. Hengstenberg thinks the best rendering is, Who does not take up, or raise a reproach against his neighbour. Edwards, following Mudge, thinks this rendering the best: Nor throweth a disgrace upon his neighbour, viz.: by dishonoring his wife or daughter. He says, "I understand it so for two reasons, one that the common translation comes too near the meaning of the first clause of this verse; the other that otherwise something very essential to a good man, and which is usually made part of his character (see Ezek. xviii.) would be omitted." The great objection to this view is that we have no right to make such a specification without some authority. It is purely conjectural. Some think the verb in this clause may signify to originate or invent, to make up slanderous stories without cause. But Calvin well says that "here is also rebuked the vice of undue credulity, which, when any evil reports are spread against our neighbours, leads us either eagerly to listen to them, or at least to receive them without sufficient reason; whereas we ought rather to use all means to suppress and trample them under foot. When any one is the bearer of invented falsehoods, those who reject them leave them, as it were, to fall to the ground; while, on the contrary, those who propagate and publish them from one person to another are, by an expressive form of speech, said to raise them up."

4. This verse resumes the positive account of a gracious character, and in three clauses continues the delineation. In whose eyes a vile person is contemned. There is quite a variation in rendering this passage. Chaldee: Who is despised and worthless in his own eyes; church of England: He that sitteth not by himself but is lowly in his own eyes; Jebb: He is contemned in his own eyes, he is abased. Such a rendering destroys the antithesis between this and the next clause. Yet the sense is good. The righteous often abhors himself and blushes and is ashamed to look up on account of his vileness. Septuagint: In his eyes a malignant person is set at naught, as the same Greek verb is rendered in Mark ix. 12. Several translations follow this. The Syriac is peculiar: In his eyes a provoking man is despised. But the Hebrew word is never rendered in our version in the sense of one, who excites another to anger. Calvin: In his eyes the offcast [reprobate, wicked, vile, abominable] is despised; Edwards: That despise a worthless person; Fry: The reprobate is despised in his eyes. The word we render a vile person may, according to Bythner and others, be rendered rejected, despised, reprobate. Our version of Jer. vi. 30, uses reprobate; and our translation of several other places would justify us in using cast-away. The word designates one who is justly cast off, rejected, abhorred. Hengstenberg: In his eyes the rejected is despised; Alexander: Despised in his eyes (is) a reprobate. Morison supposes the vile person here spoken of to be "an ungodly, profane, contemptible individual, whose very intercourses carry pollution and death along with them. Such a man the expectant of glory rejects; he will have no unnecessary fellowship with him; for his good and the good of others, he stands at a distance from him; and never ventures to come near to him, save with the hope of benefitting his perishing soul." Wealth, rank, wit, learning, power and beauty can never hinder a good man from despising such a castaway. Memorable instances of good men despising reprobates we have in Mordecai's behaviour towards Haman, Elisha's, towards Ahab, and Daniel's, towards Belshazzar, Esth. iii. 2; 2 Kings iii. 14; Dan. v. 17, and onward. The same is illustrated in Bunyan's treatment of Charles II. It is proper to say that the feeling of the righteous towards the wicked is not that proud, haughty, malignant contempt, which marks the behaviour of the wicked towards the children of God. It is just, true, benevolent. It is the abhorrence of his character, not of his person.

Such a man will have other good traits of character; therefore it is said, But he honoureth them that fear the LORD. The word here rendered honoureth is in many places in our version rendered glorify, Ps. l. 15, 23; lxxxvi. 9, 12. Glorify is used in many of the ancient and in the Doway versions. But the word glorify in English commonly denotes the honor the righteous give to God, or the honor God gives to his people. The highest kind of honor demanded by the nature of the case is here intended, Ex. xiv. 4, 17; Nu. xxii. 17; 1 Sam. ii. 30. The church of England has it, And maketh much of them that fear the LORD. Habitually to do this requires a higher character than belongs to man by nature. Calvin: "As those who fear God are often, as it were, the filth and the offscouring of all things in the estimation of the world, so it frequently happens that those who show them favor and sympathy, excite against themselves everywhere the hatred of the world. The greater part of mankind, therefore, refuse the friendship of good men, and leave them to be despised, which cannot be done without grievous and heinous injury to God." The house of God ignores the factitious distinctions set up by human society and exalts the distinctions owned by God, James ii. 1-7. He who goes thus far, will do whatever else is required by integrity. Therefore it is added, He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not. Hammond: "LXX., instead of to hurt, seem to have read to his fellow, and so the Syriac, Latin, Arabic and Ethiopic." The Hebrew words for hurt and fellow are very much alike. It also gives a good sense to read, He sweareth to his neighbours, and changeth not, or as the Syriac has it, lies not, deceives not. But Anderson well observes that our English version, which gives the ordinary reading, "sets forth the moral integrity of the good man in a still more striking light, by describing him as performing his oath in the face of the greatest temptations to break it, when the performance of it may prove detrimental to his own interests; and this is no mean trial of a man's virtue." Alexander justly thinks there is a reference to Lev. v. 4; "if a soul swear to do evil or to do good," i. e., whether to his own advantage or the contrary, or as Hengstenberg has it "for hurt, or for benefit." That is, the oath is binding, however we may regard it as affecting our interests. Hengstenberg: "When he happens to have made a promise or oath, which tends to his hurt, he still most religiously fulfils it." Luther: "I believe that what the prophet here says of keeping an oath is to be understood also of every sort of promise. For its object is to inculcate truth and fidelity among men. But it makes special mention of the oath, because, in a pre-eminent way, good faith is thereby kept or broken."

5. The last verse completes the description of the character of the righteous by giving two additional points in a negative form. First, He that putteth not out his money to usury. The word rendered money is everywhere else in the Psalms, and most commonly in the other scriptures, rendered silver. It occurs very often. There is hardly a point of morals, concerning which the people of the Nineteenth Century have more need of instruction, than that contained in this clause. Many trading men are evidently living in ignorance or error respecting usury. The original word here rendered usury is derived from a verb that is commonly translated to bite, as a serpent, Gen. xlix. 17; Num. xxi. 6, 8, 9; Pr. xxiii. 32; Ecc. x. 8; Jer. viii. 17; Am. v. 19; ix. 3; Mic. iii. 5; Hab. ii. 7. Morison well says, this is "a striking emblem of a greedy, griping usurer, who grinds the faces of the poor and distressed." By a figurative use of the word it expresses in Deut. xxiii. 19, 20 the act of lending upon usury. Whoever wishes to see all the passages where the word here rendered usury is found in the Hebrew Scriptures, may examine Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36, 37; Deut. xxiii. 19; Pr. xxviii. 8; Ezek. xviii. 8, 13, 17; xxii. 12. The word has one uniform rendering throughout our English version. In the Doway Bible it is also invariably rendered usury. A verb of the same root is twice found in Jer. xv. 10, and is rendered lent on usury. In Ex. xxii. 25 it is translated as an usurer. In Isa. xxiv. 2 it is rendered as with the taker of usury. But as lenders and creditors in corrupt states of the Jewish nation often became usurers, so the form of the verb under consideration came to signify to lend, Deut. xv. 2; xxiv. 10, 11, then a creditor, 2 Kings iv. 1; Isa. l. 1; then to exact, Neh. v. 7, 10, 11. And as usury is often accompanied with extortion, our translators render the verb in Ps. cix. 11 the extortioner, though another word for extortioner is employed by Isa. xvi. 4. The word extortion found in Ezek. xxii. 12 is also of a different derivation. The foregoing passages are all that are found in the Hebrew Scriptures bearing on the subject. Perhaps as to the origin, force and uniform usage of words, there never was a clearer case of exposition than that of this clause prohibiting usury. And none of these views are repealed or modified in the New Testament.

The word usurer is not found in the New Testament, and the word usury but twice, Matt. xxv. 27; Luke xix. 23. The allusion in these cases shows that usury was still in the estimation of the people a practice peculiar to "hard men."

One who has the preceding principles of morality will be proof against bribery, and so it is added, Nor taketh reward against the innocent. Our version often renders the word as here innocent, also guiltless, clear, blameless. Reward is also rendered gift, bribe, present. A good man, called to sit in judgment in any matter, because he knows his own weakness, is not willing to receive a gift, knowing its power to lead one astray. "The king by judgment establisheth the land: but he that receiveth gifts overthroweth it," Pr. xxix. 4. Of all social evils not one is worse than the perversion of law, justice and equity. The corruptions attending such a state of things are countless and frightful. The spirit of extorting money from even poor prisoners, and from weak and injured parties, has polluted the fountains of justice in all ages, Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. xvi. 19; xxvii. 25; Acts xxiv. 26. When law is administered by favor, the poor are sold for a pair of shoes. But when the balance of justice is held by an impartial hand, the humblest has his rights secured. Such a man as is described in this Psalm shall be blessed. He that doeth these things shall never be moved. In his holy, innocent life, he has the evidence that he is a child of God. He shall never in God's esteem be separated from the congregation of accepted worshippers. Sometimes the word rendered moved is translated fallen in decay, shaken, slip, slide, removed, etc. A man of the foregoing character shall never so fall into decay, as not to flourish in eternal youth, never be so shaken as to lose his steadfastness, never so slip as not to recover himself, never so slide as to rise no more, never be removed from the Mount Zion above. Instead of never, we might read not forever. Eternity itself shall see no ruin, no overthrow, come on this man. Slade: "He shall hold on his way towards heaven, unmoved by temptation, and arrive there in safety. . . He shall not be moved, to eternity."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Because God is God, therefore he alone can determine what will and what will not please him in his worshippers. His decision is infallible, and so we should resort to him, v. 1.

2. We cannot too often or too solemnly inquire, What is a true profession of the true religion? v. 1. There is no more important question.

3. He is not fit for the church on earth, who is not fit for the church in glory. He who is accepted of God here, is accepted there, v. 1. Tholuck: "Only those shall share in the communion of the kingdom of glory, who were no strangers to it on earth."

4. The tenor of one's life is his walk, and must determine his character, v. 2. A river may run in various directions, but its course is in the main to its mouth, else it would not empty itself.

5. Religion without morality is monstrous. It has no countenance in Scripture, vv. 2-5. Justification is by faith sole, but not solitary. True faith purifies the heart, works by love, and overcomes the world. Cobbin: "No man can be a true member of the church of God who is a stranger to moral righteousness."

6. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord, v. 2. Sincerity, uprightness, integrity are essentials of a gracious character. Dickson: "The sincere endeavor of universal obedience in a man's conversation is a fruit and evidence of true faith, and a mark of a true member of the church invisible;" Luther: "Not on this account, because thou art a holy monk; not on this account, because thou prayest much, because thou dost miracles, because thou teachest admirably, because thou art dignified with the title of Father, nor, finally, because of any particular work, except righteousness, shalt thou dwell upon the holy hill of God;" Henry: "I know no religion but sincerity," John i. 47; 2 Cor. i. 12; Calvin: "No doubt, God adopted Abraham freely, but, at the same time, he stipulated with him that he should live a holy and upright life, and this is the general rule of the covenant which God has, from the beginning, made with his church. . . If we really wish to be reckoned among the number of the children of God, the Holy Ghost teaches us, that we must show ourselves to be such by a holy and an upright life."

7. The great pillar of the morality which God teaches is justice, v. 2. Without this charity is a fraud, a monstrous lie. Morison: "A professing servant of God, without common honesty, is surely a fearful anomaly."

8. Another of the great pillars of a sound morality is truth, v. 2. Nothing more marks an heir of perdition, a child of the devil, than lying. John viii. 44. Morison: "In the intercourse of society, truth is an essential quality to the peace, honor, and ornament of life. Nothing can proceed comfortably without it, in the church or in the world. It is a kind of element which must pervade all things. True piety, therefore, must include it, as a constituent part of the renewed heart. In the heart it must have its seat, or in the life and conversation it will never be exhibited." The doom of liars is most fearful, Rev. xxi. 8, 27; xxii. 15.

9. If the aggravation of sin may be determined by the shame and misery it causes here, few sins will be more terribly punished in eternity than that of evil-speaking, call it backbiting, slander, detraction, or by any other name. The good man hates it cordially, v. 3. Saurin: "Slander is a vice that strikes a double blow, wounding him that commits it, and him against whom it is committed." Sir Walter Raleigh: "If the divines do rightly infer from the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill—scandalizing one's neighbor with false and malicious reports, whereby I vex his spirit, and consequently impair his health, is a degree of murder." Tillotson: "A good word is an easy obligation; but not to speak ill requires only our silence, which costs us nothing." Beveridge: "I am resolved by the grace of God, to speak of other men's sins only before their faces, and of their virtues only behind their backs." Henry: "The citizen of Zion knows the worth of a good name, and therefore he backbites not, defames no man, speaks evil of no man, makes not others' faults the subject of his common talk, much less of his sport and ridicule, nor speaks of them with pleasure, nor at all but for edification; he makes the best of everybody and the worst of nobody." Dickson: "A fruit of faith is conscience-making of what a man speaketh." Calvin: "David sets down calumny and detraction as the first point of injustice by which our neighbors are injured. If a good name is a treasure, more precious than all the riches of the world, (Prov. xxii. 1,) no greater injury can be inflicted upon men than to wound their reputation. . . It cannot be doubted that the design of the Holy Spirit is to condemn all false and wicked accusations." A heathen once said, "A slanderer is the most terrible of wild beasts."

10. The law of love to our neighbor has always been binding, v. 3. Men always were bound to love others as themselves.

11. Tale-hearing is one of the worst vices. No good man will allow it, v. 3. The Rev. Charles Simeon of blessed memory said, "The longer I live, the more I feel the importance of adhering to the following rules, which I have laid down for myself in relation to such matters:

1st. To hear as little as possible what is to the prejudice of others.

2d. To believe nothing of the kind until I am absolutely forced to it.

3d. Never to drink into the spirit of one who circulates an ill report.

4th. Always to moderate, as far as I can, the unkindness which is expressed towards others.

5th. Always to believe that if the other side were heard, a very different account would be given of the matter." William Penn said: "Believe nothing against another, but on good authority; nor report what may hurt another, unless it be a greater hurt to another to conceal it."

What a wonderful example in this point we have in our blessed Saviour. It seems to have been universally understood that he abhorred all backbiting. "The north wind driveth away rain: so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue." Pr. xxv. 23. Morison: "That man must have a black heart, if it were dissected, who would not exert himself to stay the desolating progress of an evil report. If he knew himself, or felt the glow of genuine benevolence, he would shrink with horror from the crime of standing sentinel upon his brother, ready to seize on him and drag him to punishment, on the discovery of the slightest offence." The author would here record his serious belief that a full half of all the misery he has witnessed, in the course of a life neither short, nor unattended with fair opportunities of observation, was caused by a sinful abuse of the power of speech, and that more than half the misery thus caused would have been avoided, if all in the community who had no part in originating them had at once done their duty, and frowned on evil reports. James iii. 2-10.

12. As a good man does not and cannot feel alike towards saints and sinners, so his conduct towards men must vary according to his conception of their character, v. 4. Dickson: "A fruit of faith is the low estimation of any worldly excellency where-with a wicked man can be busked, . . . but where he seeth one that feareth God, he esteemeth highly of him in his heart." Morison: "Genuine piety will ever struggle to breathe its own healthful element. It will draw heart to heart. It will seek its own appropriate companionship. Wherever it sees the image of God, it will honor that image. However lowly may be the outward garb, it will be sufficient to proclaim in its hearing—'This is a child of God.'" When indeed we find wicked men in power, we must honor them in their office, submit cheerfully to all their lawful requirements, and pray for them; but we cannot be expected to love or revere those persons, who are odious and vile. Calvin: "Paul teaches us, (Eph. v. 11,) that it is a species of fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness when we do not reprove them." Isa. v. 20.

13. The law respecting promises and oaths is that the inconvenience of fulfilling them does not in the least dissolve their obligation, v. 4. If we have rashly bound ourselves to any lawful act, our solemn and faithful performance of our engagements may not only cure our hastiness of spirit, but it will evince our strength of principle. Calvin: "The faithful will rather submit to suffer loss than break their word. When a man keeps his promises, in so far as he sees it to be for his own advantage, there is in this no argument to prove his uprightness and faithfulness." Every lawful promise, covenant and oath must be kept, unless we are released not by constraint, but willingly by the party, to whom we are bound. Unlawful engagements of every kind are to be repented of and broken. But let men beware lest they pronounce that unlawful, which is merely contrary to their wishes or self-interest.

14. This Psalm casts light upon the practice of usury, which is so prevalent in this nineteenth century, v. 5. Where the usury given or received is greater than the law of the land allows, the sin is against all those divine precepts, which require obedience to every ordinance of man, that is not wicked, Rom. xiii. 1-5; 1 Pet. ii. 13. Every good man is a good citizen, and keeps the laws. When the receiving of usury damages the poor and needy, it is manifestly condemned, though the amount may be no greater than the laws of the land allow. Nor is there anywhere in Scripture a hint to the contrary of these principles, even though money be borrowed or lent for the purposes of commerce. Indeed the violation of these principles is sufficient to bring about those alternate expansions and contractions, which for a long time have been afflicting the commercial world. It is true that a return to sound practice on this subject will not be compassed by one man. But the truth is mighty. And the truth on this subject is as potent as on any other matter. On such a subject let others speak. Calvin, speaking of the first clause of the fifth verse, says: "With respect to this clause, as David seems to condemn all kinds of usury in general, and without exception, the very name has been everywhere held in detestation. But crafty men have invented specious names under which to conceal the vice; and thinking by this artifice to escape, they have plundered with greater excess than if they openly and avowedly lent on usury. God, however, will not be dealt with and imposed upon by sophistry and false pretences. He looks upon the thing as it really is. There is no worse species of usury than an unjust way of making bargains, where equity is disregarded on both sides. Let us then remember that all bargains in which the one party unrighteously strives to make gain by the loss of the other party, whatever name may be given to them, are here condemned. . . I would, above all things, counsel my readers to beware of ingeniously contriving deceitful pretexts, by which to take advantage of their fellow-men, and let them not imagine that anything can be lawful to them which is grievous and hurtful to others.

"With respect to usury, it is scarcely possible to find in the world a usurer who is not at the same time an extortioner, and addicted to unlawful and dishonorable gain. Accordingly Cato of old justly placed the practice of usury and the killing of men in the same rank of criminality, for the object of this class of people is to suck the blood of other men. It is also a very strange and shameful thing, that, while all other men obtain the means of their subsistence with much toil . . . money mongers should sit at their ease, and receive tribute from the labor of all other people."

Morison: "'He that putteth not out his money to usury.' By the spirit of a subtle philosophy, the entire force of this precept, or rather declaration, may be done away with. It may be urged that money, like every other commodity, is a species of property, and that a man has the right to make the best of it. In this mode of putting the argument there may be a speciousness to deceive weak minds, and quiet consciences which greatly need the application of such a balm; but can a man who really fears God, and is acting under the direction of his principles, suffer himself to take advantage of a distressed neighbor, because he happens to have more than he, at any given time, of this particular commodity of money? The law of God, whatever may be the avaricious feeling of the human heart, says, No; the principle of true benevolence says, No; the honor of the Christian profession says, No. And let philosophy, and infidelity, and covetousness have all the happiness, which can be the result of setting at naught considerations which, if uniformly acted upon, would turn this wilderness of sin and death into the paradise of God."

The foregoing views are so clear, so sound, so Scriptural, that they cannot be refuted.

15. The dreadful corruption sometimes manifested in courts is no novelty, v. 5; Ecce. v. 8. Yet the doom of corrupt judges and jurors, dying without repentance, will be dreadful, Isa. v. 23, 24.

16. While everything else is fickle, God's people are stable, v. 5. Gibraltar, the Himalayas and the Apalachian range shall melt like wax, but God's people shall not be moved, to eternity.

17. This whole Psalm shows us that hypocrisy is no novelty. It was always necessary to distinguish between the genuine and spurious convert. False professors can do wonders for awhile, but they cannot perseveringly keep the law of God. Luther: "This Psalm strikes against the lovers of outward show. For the Jews boasted themselves over all other people, on the two grounds that they alone were the seed of the Fathers, and alone possessed the law of God." Calvin: "If we really wish to be reckoned among the number of the children of God, the Holy Ghost teaches us that we must show ourselves to be such by a holy and upright life; for it is not enough to serve God by outward ceremonies, unless we also live uprightly and without doing wrong to our neighbors."

18. The grace of God is absolutely necessary to enable poor, fallen man to maintain, through all temptations, the morality required by the law of God, even as expounded in this short Psalm. Morison: "How unlike this picture to the shuffling, mean, and ungenerous conduct of many who only bear the Christian name to disgrace it! In so far as they are bound by human laws, you may calculate on their honor and integrity; but if you leave anything to the native impulse of their principles, alas! alas! you will be fatally deceived! They are a compound of selfishness, injustice, and worldly policy; and a more hideous compound cannot be contemplated."

19. This Psalm is specially clear as to the character of true and accepted worshippers. Calvin: "Access to God lies open to none but his pure worshippers." Morison: "It cannot be too strongly impressed upon the minds of men that principles merely professed, however excellent, which do not sanctify the heart and mould the character, cannot be acceptable with God."

20. In the delineation of the character of an approved citizen of Zion the second table of the law alone is referred to in this Psalm. The same is true in many other parts of Scripture. The reason is that if we love not our brother, whom we have seen, it is idle to pretend to love God whom we have not seen.

21. This Psalm and parallel passages furnish an excellent standard by which to examine ourselves.

PSALM XVI.

Michtam of David.

1 Preserve me, O God: for in thee do I put my trust.

2 O my soul, thou hast said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee;

3 But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight.

4 Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god: their drink offering of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips.

5 The LORD is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup: thou maintainest my lot.

6 The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.

7 I will bless the LORD, who hath given me counsel: my reins also instruct me in the night seasons.

8 I have set the LORD always before me: because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved.

9 Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope.

10 For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption.

11 Thou wilt shew me the path of life: in thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore.

THAT David is the author of this Psalm is declared by the title, by Peter on the day of Pentecost, Acts ii. 25, and by Paul, Acts xiii. 35-37.

The word Michtam found in the title is also in the titles of five other Psalms, lvi., lvii., lviii., lix., lx. Perhaps no word has occasioned greater diversity of opinion. Kimchi thinks it is the name of a musical instrument. Jarchi supposes it refers to the tune to be sung. Calvin inclines to this opinion. Some regard it as derived from a word which signifies to cut, to engrave, denoting, as Anderson says, "that the Psalm is fit to be engraven on a valuable and durable pillar." This is the view taken by Theodoret. Chaldee: A right engraving (or a straight sculpture, as some;) Septuagint: An inscription on a pillar; Vulgate: An inscription of a title to David himself. The Syriac is still different: Of David. The election of the church and the resurrection of Christ; the Arabic has the same with the addition, A writing concerning the covenant; Edwards following Mudge thinks it may designate a Psalm to be written in gold letters to teach. Many have thought that Michtam is derived from a word which signifies gold and that it is intended to designate this as a golden Psalm, that is a composition very precious, a writing exceedingly excellent. This view is favored by Boothroyd, Amesius, Luther, Gill, Dimock, Patrick, Diodati, Ainsworth, Morison, Cobbin, Henry, Scott, Clarke and many others. Greater weight of authority can be adduced for this than for any other opinion. But Houbigant renders Michtam by the Latin arcantum, a secret. Hengstenberg is of the same mind, A secret—a song with a deep import; Alexander takes the same view and thinks it "signifies a mystery or secret. . . It probably indicates the depth of doctrinal and spiritual import in these sacred compositions." Mant seems to favor the union of two of the foregoing views: "As a sepulchral inscription, it might have been written on our Redeemer's tomb; as a triumphal monument, it might have been sung by him in the region of departed spirits; and in either, or in any sense, it may well be considered as a golden composition, as apples of gold in a net-work of silver, invaluable in its subject, most pleasing in its structure." Those who favor the explanation drawn from gold quote many titles of eastern and ancient productions, as the golden verses of Pythagoras, etc. But there seems to be no good reason for giving any pre-eminence to the six Psalms having Michtam, so as to call them Golden above all others.

After this array of great names it may seem almost rash to prefer another opinion. It is that Michtam here is the same as Michtab, found in Isa. xxxviii. 9 and several other times in Scripture. The best scholars assert that the letters by which this variation would be produced, are often interchanged. If this is the true view, then Michtam here simply means A writing. This would militate against the view of Hengstenberg that David is fond of enigmatical designations in the titles, yet even Hengstenberg admits that very probably David just changed a letter and thus "transformed a word from a very common meaning into a similar one of deeper significance." Michtam of David is then probably A writing of David.

That this is a Messianic Psalm is shown by Peter, Acts ii. 25-36, and by Paul, Acts xiii. 35-37. Some have insisted that everything in this Psalm refers exclusively to Christ. That there is no need of so construing this excellent song is shown, perhaps sufficiently, in the Introduction, § 8. Even Cocceius says: "Many, as well ancients as moderns, suppose that Christ is the speaker in this Psalm. But I think David speaks in the whole Psalm. I suppose the mode of applying it to Christ and to David is best explained in Acts ii. 29, 30."

At what period in the life of David this Psalm was written we have no means of determining.

The names of the Almighty in this Psalm are El God, Jehovah LORD, and Adonai Lord, on which respectively see above on Ps. v. 4; i. 2; ii. 4.

1. Preserve me, O God: Chaldee, Septuagint and Calvin: Keep (or guard) me, O God. The same verb is rendered also by such words as observe, mark, take heed to, wait for, regard, save. Horsley: "The Hebrew word expresses the actions of those who watch over another's safety, as of guards attending their king, or a shepherd keeping his flock." The more full the sense, the better in this case. Alexander: "The prayer, preserve me, implies actual suffering or imminent danger." The word here rendered God is not Elohim, but El. The reason why he thus boldly asks to be guarded and saved is his confidence in God, which he now exercises, but which is no new thing with him. For in thee do I put my trust. In the Hebrew it is, In thee I have trusted, yet implying continued action. In the Chaldee it is, I have depended on thy word. This paraphrase often puts God's word for himself. This prayer was in substance suitable for David and for Christ, who in the days of his flesh offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death.

2. O my soul, thou hast said unto the LORD, Thou art my Lord. The words, O my soul, are not in the Hebrew. Our translators have followed the Chaldee and supplied them. This is better than with the Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Edwards and Fry, to read, I have said, although some MSS. so have it. Calvin, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Alexander, church of England and others give their weight in favor of our version. What the soul said was, Unto Jehovah. Reliance on him is well founded; and obedience to him is most reasonable. Whoso is wise, let him say to Jehovah, Thou art my Lord. The word is Adonai. The last clause of the verse is full of difficulty: My goodness extendeth not to thee. Chaldee: My good is given only by thee; Syriac: My goodness is of thee; Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, and Doway: Thou hast no need of my goods; Arabic: Thou hast no need of my good works; John Rogers' translation: My goodes are no thinge unto the; Bishops' Bible: My goodes are nothing unto thee; Genevan translation and Calvin: My well-doing extendeth not to thee; Edwards following Mudge: My good things are not suited to thee; Jebb: My goodness is nothing unto thee; Fry: The benefit of my services is not to thee; Venema: My goodness is nothing above thee; Hengstenberg: My salvation is not without thee; Alexander: My goodness (is) not besides thee (or beyond thee); Amesius: Thou wilt not lay up my goodness with thee; Horsley: Thou art my good,—not beside thee; Boothroyd: No good have I but from thee; Kennicott: My goodness is not without thee; Clarke: My bounty is not to thee; Houbigant and Lowth: I have no goodness without thee. None of these renderings teach any dangerous doctrine. The word, which we read goodness, is also rendered good, prosperity, wealth, welfare, good deeds, pleasure, kindness. Of all these senses that of kindness seems to be the best in 2 Sam. ii. 6; 2 Kings xxv. 28, kindly; in 2 Chron. vi. 41; Ps. xxi. 3; xxiii. 6, the word means kindness, though rendered goodness; see also Ps. lxxv. 11; lxxviii. 10. In Hos. xiv. 2 it is rendered graciously, i. e., in kindness. Whether these words relate to David in person or as a type of Christ, this gives a good sense—My kindness is not to thee, as its object. God is independent, sovereign, beyond want. We cannot profit the Almighty, Job xxii. 2, 3; xxxv. 7, 8;

Luke xvii. 10. Compassion towards God is impossible. To him we can manifest no grace. We can never give him but of his own, 1 Chron. xxix. 14. All we can pay him is his just due. He needs no help, no pity, no kindness. Even Christ did not become incarnate and die, to show kindness to God, but to exhibit to sinners the kindness of God and of his Son. If we take the word goodness in the sense of merit, the clause would be true of David as a man, but not of Christ, whose infinitely precious righteousness is before God, and is by him esteemed of great worth, meritorious beyond all bounds. Other explanations are offered, but that given seems to be preferable to all others.

3. But to the saints that are in the earth. That is, my goodness or kindness is to, upon, or towards the people of God on earth. This is true of David the type, and of Christ the anti-type. All good men love God's saints. Jesus loves them. He gave himself for them. Good men wish well to all, but especially to those who wear the image of God. Jesus Christ came not into the world to condemn the world, but he laid down his life for his sheep. His kindness and grace, as well as the brotherly love of his people, are pre-eminently to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent. For the signification of the word excellent, see Ps. viii. 1, 9. For solid worth, for upright dispositions, for exalted aims, all of which will stand the test of the last day, God's people are the choice ones of the race, the flower of the world, the élite of the universe. In whom is all my delight. Both Christ and his people have complacency in the righteous. Their kindness is towards them. Their delight is in them, 1 John iv. 7; Prov. viii. 27-31. The word rendered delight is also translated desire, pleasure, purpose. Their desire is in them. Their pleasure is in them. Their purpose of heart is toward them. It is fixed in that direction.

4. Their sorrows shall be multiplied that hasten after another god. This verse has led some to suppose this Psalm was written by David during his residence among the Philistines. But a devout and intelligent mind may know and be deeply affected with the miseries of the heathen without having ever resided among them, and of course after having seen them and removed from them. The sixth verse would greatly discourage the idea that David was now among any heathen people. All do not render these words in the same way. Chaldee: They multiply their idols, and then hasten that they may offer gifts; Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway: Their infirmities were multiplied: afterwards they made haste; Arabic: Their sorrows were multiplied, and then they made haste; Syriac: The worst sorrows were swiftly multiplied to them; Amesius: They multiply their sorrows, who endow another; Calvin: Their sorrows shall be multiplied who offer to a stranger that is, to a strange God—another than the true God; Edwards: Their pains will increase who bribe another God; Jebb and Fry agree with our English Bible; Hengstenberg: Many are the sorrows of those, who purchase of another [god;] Alexander: Many (or multiplied) shall be their sorrows—another they have purchased. Many understand god after another. Prof. Stuart, after another puts way, but the prophet had previously said nothing of a way, though he had of a God and a Lord, vv. 1, 2. The same remark applies to the supposition of Gill and Clarke that we may read another Messiah. The authorized version probably gives the true sense of the whole clause. Though idols are vanities and vexations, yet sorrows is the best word here. One reason why the early Christians, who had been converted from idolatry, prized the Christian religion so highly was that it saved them from so much temporal misery and was such a fountain of happiness even in this life. Some of them express themselves much as we should expect the damned to do, if they were now saved from hell. They had known by a horrible experience the truth of this clause. For hasten after, our translators authorize in the margin, give gifts to, but I do not find the word so rendered in the text of the common version except in Ex. xxii. 16; where we have endow, and no where else than here in the margin. Their drink-offerings of blood will I not offer, nor take up their names into my lips. This rendering gives the whole sense. Hengstenberg well remarks that the words their before drink-offerings and names are referred by many expositors to "the idolaters, and by some again to the idols. The admissibility of the latter exposition cannot be denied." Calvin holds this view; Hengstenberg also thinks there is a reference to Ex. xxiii. 13; as there is also in Hos. ii. 17. He adds: "The drink-offerings of blood are understood by various expositors literally; but in this reference to a particular heathenish custom, . . . the connection is not attended to . . . One must rather, with a comparison of Isa. lxiii. 3, explain thus the drink-offerings of blood: drink-offerings, which are as much objects of abhorrence as if they consisted, not of wine, which externally they were, but literally of blood. The expression of blood, was the more natural as wine is named the blood of grapes in Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14; Drink-offerings outwardly of the blood of grapes, inwardly of the blood of men." The real saints of whom David was one, much more Christ himself, abhorred idolatry in every shape and form. The gods of the heathen are no gods. They are vanities and lies. They that serve them are like unto them.

5. The LORD is the portion of mine inheritance and of my cup. The language of this verse and of the next is evidently borrowed from the partition of the land of Canaan, giving to each man his inheritance or heritage or portion by lot, and bounding it by lines. In that division the whole land was distributed by lot, i. e., by casting lot, but no share was given to the priests and Levites. Jehovah was their portion, the lot of their inheritance. So, here David says his portion was in God. The same is elsewhere asserted by David, Ps. cxix. 57; and by Asaph, Ps. lxxiii. 26. There is a remarkable agreement in the ancient versions in rendering this clause. Horsley's reading varies from the common: Jehovah, my measured portion, and my cup, art thou; Alexander gives it very succinctly: Jehovah (is) my allotted portion, and my cup. And as these words were true of David, so are they of David's greater Son. His portion both of suffering and reward was given him by Jehovah, Matt. xxvi. 39, 42; Isa. xlix. 5-12; Heb. xii. 1, 2. It is added: Thou maintainest my lot. The verb in the original, is in the future, not that the act was not now performing, but he was confident it would be continued to the end. The Chaldee and Jebb have it in the future; Venema: Thou wilt make my lot ample; Alexander: Thou wilt enlarge my lot; Hengstenberg: Thou makest my lot glorious; Edwards: Thou art he that upholdeth my lot. For maintainest several read sustainest. It is the word applied to the act of staying up the hands of Moses, Ex. xvii. 12. It is often rendered by retain. There seems to be nothing to justify the rendering of the Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Syriac: It is thou that wilt restore my inheritance to me.

6. The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage. David seems to have had great delight in his portion in Canaan. Even the water of his own city seemed to him better than that of any other place, 2 Sam. xxiii. 15; 1 Chron. xi. 17. But his portion of land in Israel was hardly more than a memento of his real and great inheritance, which was God himself. So also Christ Jesus, though Maker of all worlds and Lord of all, yet gloried not in any temporal or worldly possessions. In the midst of all things justly his own, he yet lived in poverty, chiefly dependent, during his public ministry, on charity even for the necessities of life. Yet the Lord will "divide him a portion with the great." Isa. liii. 10-12. His heritage excels that of all men and of all angels, Heb. i. 5-13.

7. I will bless the LORD, who hath given me counsel. The ancient versions are quite agreed in the sense of this passage. The moderns vary it somewhat. Church of England: I will thank the LORD for giving me warning; Calvin: I will magnify Jehovah, who giveth me counsel; Fry: I bless Jehovah, who hath disclosed to me his counsels. The English version can hardly be improved. David was led by God to adopt that counsel and those views, which betoken coming salvation. Calvin's view is excellent: "David confesses that it was entirely owing to the pure grace of God that he had come to possess so great a good, and that he had been made a partaker of it by faith. . . Let us know that both these things proceed from the free liberality of God; first, his being our inheritance, and next our coming to the possession of him by faith." It was the Spirit resting on the man Christ Jesus, that made him also so wise and wonderful in counsel, Isa. xi. 1-5; lxi. 1-3; Luke iv. 18-20. My reins also instruct me in the night-seasons. For the signification and use of the word reins see Ps. vii. 9. Walford: "The reins or kidneys are used to signify the interior faculties; and the divine speaker observes, that in seasons of solitude, his thoughts were instinctively employed in contemplating the heavenly discoveries that were communicated to him." In Tyndale's Bible it is: My reins also have chastened me in the night; Alexander: Also by night have my reins prompted me. The word rendered night or night-season is in the plural, and points to the habit of mind both of David and of Christ. Indeed in all ages pious men have chosen the night as a time peculiarly favorable to deep reflection and devout exercises of every kind. The eighth and nineteenth Psalms seem to have been in good part the result of meditation at night. How our Saviour retired from all the noisy and busy scenes to solitary places and places for prayer, and there spent the night in the highest acts of personal communion with God the gospel declares, Luke vi. 12; xxi. 37.

The four remaining verses, with the exception of the last clause of the last verse, are quoted from the Septuagint literally by Peter on the day of Pentecost, and are commented on by him as follows:

"Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles, and wonders, and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know: Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain: Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death; because it was not possible that he should be holden of it. For David speaketh concerning him,

"I foresaw the Lord always before my face, for he is on my right hand, that I should not be moved: Therefore did my heart rejoice, and my tongue was glad; moreover, also, my flesh shall rest in hope: Because thou wilt not leave my soul in hell, neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. Thou hast made known to me the ways of life; thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance."

"Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption.

"This Jesus has God raised up, whereof we are all witnesses. Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear. For David is not ascended into the heavens: but he saith himself, The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand, until I make thy foes thy footstool. Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly, that God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye crucified, both Lord and Christ," Acts ii. 22-36.

Any interpretation of these four verses of the Psalm, which is inconsistent with Peter's inspired remarks upon them, is of course erroneous, and must be given up. Let us briefly consider each verse.

8. I have set the LORD always before me. There is no evidence that David was pious from his birth, much less that his love and obedience, even after his regeneration, were without fault. Yet this expression seems to be equivalent to a claim of spotless perfection. If so, it cannot belong to any but the Son of man. The rendering of the authorized version is certainly more literal than that of the Septuagint quoted by Peter in Acts. Calvin: I have set Jehovah continually before me; Amesius: I propose to myself Jehovah always; Edwards: I set Jehovah always before me; Jebb: I have set the Lord before me continually; Fry: I have set Jehovah ever before me; church of England: I have set God always before me; Hengstenberg: I set the Lord always before me; Alexander: I have set Jehovah before me always. The act here spoken of is one of pious regard to God's nature and will, as they are made known by himself. To eye God in everything is a mark of a holy life. If this clause be taken in such a modified sense as makes it declare sincerity and integrity of character, yet admitting want of absolute perfection, then indeed it might apply to David. But Peter's aim on the day of Pentecost was to prove that the passage quoted by him had no application whatever to David. This is conclusive. In this and the following verses we have an instance of transition from one subject to another like it or suggested by it. The destruction of Jerusalem was so terrible that in its horrors it resembled the last great day. So Christ naturally passes from an account of the one to the other, and it is not always easy to say where the one subject is wholly dropped, and the other first taken up. This difficulty is removed in the present instance by Peter's sermon. Christ's piety was perfect: In it infinite purity saw no blemish. It is added, Because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved. The foregoing reasonings would apply this clause also to Christ. The Chaldee reads: Because his majesty [or Shechinah] rests upon me, I shall not be moved. The other ancient versions retain very much the sense of ours. Jehovah was at the right hand of Christ "to counsel and instruct, to help, protect, and defend." The power and wisdom of God secured and shall ever secure to Christ a certain victory. He shall not be moved. The word is the same that is so rendered in Ps. x. 6; xiii. 4; xv. 5, which see. The mediatorial purpose, work, throne and glory are as stable as the nature of God, Isa. xlii. 4; l. 5-9.

9. Therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth. Most of the life of the Redeemer on earth was marked with tears and sorrows. Yet even here there was an hour when he rejoiced in spirit, Luke x. 21. And in his greatest sufferings there was a secret perception of good things to come. "The joy set before him" made the cross as nothing. He despised the shame, Heb. xii. 2. And when the heart is glad, the "glory" of a man, that is, his tongue rejoiceth. When the fire burns within, then soon the mouth will be open. For glory Peter uses tongue, quoting the Septuagint. In the Psalms the word more than once has this sense, see xxx. 12; lvii. 8; cviii. 1. For glory Calvin reads tongue, Edwards and Fry soul. Hengstenberg and Alexander interpret it of the soul. The word is that commonly rendered glory or honor. Anderson is confident it here means the tongue. My flesh also shall rest in hope, i. e., in hope of a speedy and glorious resurrection as is explained in the next verse.

10. For [meaning because] thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption. John Rogers' Translation: For why? thou shalt not leave my soule in hell, nether shalt thou suffre thy saincte to see corrupcyon; Genevan Translation: For thou wilt not leave my soule in the grave: neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption; Calvin: For thou wilt not leave my soul in the grave; neither wilt thou make thy Holy One to see the pit; Edwards: For thou wilt not leave my soul to the grave; thou wilt not suffer thy favored one to see corruption; Fry: For thou wilt not leave my soul in the abode of the dead, nor suffer thy beloved to see corruption: Alexander: For thou wilt not leave my soul to Hell; thou wilt not give thy Holy One to see corruption; Hengstenberg is still different: Thou wilt not leave my soul to hell, nor give up thy holy ones to see corruption; Venema also has the plural thy pious ones in the text, and in brackets the singular; Jebb says it "is plural among the received copies of the Jews; but Dr. Kennicott remarks that it is in the singular number in six editions of the printed Talmud. In one hundred and eighty copies of Kennicott, in the LXX., and Syriac it is singular." So is it also in the Arabic, Ethiopic and Vulgate. Peter quotes it in the singular, and his argument requires that it be applied to one not to many. Paul quotes it the same way in Acts xiii. 35-37. In explanation of the difficulties of the case it may be remarked that the word rendered soul, though it often has that signification, yet by no means necessarily requires that rendering in all cases. Horne thinks it means his animal frame. In Gen. i. 20, 30, and often elsewhere it is translated life. In Gen. i. 21, 24; ii. 19, and elsewhere it is rendered creature. In Gen. xxiii. 8 it is mind. In many cases it signifies persons. Gen. xxxvi. 6; xlv. 15, 18, 22, 25, 26; Ex. i. 5, etc. In Lev. xix. 28; xxi. 1; xxii. 4, and elsewhere it is rendered the dead. In Nu. ix. 6, 7, 10 it is rendered dead body. In this Psalm it seems to mean no more than dead body. Then it may read, Thou wilt not leave my dead body in the grave. This is all that the parallelism of the verse requires. It is all that the word rendered soul makes necessary. It is all that Peter drew from it on the day of Pentecost. For remarks on the word rendered hell, see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17. Its most common signification is the grave, the pit. To suffer thine Holy One is literally to give thine Holy One. See the same form of expression in Gen. xx. 6; xxxi. 7; Ex. iii. 19, and often elsewhere, where it is rendered suffer or let. To see corruption is to become corrupt, to rot; as to see death is to die. Ps. lxxxix. 48; Luke ii. 26. Christ's body was dead, but it never was dissolved. The word rendered corruption is rendered ditch, Ps. vii. 15; pit, Ps. ix. 15; destruction, Ps. lv. 23; the grave, Job xxxiii. 22; and corruption here, Ps. xlix. 9; Jon. ii. 6. The sense here is clearly corruption or destruction. Peter and Paul both approve this sense, as Luke informs us in the Acts of the Apostles.

11. Thou wilt shew me the path of life. The Chaldee and Alexander: Thou wilt teach me the way of life; Syriac: Thou wilt show me the way of life; Calvin: Thou wilt make me to know the path of life; Edwards has the same as our version; Hengstenberg: Thou wilt make known to me the way of life; Fry: Thou makest known to me the path of life. The word rendered life is in the plural. This may denote the excellence and richness of the life of the risen Saviour. Some think it may allude to the fact that Christ's resurrection secures the resurrection and eternal life of all his people. This is a truth whether taught here or not. Christ's resurrection was to be permanent, not followed by mortality, but by his walking in the path of life—life without end. In thy presence is fulness of joy. The Septuagint: Thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance. Christ's resurrection was followed by his ascension, and his ascension by his session at the right hand of God. There his joy is perfect. There he is exalted. There he is glorified. At thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore. This clause is not quoted by Peter on the day of Pentecost. It was not essential to his purpose. What those pleasures are no mortal can comprehend, but they are such as forever ravish the pure spirits around the throne. They satisfy the God-man, Christ Jesus for all his toils and sorrows.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Anything is good for us, if it leads us to hearty, believing prayer, v. 1.
2. It is a wonder that more men do not sink into despair, so many are sore pressed, and yet so few know the way to the mercy-seat, v. 1.
3. If the Lord Jesus Christ in his humiliation, for the support and encouragement of his human nature, so constantly and earnestly betook himself to prayer, how vain are those poor sinful men, who think they can do without it, v. 1. It is impossible that any mere man on earth should live in holiness and peace without constant help from God.
4. Wonderfully and reasonably God demands our trust and confidence at every step. We can do nothing aright without faith, v. 1. Calvin: "Our safety both in life and in death depends entirely upon our being under the protection of God."
5. True faith naturally leads to prayer, v. 1. Luther: "See here how trust calls upon the Lord. How can he call upon the Lord, who has not confided in him? Confidence and believing trust are reckoned among those things that regard God as gracious according to his compassion, and through which he will make us perpetually blessed."
6. True religion is matter of experience. He, who is in the enjoyment of it, can appeal to his own consciousness, and address his own soul, v. 2. This was true of Christ and of every good man that ever lived. Dickson: "The first solid evidence of the sincerity of saving faith is the testimony of the conscience, bearing witness to a man that he hath laid hold on the covenant of grace, and hath chosen God for his protector and master, and that he is resolved to depend upon God, and serve him."
7. It is of the essence of true piety always and devoutly to acknowledge God's right of dominion over us. We should often say to him, Thou art my Lord, v. 2. Thus pious men have always done. Thus Christ acknowledged himself a servant. We are not our own property. We are not our own masters.
8. The doctrine that after our best obedience we are still unprofitable servants is no novelty. It was taught of old, v. 2. Calvin: "Let men strive ever so much to lay themselves out for God, yet they can bring no advantage to him, Our goodness extendeth not to him, not only because, having in himself alone an all-sufficiency, he stands in need of nothing, but also because we are empty and destitute of all good things, and have nothing wherewith to show ourselves liberal towards him." Scott: "Even the perfect righteousness of the Saviour can add nothing to the essential glory and happiness of the Father; but it is the meritorious cause of the acceptance and sanctification, and eternal felicity of his people, in whom alone of Adam's race he greatly delights."
9. And so Christ's benevolence was to the sinner and not to the Sovereign sinned against, v. 3. The same truth is taught in John iii. 16; xvii. 19. And as Christ set us an example of pity and kindness to feeble, prejudiced, sinful men, so we must walk in his footsteps. Calvin: "As our good deeds cannot extend to him, God substitutes the saints in his place, and towards them we are to exercise our charity."
10. The friendship of the pious is well bestowed on the saints, for they are the excellent of the earth, v. 3. One of great purity of character and close discernment will indeed see many blemishes in the best of mere men; still believers are the salt of the earth. As a class they are so superior to mere worldlings that a true child of God finds them to be as gold compared with dross. Diodati: They are "the true, free, and noble children of God, heirs of his kingdom, and transformed into his image from glory to glory." Hengstenberg: "The saints are the chosen ones, those whom God has taken out of the territory of the profane world, and raised to the standing of his people. Of this elevation in dignity, an elevation in sentiment is certainly the consequence." The love of Christ to his people was first that of good will. He pitied them and redeemed them. It is next that of delight in their characters, not as perfect, but as sincere and upright. Christ loves his own image wherever he sees it.

11. True benevolence would certainly demand the universal diffusion of the saving knowledge of God, because the wretchedness of all, who embrace false religions, is so great, v. 4. Their sorrows are multiplied. Alexander: "In the word translated their sorrows there seems to be an allusion to a very similar form, which would mean their idols, as if to suggest that false gods are mere troubles and vexations."

12. Yet how strongly and strangely are men bent to falsehood, and, even to the grossest form of it, idolatry. The heathen are mad upon their idols. The wicked hasten after another God, v. 4. Human nature is foolish, perverse and depraved. This is the only way of accounting for human folly in matters of religion. Morison: "The tendency of apostate human nature to run into idolatrous practices is one of its most marked features. Every people on the face of the earth has displayed this tendency; and there is no instance upon record in which the work of self-deliverance has been effected." The idolatry of the heart towards anything that God has made will be followed by like misery.

13. Let us never under any circumstance do anything to countenance any form of false worship, v. 4. The last clause of that verse finds its parallel in Ex. xxiii. 13.

14. God himself is the portion of all the souls that trust in him, v. 5. In many things the righteous is wise. He puts truth before error, eternity before time, saints before sinners, the spirit before the flesh; but the height of his sagacity is in preferring God's will to his own, God's favor to that of all creatures, and God himself to the universe beside.

14. Nor is the believer an intruder, nor a usurper in his claims to the love and blessing of God. He has it by inheritance, v. 5, not the less certain or binding because he has it through his co-heir, Jesus Christ. He has it by gift from God, the very title by which we hold our existence. Yea, better, it is bought with the blood of Christ.

15. If by the cup the prophet means, as some think, temporal blessings, then God's people shall never lack bread or water. If that is not intended then something better is, and so the temporal comes with the spiritual, v. 5.

16. Reliance on God will never disappoint our hopes. He will carry us through and maintain our lot, v. 5.

17. Even in this life the just are happy. They have a goodly heritage, v. 6. It must be different with their enemies. Rivet: "The way to blessedness is wholly unknown to the natural man. True blessedness consists in beholding the face of God." This is done by faith here, by vision in glory. God's people have good things now, and better coming.

18. How reasonable therefore is the duty of praising and blessing the Lord, v. 7. Let us abound in this heavenly employment.

19. All wise men make God's counsel their guide, v. 7. Why should they not? He makes no mistakes. All his counsels are of old faithfulness and truth. He is the infallible counsellor. Some think the word Jehovah in this verse points to Christ. Whether it does or not, other Scriptures style him the "Wonderful, COUNSELLOR, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace."

20. Strike out of the religious character and history of God's people all their heart-searchings, thoughts, prayers, praises and meditations in the night season, and what a hideous gap would appear, v. 7.

21. True piety will uniformly evince itself by so setting the Lord before us as "to keep all our senses bound and captive, that they may not run out and go astray after any other object," v. 8. In Christ Jesus piety was perfect, and so he never lost sight of God's will and law and glory, even when the light and comfort of God's countenance were withheld. To be like Christ in any measure is grace; to be like him in perfection is glory.

22. Horne: "The method taken by Christ as man to support himself in time of trouble and persevere unto the end, was to maintain a constant actual sense of the presence of Jehovah, whom when he thus saw standing at his right hand, ready, at the appointed hour, to succor and deliver him, he then feared not the powers of earth and hell combined for his destruction," v. 8.

23. God's protection and support of David, or Christ, or any one else is enough. Such shall not be moved, v. 8.

24. No death is comfortable without, and none is miserable with the hopes and supports of true religion, v. 9. When the flesh rests in hope death is disarmed. Is. lvii. 2. This was true of Christ, and it is true of all his people. Henry: "Dying Christians, as well as a dying Christ, may cheerfully put off the body in a believing expectation of a joyful resurrection;" Morison: "Blessed Redeemer! Thou hast perfumed the noisome grave by thy temporary abode in its dreary mansions; from a prison thou hast changed it into a scene of hope; thou hast made it the resting-place of weary pilgrims; and all the members of thy mystical body can look on it as the gate of heaven."

25. It would have been a great thing for plain pious souls if they had never been troubled by curious questions of human invention respecting the abode of souls separated from their bodies in connection with this tenth verse and similar Scriptures. The whole difficulty seems to have had a close connection with that clause of the Apostles' Creed, which says of Christ, "He descended into hell." Pearson: "It appears that the first intention of putting these words into the creed was only to express the burial of our Saviour, or the descent of his body into the grave." Had the matter rested here it would have been comparatively harmless. The words in the creed seem to be built on the tenth verse of this Psalm. Calvin says that "both the Greek and Latin Fathers have strained these words to a meaning different from that of exempting the life of Christ from the dominion of the grave, referring them to the bringing back of the soul of Christ from hell." Morison: "The word hell, according to the present usage of our language, always denotes the place of torment; but the original word, rendered hell in our Bibles, often signifies the darkness and covering of the grave; and that it does so here is obvious from the inspired comment of the Apostle Peter in Acts ii. 27." Usher says that the word which in this Psalm is rendered hell signifies, "when spoken of the body, the grave; when of the soul, that state in which the soul is without the body, whether Paradise or Hell, properly so called."

26. The question, Was Christ's body incorruptible? has often been discussed in connection with verse 10. Nor does there seem to be any need of dismissing the question with alarm or abhorrence. It is admitted that Christ's whole person was undefiled by either original or actual sin; that he was impeccable; that he fully satisfied in our stead the demands of the law; that the union of the divine and human natures of our Saviour was neither dissolved nor suspended by the separation of his soul and body in death; and that the Father had promised that his body should not be corrupted. How was it possible then that it should see corruption? Dickson: "The body of Christ not only was to rise from the dead, but also could not so much as putrefy in the grave."

27. This Psalm incontestably requires the resurrection of Christ, vv. 9-11. The New Testament abundantly declares the fact. This article of faith is from its nature and from the admission of inspired writers fundamental in Christianity. Rom. i. 4; iv. 25; 1 Cor. xv. 12-19.

28. And as Christ arose, so shall his people. His resurrection makes theirs certain, 1 Cor. xv. 20-22. Christ is the head; his people are the members. As the Head arose, the members cannot perish. Horne: "Through this thy beloved Son and our Saviour, thou shalt show us likewise, O Lord, the path of life; thou shalt justify our souls by thy grace now, and raise our bodies by thy power at the last day; when earthly sorrow shall terminate in heavenly joy, and momentary pain shall be rewarded with everlasting felicity." Isa. xxvi. 19.

29. After humility comes honor, vv. 10, 11. It was so with Christ. It shall be so with his people. Everything in its order. Morison: "The glorified Saviour did not take possession of the heavenly inheritance in his own name merely. He entered into his rest as a public person, and all the members of his body, the church, shall share with him the perfection of the bliss which he now enjoys."

30. What a place heaven must be, both relatively as compared with earth, and absolutely in itself! Here all is without form and void, dark and imperfect, vain and fleeting. There all is so perfect, so glorious, so permanent that nothing is wanting, and even inspired writers seem at a loss for words to convey some idea of the eternal bliss. Fulness of joy, pleasures, in thy presence, at thy right hand, for evermore! v. 11. Who can comprehend these terms? Morison: "What a magnificent thought is the idea of a world all pure, all triumphant!" Henry: "Those who live piously, with God in their eye, may die comfortably, with heaven in their eye."

31. Cobbin: "Exalted devotion brings the soul into contact with the mind of God."

PSALM XVII.

A Prayer of David.

1 HEAR the right, O LORD, attend unto my cry; give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips.

2 Let my sentence come forth from thy presence; let thine eyes behold the things that are equal.

3 Thou hast proved mine heart; thou hast visited me in the night; thou hast tried me, and shalt find nothing: I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress.

4 Concerning the works of men, by the word of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer.

5 Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not.

6 I have called upon thee, for thou wilt hear me, O God: incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech.

7 Shew thy marvellous loving-kindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them which put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them.

8 Keep me as the apple of the eye; hide me under the shadow of thy wings, 9 From the wicked that oppress me, from my deadly enemies, who compass me about.

10 They are inclosed in their own fat: with their mouth they speak proudly.

11 They have now compassed us in our steps: they have set their eyes bowing down to the earth;

12 Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey, and as it were a young lion lurking in secret places.

13 Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, cast him down: deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword:

14 From men which are thy hand, O LORD, from men of the world, which have their portion in this life, and whose belly thou fillest with thy hid treasure: they are full of children, and leave the rest of their substance to their babes.

15 As for me, I will behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness.

THE word rendered prayer in the title occurs frequently in the Scriptures, and is in our version always so translated. Ps. iv. 1; vi. 9. There are four other Psalms, which have the word prayer in the title, viz., lxxxvi., xc., cii., cxlii. It is also found as a caption to Habakkuk iii. 1. As the words a prayer of Habakkuk simply point out that prophet as the author, not as the subject of the prayer, so with this Psalm. It is a prayer belonging to David as its author. The Syriac has it, "Written by David, a prayer." Whether his own case is or is not brought forward is not determined by the title. Alexander: "This Psalm is called a prayer because petition is its burden, its characteristic feature, its essential element." The same remark applies to the other Psalms which have prayer in the title.

There is nothing in this Psalm to determine the occasion, on which it was written. Several learned men have suggested particular events in the history of David, as furnishing the occasion of this pious prayer. According to their various views, men suppose this Psalm has reference to events recorded in 1 Sam. xx., xxiv., xxvi., xxvii. But all this is conjecture. There is indeed considerable reason for the opinion, held by many, that the conduct of Saul and his adherents is distinctly referred to, at least so far as to suggest some of the forms of expression. The fact is that the Psalm is well adapted to express the pious sentiments of David on many occasions during and after the time of Saul.

Some think this Psalm has so peculiar a resemblance to Ps. xvi. that the two may be regarded as a pair. Venema: "Such is the agreement between this Psalm and the preceding, that I am almost ready to regard them as one Psalm." Hengstenberg: "This Psalm has many coincidences with Ps. xvi. which are so important that they give color to the idea of both Psalms having been united by the author into one pair." Others no less respectable have made similar observations. The more this subject of pairs in the Psalms is examined, the more uncertain will it probably appear. That, which in one place is relied on to establish it, in other cases entirely fails, or manifestly opposes the idea. Still the theory is harmless. Hengstenberg goes so far in this matter as to attempt to show a connection between this Psalm and the seventh. Nor is he content with that. He insists on a connection between vv. 1-5 of this Psalm and vv. 20-27 of Psalm xviii. The utmost that is well established on this point is that all truth is connected, and that many truths are quite similar, and expressed in quite similar words not only by the same writer, but by different inspired penmen. See Introduction, § 12.

This Psalm has long been exceedingly precious to the afflicted people of God. Perhaps no portion of this collection of Praises has been more sung by the saints of God for hundreds of years than the various versions of this Prayer. The contents give it a prominent place in the experience of God's people. And although it is nowhere in the New Testament declared to refer to Messiah, yet there is not in it an expression, which might not have been fitly used by Christ Jesus, when on earth. Indeed, the title in the Arabic is, "A prayer in the person of a perfect man, and of Christ himself, and of every one that is redeemed by him." That class of interpreters, therefore, who feel constrained to apply to Christ everything in the Psalms, which can possibly bear that construction, find no difficulty here. A long list of interpreters from Jerome to Fry maintain this view. Perhaps the safer mode is to notice how these things were fulfilled in Christ, and also in his people. Alexander thus begins his notice of this Psalm: "A SUFFERER, in imminent danger, professes his sincere conformity to God's will, and invokes his protection." There is no safe rule of interpretation, which will allow us to confine the application of this Psalm to Christ. He was tempted in all points as his people, and his experience of sorrow and trial gives both light and encouragement to all, who walk in his footsteps.

The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and El God, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; v. 4.

1. Hear the right, O LORD. The Vulgate, Ethiopic, Arabic and Doway: Hear O Lord, my justice, or my righteousness. Calvin: Hear my righteousness; Edwards: Hear what is right; Jebb: Hear, O LORD, righteousness; Fry: Hear my just cause; Hengstenberg: Hear righteousness; Alexandër: Hear, Oh Jehovah, the right. All these substantially agree with our English version. So also do Venema, Diodati, Ainsworth, Amesius and Tholuck. But the Septuagint: Hear, O Lord of my righteousness; Syriac: Hear, O righteous Lord. This rendering is preferred by Boothroyd, Houbigant, Waterland, Horne and Clarke. Jerome, Aquila and Horsley favor the following: Hear the just one. The reader will observe great authority in favor of the common version. There is a special fitness in this rendering, as the whole weight of the petition urged is made to rest on the righteousness of the cause which is pleaded. To hear is to give ear, to answer and help. See on Ps. iv. 1. Right, in the Hebrew the same as in Ps. iv. 1, 5; vii. 8, is rendered righteousness; in Ps. ix. 4, right; in Ps. xxxv. 27, righteous cause; in Ps. lxxxiv. 14, justice. Attend unto my cry. The word rendered attend is often rendered hearken, Ps. v. 2; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Job xiii. 6; Dan. ix. 19; Mic. i. 2; in Job xxxiii. 31, mark well; in Jer. xviii. 18, give heed; in Pr. i. 24, regard; often attend. The meaning is very uniform. The word rendered cry has not previously occurred in the Psalms, though it occurs frequently hereafter. It always signifies earnest speech or expression, whether joyful or sad. In 1 Kings xxii. 36, it is proclamation; in Ps. xlii. 4, joy; in Ps. xlvii. 1, triumph; in Ps. cv. 43, gladness; in Ps. cxxvi. 2, singing; in Pr. xi. 10, shouting. In Ps. lxi. 1, it is used in the same sense as here—that of an earnest lifting up of the voice, a heartfelt call on God for help and relief. Calvin explains it as "earnest prayer," denoting "vehement, intense earnestness of soul." And so the Psalmist adds, Give ear unto my prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips. Prayer, the same as that found in the title. The word rendered give ear has no other meaning, though in one case it is translated give good heed, Ecc. xii. 9; sometimes hearken and sometimes hear. Feigned lips, literally, lips, not of deceit. The same word is found in Ps. v. 6; x. 7, and signifies craft, subtilty, guile. "We must be honest with God. He abhors a lie in worship no less than in trade. The language of this verse cannot be that of a wicked man, for although even irreligious persons may often be able justly to boast of having a good cause; yet as they do not acknowledge that the world is governed by the providence of God, they content themselves with enjoying the approbation of their own conscience, as they speak, and, gnawing the bit, bear the injuries which are done to them rather obstinately than steadfastly, seeking for consolation neither in faith, nor in prayer. But the faithful not only depend upon the goodness of their cause; they also commit it to God that he may defend and maintain it." The verse therefore may be applied to David as a just man, having truth and equity on his side, being innocent of the wrongs, whereof he is accused. Or the prayer may suit a representative person, who is righteous and guileless. It is a delightful truth that the imputation of Christ's merits for our justifying righteousness before God is always accompanied by the bestowment of integrity and uprightness of character. Many, however, contend, and not without plausibility, that the verse has special reference to Christ. Amyrald: "In the exposition of this Psalm, and of some others, the left eye must be fixed on David, that the right may be kept intent on Christ." Fry: "Christ is the suppliant; but, as usual in these Psalms, he prays as the Head and Surety of his body, the church, making their cause his own. He pleads his righteousness in their behalf."

2. Let my sentence come forth from thy presence. Calvin: Let my judgment [judgment in my favor] come forth from the presence of thy countenance; Edwards thinks our version cannot be improved; Jebb: From thy presence let judgment come forth; Fry: From thee let my sentence come forth; Dathe: I pray thee to be the judge of my cause; Hengstenberg: Let my right go forth from thee; Alexander: From before thee my judgment shall come forth. Horsley thinks the meaning well expressed thus: Be thou, O Jehovah, my judge in thine own person. In the original and in the Chaldee the verb is in the future. The language is that of petition and confidence united. When a decision is given on the throne of judgment, the next thing is its promulgation and execution. The Psalmist asks God that the right may be publicly and before all vindicated. Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal. This is the very office of a judge. To do this finally and infallibly is the prerogative of God alone. Calvin: Let thine eyes look upon mine uprightness; Ainsworth: Let thine eyes view righteousnesses; Edwards: Let thine eyes look upon equity; Jebb adopts the common version; Fry: Let thine eyes regard with equity; Hengstenberg: Let thine eyes behold uprightness; Alexander: Thine eyes shall behold equities; Septuagint: Let mine eyes (or mine eyes shall) behold equal things. The sense of the verse is well given by Diodati: "Give thou the sentence, according to mine innocency, well known unto thee, make it appear and defend it by the effect." The word rendered the things that are equal is plural. It may designate all causes that are just, or it may indicate that in this case the right is all on one side and is perfect. Ainsworth: My most righteous cause. One can hardly fail to see how wonderfully this expresses the thoughts of Christ, Is. xlix. 4; "Surely my judgment is with the LORD, and my work with my God." Often did he say much the same. He "committed himself to him that judgeth righteously." 1 Pet. ii. 23.

3. Thou hast proved mine heart. Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Ethiopic, Doway, Calvin and Jebb render the clause as our version; Syriac and Edwards: Thou hast explored me; Hengstenberg: Thou provest my heart; Alexander: Thou hast tried my heart; the church of England unites this and the next clause: Thou hast proved and visited mine heart in the night-season; Morison: "The word rendered thou hast proved imports more properly the act of strict examination and search, with a view to discovery." The word is variously rendered try, prove, examine, and once tempt, Mal. iii. 15. It is used to express the trying of gold, Zech. xiii. 9. We have the same word in Ps. xi. 4, 5. Any examination had, or proof made by omniscience cannot fail to be thorough, impartial, conclusive. The whole of this verse is a solemn and reverent appeal to God, asserting the prophet's truth and sincerity. God knew that he was no hypocrite. Luther: "He had prayed, that the Lord would regard his righteousness; now he declares what sort of confidence he had to rest on in begging this." The way in which God had proved him is next stated: Thou hast visited me in the night. To the wicked night is the great time for evil thoughts and plans, Job xxiv. 13-17. Night is the time when business, company and the whole structure of society leave the heart the most unrestrained. To know a man's habitual thoughts at night is to know the complexion of his whole character. Yea, in those lone and solemn hours, when one's thoughts so fearfully accuse, or so clearly excuse him, God knew how sincere were all the professions of his servant. Thou hast tried me. Chaldee and Syriac: Thou hast examined me; Calvin: Thou hast examined it [mine heart]; Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Arabic: Thou hast tried me by fire; Geddes: Thou hast smelted me; Hengstenberg: Thou purgest me; Alexander: Thou hast assayed me. Elsewhere the verb is rendered try, refine, melt, purge away, and, in the form of a noun, refiner, founder, goldsmith. Morison: "It denotes primarily the act of melting, or fusing metals." If the figure here is that drawn from melting in order to try metals, then we extend it to the next phrase, And shalt find nothing. For nothing Ainsworth prefers no dross, or deceit; Chaldee, no corruption; Syriac, no iniquity; Septuagint, Vulgate, and Ethiopic: In me iniquity was not found; Arabic: Thou didst not find in me wickedness; Calvin: Thou shalt find nothing; Edwards: Thou canst find no wicked design in me; Fry: Thou couldest find nothing; Hengstenberg: Thou findest not; Alexander: Thou wilt not find; church of England: And thou shalt find no wickedness in me. If this expression is true of David in regard to Saul and his adherents, it is true in a much higher sense of Christ, who said, "The prince of this world cometh, and hath nothing in me." An upright man will show his rectitude by his speech: "I am purposed that my mouth shall not transgress. This is confessedly a very difficult passage. Calvin: My thoughts shall not pass beyond my mouth; Jebb: I am purposed that there shall not be transgression in my mouth; Hengstenberg: My thought oversteps not my mouth; church of England: For I am utterly purposed that my mouth shall not offend; Alexander: My mouth shall not exceed my thought. Nor does the difficulty stop here. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Doway, Edwards and Fry connect this clause with the next in one verse. The Doway, following the Septuagint, etc., renders it: That my mouth may not speak the works of men; Edwards: My mouth transgresses not because of the works of men; Fry: No thoughts pass from my mouth according to the deeds of men. The Chaldee is still more difficult: I have thought evil, it hath not passed my mouth. All these renderings need not here be considered at length. Diodati gives his apprehensions of the sense in this paraphrase: "My words are all true, loyal, and correspondent to the inward thoughts of my heart." David probably designed to say that not only was his heart pure from the wickedness imputed to him, but he had said nothing and should say nothing to the contrary of all he had thus professed. Scott: "He had avoided every disrespectful word concerning Saul, the Lord's anointed." If any can find a better construction, let it be accepted. If the words be regarded as spoken by Messiah, they are a declaration of his sinless speech. No guile was found in his mouth. This view leaves the next verse to begin as in our version:

4. Concerning the works of men, by the word of thy lips I have kept me from the paths of the destroyer. Concerning means respecting, touching, as relates to, q. d., if we speak of the works of men. The word for men is Adam, which means not only the first man, but his descendants, who have his likeness. David had spoken of his heart and then of his tongue. He now speaks of his acts, and says respecting these he has kept himself from the paths of the destroyer by the word which God had spoken. The warning, cleansing effect of God's word is often mentioned in Scripture, Ps. xix. 11; John xv. 3. The word rendered kept is the same as in Ps. xvi. 1 is translated preserve, the same found in v. 8 of this Psalm. It is well rendered here. Edwards renders it shunned. Destroyer, by John Rogers rendered murderer; by Genevan translation, cruell man; by Edwards, oppressive; by Calvin, violent; by Hengstenberg, transgressor. It comes from a word, which would be used to signify the breaking down of the walls of a city. There is no better rendering than destroyer. To shun the paths of the destroyer is to avoid the life and work of a destroyer. This David did during all his troubles with Saul. This David's greater Son did also, see Luke ix. 56; John iii. 17. The other views of this passage are so poorly supported that it is hardly necessary now to consider them.

5. David knew his own weakness. He had not kept himself from wicked ways by his own power and virtue. And so he prays: Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not. This might be the sense, if the verse applied to David alone. Calvin, Jebb and the church of England give the sense of the common version. These have authority on their side. But another rendering is justly preferred by many. Edwards: I have kept my steps steady in thy paths; my feet have not deviated; Hengstenberg: My steps hold fast by thy paths, my feet slide not; Alexander: My steps have laid hold of thy paths, my feet have not swerved. If this is the correct rendering, the verse contains a renewed profession of innocence. Fry says it is "the most positive assertion of unsinning obedience that can well be imagined." Alexander: "The common version violates the context by converting the first clause into a prayer, which would here be out of place." Even if David personally, or as an example of God's suffering people, is alone referred to, this latter is the better view.

6. I have called upon thee; for thou wilt hear me, O God. Some versions, modern as well as ancient, greatly weaken the force of this passage by giving the tenses different from the common version, which follows the Hebrew. The preterite is first used as expressive of an action continued to this time. The future is employed to express the hope that uniformly sustained and encouraged him in prayer. The Chaldee, Calvin, Venema, Jebb, church of England and Alexander give the tenses as in our version. Edwards varies: I call upon thee, because thou usest to hear me; Fry: I have called upon thee: for thou dost answer me. Men in despair never pray. Hope in God's mercy is essential to any hearty calling on God. The experience of God's people in this matter has great power over them. They have proved God and found him faithful. Therefore they come boldly and cry: Incline thine ear unto me, and hear my speech. Luther well says that this verse in its scope "comprehends in itself the past as well as the future. The meaning of it appears to be this: I have confidence that my words shall not be in vain, since I know how, according to thy grace, thou art wont to hear me. Hence the compassion of God is celebrated, which consists in this, that he hears when we cry. This moves us, and is the reason why we can presume to call." Christ was heard in that he feared, when he uttered strong crying and tears in the days of his flesh.

7. Shew thy marvellous loving-kindness, O thou that savest by thy right hand them which put their trust in thee from those that rise up against them. The verb first found in this verse is elsewhere rendered sever, set apart, separate, put a difference, wonderfully make. Our translators put in the word marvellous in order to convey the full idea. But it is made to qualify loving-kindness, and not the verb shew. Wonderfully shew thy loving-kindness would be more literal. Calvin: Make marvellous thy mercies; Edwards: Exert thy goodness in a wonderful manner; Jebb: Show the marvels of thy mercies; Hengstenberg: Single out thy loving-kindnesses; Morison: Make great thy mercies; Alexander: Distinguish thy mercies. The noun is in the plural. He asks God to make a remarkable display, an illustrious exhibition of his mercies for his deliverance. The word rendered loving-kindness is commonly rendered mercy, Ps. v. 7; vi. 4; xiii. 5, and twenty-six times in Ps. cxxxvi. It is also rendered good deeds, Neh. xiii. 14; goodness, Neh. xxxii. 32; often kindness, Jon. iv. 2; sometimes pity, Job vi. 14; merciful kindness, Ps. cxvii. 2. Such an exercise of mercy was called for in David's circumstances to save him in a clear and decided way. The right hand is a phrase often occurring in the Scriptures, and more frequently in the Psalms than in any other book. In this and in several other places it seems to refer to the strong power of God. The remainder of the verse has no serious difficulty. The ellipses are well supplied in our version.

8. Keep me as the apple of the eye. The apple of the eye is the rendering of a phrase found also in Deut. xxxii. 10; Pr. vii. 2. It is literally the little man, the daughter or the black of the eye—the part which reflects the image of a man when he looks into it. The word rendered apple is elsewhere obscure, black. Prov. vii. 9; xx. 20. No part of our frame is more constantly, instinctively, or carefully guarded than the apple of the eye. The least danger threatened, or injury inflicted rouses all our powers of defence. The word rendered keep is the same as that rendered preserve Ps. xvi. 1, which see. The same prayer is, according to our version, expressed in other words: Hide me under the shadow of thy wings. This rendering is sustained by the Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Fry, Jebb, and Hengstenberg. But Ainsworth and Alexander prefer the literal rendering in the future, in the shadow of thy wings thou wilt hide me. Ainsworth: "It is the property of the Hebrew tongue often to set down a prayer in this form, especially in the end of a sentence, as noting some assurance to have the request fulfilled." In proof he cites Ps. x. 17; lix. 1; lxiv. 1; and several places in Job. Alexander: "What he asks in one clause he expresses his assured hope of obtaining in the other." He supposes Deut. xxxii. 10 referred to in the first clause, and Deut. xxxii. 11 in the second. Matt. xxiii. 37 is thought by many to be a carrying out of the figure in the last clause. Dodd and others think the reference is to the wings of the cherubim, which overshadowed the mercy-seat. Ps. lvii. 1 is quoted in proof. This is not decisive. The defence secured was to be

9. From the wicked that oppress me, from my deadly enemies who compass me about. Tholuck probably gives the main ideas of this verse: "David states that his persecutors are most determinately set upon his destruction, that they try to stop every means of escape." Yet the diversity of rendering is considerable. Calvin: From the face of the ungodly, who go about to destroy me: and of mine enemies, who besiege [or encompass] me; Edwards: From the wicked that ravage me; from my mortal enemies who encompass me; Venema: In the presence of the wicked, who rise up against me, my enemies, who with a haughty spirit have surrounded me; Amesius: On account of the wicked, who waste me; my mortal enemies who surround me; Jebb: From the presence of the ungodly that waste me: mine enemies my soul do surround; Fry: From the face of the wicked who have assailed me—my enemies who have encompassed me; Ainsworth reads, Because of the wicked, etc.; church of England: From the ungodly that trouble me; mine enemies compass me round about to take away my soul; Hengstenberg: From the wicked, who disperse me, mine enemies, who against the soul compass me about; Alexander: From the face of the wicked who have wasted me; mine enemies to the soul will surround me. From the face of the wicked is the best rendering of the first clause. The word rendered oppress is to waste, lay waste, destroy, spoil. The latter is by far the most frequent rendering. It is never rendered oppress but in this place. The wicked of the first clause are the enemies of the last. Mudge, Kennicott and Clarke regard the imagery of the latter part of this verse and of the next two verses, as taken from huntsmen, who surround a large tract of forest, and drive their game to the centre, where they are caught, or killed. This excludes the idea of a close siege, and gives that of a hot pursuit on all sides in a chase. Compass is the most common rendering of the verb in this clause. The same word is found in Job xix. 6. God hath compassed me with his net. In Ps. xxii. 16 we have the same word: The assembly of the wicked have inclosed me. Deadly enemies are those who seek the life, and will be satisfied with nothing till it is destroyed. Alexander, speaking of the last clause of this verse, says: "The future form suggests that the danger, which the first clause had described as past, was still present and likely to continue." Those who refer this Psalm to Christ as the anti-type of David, find no difficulty in the application of this verse.

10. They are inclosed in their own fat. John Rogers' translation: Whyche man-tyne thyr awne welthynesse wyth oppressyon. The other old English versions generally agree with that in common use. Chaldee: Their wealth is multiplied; Vulgate and Doway, following the Septuagint: They have shut up their fat. By fat the Doway says bowels of compassion are signified. But this is mere assertion, not founded on any imagery familiar to Hebrews. The fact is that in man no part has less sensibility than the fat. That word never expresses tenderness. With our version substantially agree Calvin, Jebb, Alexander and others. But Houbigant, Lowth, Kennicott, Edwards, Horsley, Fry and Clarke read, They have inclosed me in their net. The great objection to this reading is: "It receives no support from ancient versions or manuscripts." The transposition of one letter in the original would however justify it. This is one of the most respectable of modern emendations, and makes the clause fall in with the imagery of vv. 9, 11, if that is drawn from hunting. But the common version gives an excellent sense, and coincides with a figure familiar to the inspired writers. Deut. xxxii. 15; Job xv. 27; Ps. lxxiii. 7; cxix. 70. David's condition was that of consuming sorrow; that of his enemies consisted with the utmost insensibility fostered by arrogance and presumption. Their speech corresponds with their state and so, With their mouth they speak proudly. Both ancient and modern versions remarkably coincide with the above rendering. It is always true that out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. The proud will speak proudly. The word rendered proudly (literally in pride) is in Ps. lxxxix. 9 raging: Thou rulest the raging of the sea. How the wicked raged against David and Christ is well known to all who read the Scriptures.

11. They have now compassed us in our steps. Compassed, not the same word as in v. 9, but the same as that in Gen. ii. 11, 13; 2 Kings vi. 15; viii. 21. In Ps. xlviii. 12 it is walk about. The hunters having driven their prey together, and thinking it secure walk about, and with confidence contemplate their easy victory. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin, Venema, Edwards and Hengstenberg follow the Hebrew text, and read me, not us, though the Masora and many agree with our version. The sense is the same in either case. The way the wicked hated David and David's Lord is a specimen of their malice against all good men. The look of the wicked over their prey has been noticed in every time of persecution, and so it is added, They have set their eyes bowing down to the earth. Kimchi thinks the sense is, They have their eyes on the earth, to spread nets for our feet; Arabic and Syriac render it so as to give this sense, They have set their eyes that they may strike me to the earth, or prostrate me on the earth; Calvin: They have fixed their eyes to cast down to the earth; Edwards: They fix their eyes upon me, stooping down to the earth; Venema: In the most secret manner they set their eyes on the earth to spy; Jebb: Their eyes they have set, turning down to the earth; Fry: They fix their eyes to cast us on the ground; Horne: They have set or fixed their eyes upon us to lay us prostrate upon the earth; Hengstenberg: They direct their eyes to turn aside in the land; Alexander: Their eyes they will set to go astray in the land. In this verse as in the preceding the first verb is in the preterite; the second, in the future, showing that dangers were still imminent, and that no door of escape was open to sight. These senses have been gathered: first, these pursuers had a demure and innocent (though hypocritical) look; secondly, they were as hunters watching the footsteps of their prey; thirdly, their eyes were intent on the persecuted to bring them low; fourthly, their eyes were set on wickedness, and so they went more and more astray; fifthly, they act like a beast, with eyes intent, crouching to spring on its prey.

The fourth of these views is the best sustained by the usage of the words; but the fifth best agrees with the scope and subsequent context:

12. Like as a lion that is greedy of his prey, and as it were a young lion lurking in secret places. There is very slight variation in the rendering of these words, some being more full than others, but all preserving the same imagery. The young lion is not the whelp in the lair, but the grown young lion that hunts his own meat, the strongest lion. Persecutors are terrible wild beasts. The figure is natural and forcible, Ps. x. 8-10. Paul is supposed to call Nero a lion, 2 Tim. iv. 17. In such straits, surrounded by enemies, the help of man is vain, and hope is clean gone, unless God will appear. So the prayer is:

13. Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, cast him down. Arise, commonly so rendered. See Ps. iii. 7; vii. 6; x. 12. Disappoint him, literally prevent his face, i. e., step in before him, hinder him from compassing his designs. Hengstenberg has it, Surprise him. The word is in our version almost uniformly prevent, go before, come before, Ps. xviii. 5; lxxxix. 14; Mic. vi. 6. Cast him down, is rendered bend him by the Chaldee, Cocceius, Venema and Street; lay him prostrate on the ground by Calvin; bring him down by Edwards; make him bow by Alexander; bring him to his knees by the Septuagint. This last rendering cannot be improved. By humbling their enemies, God often saves his chosen from their cruel power. And so David adds: Deliver my soul from the wicked. The word deliver is rendered with great uniformity in our version, Ps. xxxi. 1; lxxi. 4; lxxxii. 4. Once it is Cause me to escape, Ps. lxxi. 2. The wicked, the same as the ungodly of Ps. i. The prayer is for complete deliverance from present dangers and enemies. Our version reads, Deliver my soul from the wicked, which is thy sword. With this rendering agree the Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, church of England, Patrick and Scott. The Chaldee, however, has it, from the wicked, who deserves to be slain with the sword; Syriac: From the wicked and from the sword; Calvin: From the ungodly man by thy sword. With Calvin agree Venema, Amesius, Houbigant, Boothroyd, Dathe, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Horne, Horsley, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Those who agree with our common version cite Isa. x. 5, where the Assyrian is called the rod of God's anger. In either case we have a good sense. That of our version has long been precious to many of God's people. Perhaps it is to be preferred. The wicked are God's sword, whether this verse declares it or not, and without repentance they shall perish by his sword, the instrument of executing his dreadful anger. The Psalmist continues his prayer for deliverance

14. From men, which are thy hand, O LORD. There is much the same diversity here as in the preceding clause, Calvin and others reading, From men by thy hand. The remarks on the last clause of v. 13 are here fairly applicable. The principle which governs the reading in that phrase must prevail here also, though a few have capriciously varied the translation. The common English rendering of this verse is generally so excellent that it will be hard to find a better. Although the original is confessedly difficult, and many changes have been suggested, where is the sense, required by the context and the grammatical construction, given more clearly than in our version? This makes the word sword, v. 13, to be in apposition with the wicked, and the word hand to be in apposition with men, meaning the same as the sword and the wicked of v. 13. Then there is a further description of the persons intended when he continues to ask for deliverance from men of the world; Calvin: Men who are of long duration, [who are from an age]; Edwards: Men, I say, of the earth; church of England: The men I say, and from the evil world; Venema: The partners, I say, of a fortunate age; Ainsworth: Mortal men of the transitory world; Street: The mortals of this age; Horne: Mortals of the transitory world; Clarke: Mortal men of time; Dathe: Men who are prosperous; Hengstenberg: The men of continuance.

The word rendered world may signify duration, age, time, world, or the things of the world, Job xi. 17; Ps. xxxix. 5; xlix. 1; lxxxix. 47. Our common version can be sustained. The changes suggested are not improvements. We need deliverance from the principles, examples and power of the men of the world, Which have their portion in this life. Calvin: Whose portion is in life; Venema, Amesius, Edwards and Fry agree with our version; Geddes: Whose portion in life is permanent; Alexander: Their portion is in (this) life. Persecutors are often full of wealth. They have their good things before they reach eternity. They have the means of indulging their appetites. And so it is added of them, And whose belly thou fillest with thy hid treasure. The word treasure is not in the original. Instead of it Calvin reads Goods; Syriac, Arabic, Venema, Edwards and Hengstenberg, Treasures; Fry, Good things; Alexander, Hoard, corresponding to the Chaldee; Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic, Hidden things; Doway, Hidden stores; Diodati, Temporal things; Amesius and Jebb have Treasure. In the Hebrew the word rendered hidden is singular. The common version is good. Such men are often at the head of large families. They are full of children. The Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate: Their children are filled; Calvin: Their children are full of them [the goods]. In this view concur Venema, Amesius, Tholuck, Edwards and Fry. But Luther, Pool, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander give the sense of our version. Either is good. That of Calvin and others makes some variation in the meaning of the last word of the next clause: And leave the rest of their substance to their babes. If we read, Their children are filled, then the babes are the children's children of the men of the world, and so with Tholuck we say their "fulness of earthly goods is so great that not only is there enough for their children, but even a portion left for their grandchildren." The wealth of many godless men reaches to the third generation. This gives a fuller meaning than that suggested by the common version, and is well supported by authority.

15. As for me I will behold thy face in righteousness. Scarcely any clause of the Psalms is more uniformly rendered. I and in righteousness come together, i. e., I in a justified state and with a sanctified nature, I in righteousness shall behold thy face. This will be better than all the boasted wealth and pleasure and children of the wicked. The most persecuted and down-trodden servant of the Lord shall yet with all the tokens of a divine acceptance see God. This will produce blessedness indeed: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness. The verb shall be satisfied is the same as that found in v. 14, and there rendered are full. It is in the future in both cases, implying continuance. It is evidently used here to contrast the blessedness of the righteous with the fulness of the wicked. The word rendered likeness is also rendered image, similitude, Job iv. 16; Num. xii. 8, where it is promised to Moses, "The similitude of the LORD shall he behold." The sight of God is either by faith on earth, or by vision in heaven. Beholding as by a glass darkly the glory of the Lord on earth is a pledge of beholding his glory in the visions of immortality. I shall be satisfied with thy likeness, when I awake either every morning, and find myself with God, enjoying his favor and friendship, and so beholding him in his works of providence and grace; or as when one awakes from sleep, the emblem of death, I shall be delivered from these impending evils, and shall thus be assured of thy love; or above all, when I awake from my last sleep of death and in the glories of a resurrection state I shall see God face to face, then my discoveries of him shall bring everlasting satisfaction to my soul. For likeness some would substitute glory, presence, but the word means bright manifestation, visible appearance. Hengstenberg prefers form. But to give a good sense to us, form must be much varied from ordinary usage. Owen: "It is Christ alone, who is the likeness and image. When we awake in the other world with our minds purified and rectified, the beholding of him shall be always satisfying to us. There will be then no satiety, no weariness, no indispositions; but the mind being made perfect in all its faculties, powers and operations, with respect unto its utmost end, which is the enjoyment of God, is satisfied in the beholding of him forever."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. This Psalm, like many others, shows that all our devotions of a metrical or musical character need not, as some have asserted, be of the nature of praise and thanksgiving. We may sing of anything that belongs to a devotional frame of mind, though there be not a word of direct praise in it.

2. Justice in the character of any ruler, and especially in the Ruler of the universe, is an amiable attribute. Give any man the right in a controversy, which God is to decide, and he can have his cause in no better hands. He confidently cries, Hear the right, v. 1.

3. Because God is righteous, a good cause is sure finally to triumph, v. 1.

4. It is a great mistake, commonly committed by carnal men, to glory in the justice of their cause; and yet never to carry it before the tribunal of him, who alone executeth justice and judgment in the earth.

5. Cobbin: "Happy is he who can appeal to God for the integrity of his heart and actions. True devotion in prayer, an upright conscience, guarded words and temper, cautious and holy walking; these will allow of reflection, and afford sweet solace to the mind in the time of trouble."

6. A blessed privilege is prayer. Without it, what could the righteous do? The very goodness of his cause makes David bold in prayer, v. 1. Verse 9 proves that "the greater the terror, with which we are stricken by the cruelty of our enemies, the more ought we to be quickened in prayer." If we are wrong, we need forgiveness; if we are right, we still need protection. If we are prosperous, we should beg for caution and moderation; if we are afflicted, we should ask for support, sanctification and timely relief, v. 1.

7. Acceptable prayer must be fervent. Cold prayers are hypocritical. The repetition of David's prayer and his use of the word cry show how vehement were his desires, and how earnest his supplications, v. 1. All repetition in prayer is not vain.

8. Nor do we need refined speech in prayer. David's language is simple, v. 1. Calvin: "When we present ourselves before God, let us learn that it is not to be done with the ornaments of an artificial eloquence, for the finest rhetoric and the best grace, which we can have before him, is pure simplicity."

9. Prayer, and all acts of religious worship, demand sincerity, v. 1. Feigned lips are God's abhorrence. Compare Ps. lxvi. 18; John ix. 31. Luther: "We see how everywhere zeal and hatred break forth against hypocrisy, which the saints avoid with great horror."

10. It is not unusual for God to delay for a season the execution of justice, even in behalf of his people, v. 2. Delay is not refusal. He will come at the best time. "Shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him, though he bear long with them? I tell you, that he will avenge them speedily." Therefore "men ought always to pray and not to faint."

11. In the endurance of wrong and sorrow, we can do nothing better than to leave our cause with God, v. 2. Our afflictions are great miseries when they lead us from God, and not to God.

12. The whole of the divine character is approved by the righteous, and is a source of joy to him. David rejoices in the divine omniscience, v. 3. That attribute, if understood, terrifies the ungodly; but it gives great peace to the pious. Every good man begs for an examination by the all-searching eye. It is true that hypocrites may often appeal to the Searcher of hearts even when they are wrong; but they do it insincerely and profanely. If they really thought God was about to let men see them as he sees them, they would be filled with dismay.

13. That, which makes our trials too strong for us is our weakness. Were we all right, the more we were proved and tried, the more would our integrity appear, v. 3. "Every man is tempted, when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed." One may kindle a great fire on the ice, yet the river will not be burned up. But a spark will explode a magazine of gunpowder.

14. A good resolution is one of the means of preserving us. No man will be free from sins of heart, of tongue, or of life, unless he is purposed to avoid iniquity, v. 3.

15. Especially have all good men found it hard to keep clear of sins of the tongue, v. 3. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body. . . The tongue is a fire, a world of iniquity. . . It sets on fire the course of nature, and it is set on fire of hell. . . The tongue can no man tame; it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison."

16. Although in carnal contests one wrong generally provokes another; yet it never justifies it, v. 4. If ever personal vengeance could have been right, it was when Saul, the king, was persecuting David for his great public services. When Saul was in his power, David hurt not a hair of his head, but kept himself from the paths of the destroyer. "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." "Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves, but rather give place unto wrath." "The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God"—never did help a good cause.

17. Past supports and deliverances should make us humble and watchful, v. 5. If our weakness is our strength, as Paul teaches, surely our strength may become our weakness. Calvin: "Certainly the more any one excels in grace, the more ought he to be afraid of falling; for it is the usual policy of Satan to endeavor, even from the virtue and strength which God has given us, to produce in us carnal confidence, which may induce carelessness."

18. How often must our resort be to prayer, vv. 5-9. Often we can do nothing but pray, never can we do anything better, than to call upon God.

19. A blessed principle is confidence in God. Some lightly esteem it. The belief that his prayer would be heard kept David at the mercy-seat, crying for help, v. 6. Luther: "See how quickly affection makes an excellent orator. He recommends to God his cause in the most favorable light, he seeks to put himself on good terms with him, he makes complaint against his adversaries, he tries to have these made hateful, and this he does in very few and urgent words. But he does so, not as if these were necessary for God, in order that he might be prevailed on, but for the sake of faith. For the more vigorous and fervent our faith is, the more always does God work through it."

20. It is dreadful for a poor tempted or persecuted soul to lose sight of the divine mercy. Let him hope in God's marvellous loving-kindness, v. 7. Dickson: "The believer must hold his eye in times of dangers and straits especially upon God's good-will and kindness, as a counter-balance to all the malice of men." Great deliverances will never cease till the last of the redeemed reaches the rest above. Every successive saint is a wonder unto many.

21. Great difficulties arising from human perversity and malice are no novelty, v. 7. It is remarkable, too, that often the most gentle and the most tender spirits are thrown out on the most tempestuous seas. David and Jeremiah through all their youth showed unusual peaceableness of disposition, yet God made them men of contention, despite all their predilections. Yet it is one of the greatest blessings and ought to be sought by prayer that we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty.

22. Every inspired prayer contains a promise of good to the righteous. So the petitions of v. 8, are fulfilled in all the saints. Dickson: "The care God hath of his poor children that depend upon him is unspeakable; and the tender love he beareth unto them no one similitude can express. . . God's care of them is comparable to man's care of the apple of his eye; God's love to them is comparable to the love of the bird-mother toward her young ones, whom she warmeth, and hideth under the shadow of her wings." God's people are safe. Nothing can harm them.

23. The imagery of evil is all exhausted in giving an account of the character and conduct of bad men. They are fat and proud, boasting and vamping, v. 9. They are cunning hunters, fetching a compass. They are spies on God's people. They are lions and young lions, vv. 11, 12. Christ called Herod a fox. They are deadly enemies. Their hostility, if their hearts remain unchanged, will never cease. They are full of malice. Scott: "David's persecutors were prosperous, self-indulgent and luxurious; and thus they grew arrogant, impious, unfeeling and presumptuous." Persecutors of all ages are much alike.

24. God's people are as much under his care in time of siege, or when surrounded by foes, as at any other time, v. 11. At such seasons the most feeble child of God may sing: "The LORD is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid? When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear; though war should rise against me in this will I be confident." Beza mentions as many as six hundred remarkable deliverances wrought for him in the troublous days, in which he lived.

25. Wicked men are always wicked. Wickedness is their trade, their nature. The lion no more loves flesh and blood than do the wicked love sin, v. 12. Nor are they ever satisfied. They sin on.

26. When to the saints the peril is extreme, the deliverance is at hand, v. 13. "When danger is most nigh, God is more nigh." Nothing is easier than for God to bring to naught human devisings.

27. In afflictions it is a great thing to be able to acknowledge God as the author of our distresses, even though he employs men as instruments, vv. 13, 14. This was the support of the man of Uz, Job i. 20, 21. This quieted David in his sorrowful departure from Jerusalem in time of Absalom's rebellion, 2 Sam. xvi. 5-12. In like manner Eli received the dreadful tidings of the approaching death of his wicked sons: "It is the Lord," 1 Sam. iii. 18. He, who in affliction dwells much on second causes will have sorrow on sorrow. The wickedest men are but God's rod, and hand, and sword. They can do nothing except it be given them of God, John xix. 11. The ungodly are merely scourges.

28. Doleful is the case of the wicked. They have their portion in this life, v. 14. Their riches may leave them in a moment. The power of enjoying earthly things may go as soon. They may leave much to their descendants, but they cannot tell whether they will be wise men or fools, prudent or spendthrifts. Dodd: "We should look with pity at the bargain which men of the world have made for themselves, and tremble more at what they are to suffer hereafter, than be troubled for what they for the present enjoy. When we see men languishing in fevers and dropsies, we do not envy them the pleasure they have enjoyed in former riots and excesses; and when we see men wasted and faint in consumptions, or wore away by more noisome diseases, we do not envy them the pleasure of their former lusts and license."

29. The way to heaven is rough. Yet two things greatly support the saints. One is that they have many comforts and cordials by the way. Sometimes they have a blessed vision of God, v. 15. They walk with him and he shows them his covenant. The other is, they have a heaven to go to, and of that they have a blessed assurance in God's word, and a sure hope in their souls. Tholuck: "Wondrously enlightened by the Holy Ghost, David speaks with a clearness, which seems possible to Christian minds only, of the glories of heaven, where the struggle with sin shall be changed into perfect righteousness, faith into face-to-face vision, satiation with the divided goods of this life into satiation with the one perfect good, which renders everything besides unnecessary." How such a ray from the throne above pierces the darkness of this world!

PSALM XVIII.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, the servant of the LORD, who spake unto the LORD the words of this song in the day that the LORD delivered him from the hand of all his enemies, and from the hand of Saul: And he said,

- 1 I will love thee, O LORD, my strength.
- 2 The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer; my God, my strength, in whom I will trust; my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower.
- 3 I will call upon the LORD, who is worthy to be praised: so shall I be saved from mine enemies.
- 4 The sorrows of death compassed me, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid.
- 5 The sorrows of hell compassed me about: the snares of death prevented me.
- 6 In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried unto my God: he heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears.
- 7 Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because he was wroth.
- 8 There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it.
- 9 He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and darkness was under his feet.
- 10 And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.
- 11 He made darkness his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies.
- 12 At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, hail stones and coals of fire.
- 13 The LORD also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave his voice; hail stones and coals of fire.
- 14 Yea, he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.
- 15 Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebuke, O LORD, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.
- 16 He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters.
- 17 He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me: for they were too strong for me.
- 18 They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the LORD was my stay.
- 19 He brought me forth also into a large place; he delivered me, because he delighted in me.
- 20 The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.
- 21 For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have not wickedly departed from my God.
- 22 For all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me.
- 23 I was also upright before him, and I kept myself from mine iniquity.
- 24 Therefore hath the LORD recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight.

25 With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful; with an upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright;

26 With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure; and with the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward.

27 For thou wilt save the afflicted people; but wilt bring down high looks.

28 For thou wilt light my candle: the LORD my God will enlighten my darkness.

29 For by thee I have run through a troop; and by my God have I leaped over a wall.

30 As for God, his way is perfect: the word of the LORD is tried: he is a buckler to all those that trust in him.

31 For who is God save the LORD? or who is a rock save our God?

32 It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh ~~my~~ way perfect.

33 He maketh my feet like hinds' feet, and setteth me upon my high places.

34 He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms.

35 Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation: and thy right hand hath holden me up, and thy gentleness hath made me great.

36 Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip.

37 I have pursued mine enemies, and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed.

38 I have wounded them that they were not able to rise: they are fallen under my feet.

39 For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle: thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me.

40 Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies; that I might destroy them that hate me.

41 They cried, but there was none to save them: even unto the LORD, but he answered them not.

42 Then did I beat them small as the dust before the wind: I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets.

43 Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people; and thou hast made me the head of the heathen: a people whom I have not known shall serve me.

44 As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me; the strangers shall submit themselves unto me.

45 The strangers shall fade away, and be afraid out of their close places.

46 The LORD liveth; and blessed be my rock; and let the God of my salvation be exalted.

47 It is God that avengeth me, and subdueth the people unto me.

48 He delivereth me from mine enemies: yea, thou liftest me up above those that rise up against me: thou hast delivered me from the violent man.

49 Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O LORD, among the heathen, and sing praises unto thy name.

50 Great deliverance giveth he to his king; and sheweth mercy to his anointed, to David, and to his seed for evermore.

DAVID wrote this Psalm. See title, verses 43–50, and 2 Sam. xxii. where we have the whole with some variations. Tholuck regards the form of this song in the tenth book of Scripture as the original. Hengstenberg and Alexander think this the first conception.

No point of doctrine or of duty is affected by taking either view. The assertion that the variations between the two editions of this Psalm are owing to carelessness in transcription is wholly inadmissible. Much less can we admit with Tholuck that the form in Samuel owes its origin to verbal tradition.

The names of the Almighty in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God, El God, Eloah God and Gel-yohn Highest, on which respectively see above on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4, and below on v. 31; Ps. vii. 17.

This Psalm was composed late in the life of David, after he had obtained rest from all his enemies, among whom Saul was very prominent. Hengstenberg well calls it, "a great hallelujah, with which David retired from the theatre of life. . . In it the Psalmist thanks God, not for any single deliverance, but has throughout, before his eyes, a great whole of gracious administrations, an entire life rich with the experiences of the loving-kindness of God."

No Psalm affords a superior sample of the power and comprehensiveness of Hebrew poetry. Morison says, "In the most celebrated specimens of classic elegance and sublimity it has no equal."

Is this Psalm Messianic? For general views on this subject see Introduction, § 8. David doubtless speaks throughout of himself primarily, but then he is a type of Christ, and so the language has a secondary reference. Some able writers apply the whole Psalm to Christ. Kennicott speaks of it as containing "the Messiah's sublime thanksgivings," and says that "from New Testament quotations it is perfectly obvious that this Psalm breathes a prophetic spirit, and alludes to the Messiah; yet it is equally certain that its primary reference is to the literal David." Horne applies the whole "to the sufferings, resurrection, righteousness and conquests of Christ, to the destruction of the Jews, and conversion of the Gentiles." Calvin speaks more safely when he says that in this Psalm David "shows that his reign was an image and type of the kingdom of Christ, to teach and assure the faithful that Christ, in spite of the whole world, and of all the resistance which it can make, will, by the stupendous and incomprehensible power of the Father, be always victorious." Alexander says that the application of the promises "not merely to David as an individual, but to his posterity forever, thus including Christ, shows the whole composition to be one of those Messianic Psalms, in which he is the principal subject of the prophecy, though not the only one, nor even the one nearest to the eye of the observer." Morison goes so far as in the title to translate the word David, which signifies The Beloved. Also the word Saul (Sheol) he translates Hell. In this he agrees with Montanus and Horsley. Without adopting any extreme line of remark, it may be observed that sound commentators are unusually agreed in admitting that this Psalm has its highest fulfilment in Christ, the Son of David. They could hardly have admitted less, for it is twice quoted by Paul in application to Christ, Rom. xv. 9; Heb. ii. 13.

On the first clause, To the chief musician, see on title of Ps. iv. The words a Psalm in the title are properly supplied by our translators. The phrase, The servant of the Lord is not found in the title as given in 2 Sam. xxii. Neither is the phrase, To the chief musician. The reason is obvious. These phrases belong to poetry, not to history. The phrase, The servant of the Lord is also found in the title of Psalm xxxvi. Tholuck: "The term 'servant of God' is used either of any pious man, anxious to make the commandments of God the rule of his life, or of those who are called to specific services of God." In the former sense David calls himself "the servant of God," Ps. xix. 11, 13; 2 Sam. vii. 26; xix. 20; in the latter he is so called by others, Ps. lxxix. 3, 20. The apostles use the same language, Tit. i. 1; Jas. i. 1. The title is pretty uniformly rendered in ancient versions, except in the Syriac, which reads: Of David [a song.] A giving of thanks: and concerning the ascension of Christ; or as some have it, A thanksgiving upon the ascension of Christ. But this is interpretation, not translation. On vv. 28-32 Calvin says: "As to the tenses of the verbs, we would inform our readers once for all, that in this Psalm David uses the past and the future tenses indifferently, not only because he comprehends different histories, but also because he presents to himself the things of which he speaks as if they were still taking place before his eyes, and, at the same time, describes a continued course of the grace of God towards him."

1. I will love thee, O Lord, my strength. All the ancient versions except the Arabic put the verb love in the future. So do the great body of the best scholars. The original requires it. The love thus expressed has already begun and shall not fail. The word is nowhere rendered love except here. In Ps. ciii. 13 it describes the tender pity of a father. It seldom expresses human affections, but often divine pity, mercy, compassion. Calvin: I will affectionately love thee; Bythner: I will vehemently love thee; Venema: I will most tenderly love thee; Piscator, Amesius and Clarke: From my inmost bowels I will love thee; Ainsworth: I will dearly love thee; Patrick: I love thee with the most passionate and ardent affection; Street: I love thee exceedingly; Edwards: I dearly love thee; Fry: Much do I love thee; Pool: I will love thee most affectionately, and with my whole soul; Horne: With all the yearnings of affection I will love thee; Hengstenberg: Heartily do I love thee; Barker: I will dearly—heartily, with my inmost affections—love thee. The verb expresses more than mere friendship, even hearty, tender, constraining love; Cocceius says it “is to love with the strongest and deepest affections of the heart, with the moving of all the bowels.” The word rendered my strength is very expressive; Ainsworth: My firm strength. God is strength to his people in every sense, in which they can need strength. He supports them and gives them courage, success and establishment. This is easily accounted for because also,

2. The LORD is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer. The word rendered my rock is translated with much uniformity, yet it is once rendered strong-hold. The meaning is that the Lord is to his people for all the purposes of defence like those natural and impregnable hiding-places, where one man may repel the assault of a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight. Such are often mentioned in Scripture, especially in the history of David. Palestine abounded in such places. God is called the stone of Israel, Gen. xlix. 24. He is first called the Rock and the Rock of salvation in Deut. xxxii. 4, 15. After this the title is often given. In the Psalms it first occurs here; afterwards in Ps. xxxi. 3; xlii. 9, etc. It is true the word rendered stone in Gen. xlix. 24 is wholly different from that rendered rock in Deut. xxxii. 4, 15, and neither of these is the same as that used in this verse. But in the second clause of this verse we have the very word used in Deut. xxxii. although our version renders it strength. The generic idea running through all these three words in application to God is solidity, strength, unchangeableness. Rock and strength in this verse have the additional idea of fitness for a hiding-place. In Isa. xxxiii. 16 we have the munitions of rocks, where the same word here rendered rock is found. The next title given is that of fortress. The word occurs more than twenty times in the Hebrew Bible and is most commonly rendered fortress, fort, hold, strong place, strong-hold, defence. 2 Sam. v. 7, 9, 17; Job xxxix. 18; Ps. xxxi. 2; lxxi. 3. God is also a deliverer. The verb corresponding to the participle here found is used in Ps. xvii. 13 and also in v. 43 of this Psalm. There is no better rendering than deliverer, meaning one who causes us to escape, or who carries us away safely. See Ps. lxxi. 2; Isa. v. 29. David adds: Thou art my God, my strength, in whom I will trust. The word God is El, rendered by Aquila, My strong One. See on Ps. v. 4. Strength, the same that in Deut. xxxii. 4, 15 is rendered Rock. The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway instead of strength give helper; church of England, might; Hengstenberg, strong-hold; Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and Alexander, rock. In Scripture God often has this title. Strength here is not the same as in v. 1. In such a God and rock it is safe and wise to trust, to confide. David says God is also my buckler, and the horn of my salvation, and my high tower. Buckler here is shield in Ps. iii. 3, which see. In Ps. vii. 10 it is defence. The figure of the horn is borrowed from those animals whose horns are their protection. Luke i. 69. High tower, in Hebrew one word, in Ps. ix. 9 twice rendered refuge, also in Ps. xlii. 7, 11; xlviii. 3. In Ps. cxliv. 2 as here it is high tower, and in Isa. xxv. 12 high fort. It expresses a place wholly impregnable and inaccessible by human means, if the assailants are at all opposed.

3. I will call upon the LORD, who is worthy to be praised. The words who is worthy are not in the original. The Chaldee: In a hymn I pour out my prayers before the Lord; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: Praising I will call upon the Lord; Syriac: I will call on the Lord; Arabic and Luther: I will praise the Lord, and I will call upon him; Calvin and Amesius: I will call upon the praised Jehovah; Venema: Let him be praised, I have called on Jehovah; Edwards: Praised be Jehovah; I will call upon Jehovah; Jebb: With praise will I call upon God; Fry: I call upon Jehovah, the theme of my praise; Street: Singing praise, I invoke Jehovah; Hengstenberg: As on the glorious one, I will call upon the Lord; Alexander: To be praised I will call Jehovah. The sense is nowhere better given than in the common version. Alexander says, the word which we render worthy to be praised, "is a standing epithet of Jehovah in the lyrical style of the Old Testament." Ainsworth: Praised, that is, glorious, excellent, praiseworthy. It describes Jehovah, and not the state of the worshipper. Whoso comes to God as he should will not call in vain: So shall I be saved from mine enemies. The right kind of prayer is the most potent instrumentality known on earth. Every approach to God should be with adoring views and with thanksgiving, Job i. 21; Phil. iv. 6. No enemy, no number of enemies can resist Jehovah. If God be for us, who can be against us?

4. The sorrows of death compassed me. Sorrows, elsewhere lines, cords, bands, ropes, pangs, portions, and in the singular lot, company, destruction. The same word occurs in the next verse. It is generally though not uniformly rendered as here. The general sense is the same whether we read cords, sorrows, or pangs, only the figure is different. Calvin and others prefer cords. This represents death as a giant or conqueror binding his victim or as a hunter capturing his prey. Sorrows covers the whole case, including all the distresses that beset him. The Chaldee: "Trouble surrounded me as of a woman who sitteth in the birth, and hath no strength to bring forth; and she is in danger of death." And the floods of ungodly men made me afraid. Floods point to the number and violence of the enemies. The Hebrew word for ungodly men is Belial, a word long used to designate evil men, Deut. xiii. 13. It signifies worthlessness, wickedness, destruction, and so by ellipse bad men, i. e., men of a worthless, wicked, or destructive character. Morison: "The term Belial expresses whatever is malevolent in purpose, or cruel and ungodly in action;" Gesenius would read: Floods of destruction. The Septuagint has it, Torrents of iniquity, meaning iniquity as acted out by wicked men. The verb in this clause is in the future, David in imagination conceiving himself as not yet fully delivered.

5. The sorrows of hell compassed me about. On the word sorrows see the preceding verse. The verb compassed is first used in Josh. vi. 3, 7. It there describes the act of surrounding a city to destroy it. It is also found in Ps. vii. 7; xvii. 11. It is not the same word as that rendered compassed in v. 4, which is always so rendered, but is not often used and almost without exception in poetical compositions. The word rendered hell is sheol. See above on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17; xvi. 10. He adds: The snares of death prevented me. Snares also rendered gins, traps, not before found in the Psalms, though several times hereafter, also several times in the Pentateuch. Prevented, found in Ps. xvii. 13. It recurs in v. 18. In our version it commonly signifies prevent, meet, go before, come before. The Chaldee has it beset; Arabic, caught; church of England and Jebb, overtook; Edwards and Hengstenberg, surprised; Amesius, met; Venema, rushed upon; Fry, encompassed; Alexander, encountered. The sense of vv. 4, 5 is that he had been in extreme peril, that his enemies were mighty, many and cunning, and had done their work so skilfully as to beget just and distressing fears. The work of ruin was nearly accomplished. What then?

6. In my distress I called upon the LORD, and cried unto my God. The variation in the rendering here is chiefly in the tense of the verb. The preterite of our version is supported by the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin, Venema and Fry. But the Chaldee, Amesius and Hengstenberg use the present tense call and cry; the church of England and Alexander render literally, and use the future, will call [or invoke] and will cry. This last is to be preferred, if the right view was given of v. 4, i. e., that David is here poetically speaking of himself as still in the midst of his perils. Distress, in Ps. ix. 9, trouble. Called, the same as in Ps. iv. 1, 3; in Ps. iii. 4 it is cried. Cried, uniformly cried, cried out, cried aloud, shouted. It expresses vehemence. Nor was his cry in vain. He heard my voice out of his temple, and my cry came before him, even into his ears. The tenses of the verbs here are the same as in the first clause of the verse. The variations of the rendering are the same. The hearing of prayer is no new thing. God delights to hear cries, which come to him "out of the depths." Temple, the same as in Ps. v. 7, on which see. It may point either to the tabernacle where the ark abode, or to heaven itself. The latter gives the higher sense. The earthly temple was a type of the heavenly. The more exalted God is, the greater is his condescension, and the more glorious his power in saving his afflicted.

From the beginning of v. 7 to the end of v. 15 may be found some of the boldest and sublimest imagery known even in the poetry of the Hebrews.

Some indeed have supposed that David here describes certain astounding exhibitions of divine power in his own behalf, but Calvin correctly says that "David does not relate this as a piece of history, or as what had actually taken place, but he employs these similitudes for the purpose of removing all doubt, and for the greater confirmation of faith as to the power and providence of God." The imagery employed is well suited to the purpose the prophet had in view. That is, he declares that God as manifestly delivered him as if he had wrought these great effects in nature.

7. Then the earth shook and trembled. The earth, as in Gen. i. 1, commonly so rendered. There is a remarkable resemblance between the Hebrew words rendered shook and trembled. To preserve it, or give some idea of it, Jebb and Alexander read, did shake and quake. The foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because he was wroth. The word rendered hills is in Gen. vii. 20; Ps. xlv. 2, and in many other places rendered mountains. Our English Bible does not regard the modern distinction between hill and mountain. In Deut. xxxii. 22 we first meet with the phrase, foundations of the mountains, or hills. Instead of he was wroth, Jebb reads wrath was with him. God's power can easily convulse the whole frame of nature.

8. There went up a smoke out of his nostrils, and fire out of his mouth devoured. Calvin: "David compares the mists and vapors which darken the air to the thick smoke which a man sends forth from his nostrils when he is angry." Some have thought that the reference was to furious beasts, whose breath is like smoke, especially when excited. A still better basis of the figure in the first two clauses is perhaps found in Ex. xix. 18: "And Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the LORD descended upon it in fire." Coals were kindled by it, i. e., by the fire out of his mouth. The most prodigious effects are produced by the divine anger.

9. He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and darkness was under his feet. Luther: "When there is a clear heaven the clouds are high; but when a storm comes one feels as if it pushed against the roof;" Calvin: "When dense vapors occupy the middle of the air, the clouds seem to us to come down and to lie upon our heads;" Alexander: "The scene seems here to be transferred from heaven to earth." For bowed, Fry has lowered; for darkness, the Chaldee has a dark cloud; Calvin, thick darkness; Ainsworth, gloomy darkness, myrke; Alexander, gloom. Our version renders the same word thick darkness in eight instances, Ex. xx. 21; Deut. iv. 11; v. 22; 1 Kings viii. 12; 2 Chron. vi. 1; Job xxxviii. 9; Joel ii. 2; Zeph. i. 15. It is not the usual word for darkness. It occurs in the Bible fifteen times. The whole imagery is well explained by Ex. xix. 16, and Deut. v. 22. This mode of manifesting himself fills God's friends with awful though salutary fear, Heb. xii. 21; but it strikes terror and dismay into his foes. Michaelis: "That the wicked might not perceive his serene countenance, but only the terrible signs of his severe anger, and of his punishment."

10. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway put cherub in the plural, cherubim. The word is supposed by some to be derived from a Syriac word signifying that which is great, strong, powerful. We first read of cherubim in Gen. iii. 24. Diodati and Ainsworth by Cherubim understand Angels. This name is given to the two figures that stood over the mercy-seat, Ex. xxv. 18-20. Ainsworth supposes that in 1 Chron. xxviii. 18, Cherubim are called a chariot. The fullest account we have of cherubim is in Ezek. x. These heavenly beings are creatures, full of life, possessed of great swiftness and strength and courage. The sound of their wings was as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaketh. Some have suggested that the word may signify a guard or keeper, others, a courser of the sky, others, a minister. The cherubim which stood over the mercy-seat were figures between which the Shechinah rested, and so God is often said to dwell between the cherubim. "They are the lively, swift, courageous, watchful ministers of Jehovah. They are the swift chariots of God. Yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind. Maimonides says it was the cherub, that did fly. But see Ps. civ. 3. The change of one letter in the Hebrew verb would make this clause read as it does in 2 Sam. xxii. 11: He was seen upon the wings of the wind. Representing God as moving in a swift cloud is not unusual in Scripture, Isa. xix. 1. Several critics notice with pleasure the remarkable version of Sternhold and Hopkins:

"On cherub and on cherubim
Full royally he rode;
And on the wings of mighty winds
Came flying all abroad."

11. He made darkness his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters and thick clouds of the skies. The Chaldee has: "He placed his majesty in the darkness, and his glory was encompassed with clouds as a pavilion; and he made the rain of kindness to descend on his people, and mighty waters from the agitation of the clouds to fall upon the wicked from the height of the world." For secret place Edwards and Waterland have covert; Street:

He made darkness his covering,
That which compassed him, his pavilion,
Watery darkness in clouds of the sky.

The idea is the same as that presented in the preceding verse; Alexander: "The two nouns in the last clause both mean clouds, but the second is used only in the plural, and seems properly to designate the whole body of vapors constituting the visible heavens or sky." Thick clouds occurs again in v. 12. It is sometimes rendered simply cloud, or clouds, as in Ps. civ. 3; Isa. lx. 8. A pavilion is a tent, or tabernacle, or booth.

12. At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, hail stones and coals of fire. Brightness, commonly so translated, but sometimes shining, clear shining, light; Edwards: At the splendor before him, his thick clouds dispersed, and hail, and coals of fire; Fry: By the glare of the lightning his clouds were unfolded, they dropped down the hail, with balls of fire; Alexander: From the blaze before him his clouds passed—hail and coals of fire. Verse 11 presented God as withdrawn from view and hidden in thick darkness. Here he lets us see his power in the lightning. Luther: "It is a description of lightning. When he pleases, he rends the clouds asunder, and darts forth a flash such as the clouds cannot restrain; it breaks through just as if there were no clouds there. . . The whole heaven, as it were, opens when there is lightning." A frequent effect of lightning is cold and hail. So we have the heavens in a blaze, and at the same time dropping down ice. God has often plagued his foes with hail-stones and fire, Ex. ix. 24, 25; Josh. x. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 47, 48; cv. 32; Hag. ii. 17.

13. The LORD also thundered in the heavens. Thunder is the report of lightning. Though God employs natural causes in the production of storms, yet he produces them. In the next clause it is added, And the Highest gave his voice. The thunder is God's voice, 1 Sam. vii. 10; Job xxxvii. 5; xl. 9; Ps. civ. 7. On Most High see on Ps. vii. 17. Thunder is followed by hail stones and coals of fire. More lightning produced more hail, and as the storm continued, the lightning shot forth its fiery balls in every direction. This is expressed in other words:

14. Yea, he sent out his arrows and scattered them; and he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them. The arrows and the lightnings in this verse are the same. Lightnings are God's arrows. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin and Fry: Multiplied his lightnings; Jebb: His lightnings he showered; Clarke: He shot out lightnings; Alexander: He shot forth his lightnings; Edwards: He darted lightnings; Street: He darted many lightnings; Hengstenberg: He sent out much lightning; Venema: He scattered his lightnings more thickly; Clarke thinks that the very sound of the Hebrew words corresponds with the crash and terror of a fearful storm. The same has often been noticed in other languages in the words used for thunder and lightning. The effect of God's arrows or lightnings was to scatter and discomfit David's foes. Calvin: "The import of his words is, Whosoever does not acknowledge that I have been preserved by the hand of God, may as well deny that it is God who thunders from heaven, and abolish his power which is manifested in the whole order of nature, and especially in those wonderful changes which we see taking place in the atmosphere."

15. Then the channels of waters were seen, and the foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebuke, O LORD, at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils. There is considerable uniformity in rendering this verse, except that for channels, Calvin has sources; Edwards, streams; Fry, depths; the Septuagint, those who follow it and Venema, fountains; Hengstenberg, brooks. But Amesius, Jebb and Alexander agree with our version. Calvin and Morison suppose there is an allusion to the miracle at the Red sea: q. d., God as certainly and manifestly delivered me as he did Israel escaping from the Egyptians, when he laid bare the channels of the sea, and exposed the foundations of the world. This seems to be a better interpretation, than that which supposes the Psalmist to represent himself as buried in deep waters, as in Ps. cxliv. 7, where he prays, Deliver me out of great waters. And yet this latter view is well supported by the context immediately succeeding.

16. He sent from above, he took me, he drew me out of many waters. It is not said precisely how God sent from heaven, whether merely by the awful agencies of storm, and thunder, and lightning, or by the ministry of angels. The latter well coincides with inspired teachings, Heb. i. 14. He sent by whom he would. Pool: "He sent angels or assistance otherwise." He took. God's grasp cannot be broken. None can pluck his chosen out of his hand. The verb drew out, evidently alludes to Moses, which signifies, drawn out of the water, Ex. ii. 10; Ainsworth: The word is used nowhere else. In Scripture waters signify troubles, or people. The ancient versions, together with Calvin, Venema, Fabritius and Edwards, use the past tense in the verbs here as in our version; Amesius, Brent, Hengstenberg and Fry prefer the present; while Jebb and Alexander follow the original, and give the future. See Introduction, § 6. Doubtless the acts described by these futures were in fact past at the time this Psalm was composed.

17. He delivered me from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me: for they were too strong for me. The remarks respecting tense in the preceding verse apply here also, the original of the first verb being in the future. Delivered, the same verb (though in a different tense) as that found in the title and in v. 48. David's enemies were neither few, nor weak, nor mild. They had malice and power. Clarke thinks that David here specially refers to the facts stated in 2 Sam. xxi. 16, 17. But David was often marvellously delivered. Patrick's paraphrase is: "He delivered me first from that mighty giant Goliath, and then from Saul, whose power I was not able to withstand; and afterwards from the Philistines and Syrians, and many other nations, whose forces were far superior unto mine, and whose hatred instigated them to do all they could to destroy me."

18. They prevented me in the day of my calamity: but the Lord was my stay. Prevented, the same as in v. 5, but here it is in the future. See Ps. xvii. 13, where it is rendered disappoint. Calamity always so rendered, or destruction. Alexander prefers a more literal rendering: They will encounter me in the day of my calamity, and Jehovah has been for a stay to me. He supposes that David anticipates new assaults and encourages himself by past experiences. But the great mass of commentators agree with our version. Even Jebb puts the first verb in the past tense. Several refer to 1 Sam. xxiii. xxiv. as containing the history here specially referred to. Walford: "They set their faces against me in the day of my calamity." Stay is always so rendered in our version. The word means prop, support. Chaldee: The word of the Lord was my stay.

19. He brought me forth also into a large place. To be in a narrow place, in a tight place, in a strait is a figure common to many languages, and expresses great distress. To be brought out into a large, wide, or spacious place is to have deliverance, to be rescued, so as to have freedom and safety, and be exempt from perplexity; see Ps. xxxi. 8. He delivered me, because he delighted in me. Delivered, elsewhere loosed, drew out, in this form always rendered by the verb deliver. In Hebrew it is in the future. Alexander prefers that rendering, as in our version in Ps. l. 15; xci. 15. Fry translates it in the present, delivereth, as in our version of Ps. xxxiv. 7. Probably a majority of versions agree with ours in preferring the past. Because he delighted in me, by some rendered he loved me, had a good will to me, was inclined to me, was well pleased with me. God has a complacential love to all who walk uprightly.

20. The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness; according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me. It is common to consider this and the four following verses together. They do certainly relate to the same matter. Some have thought that such language could in no sense be applied to any who has lived on earth since the fall, except the man Christ Jesus. But surely God will "hear the right" even between man and man. "Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne." Several ancient versions and Alexander follow the original and put both verbs in the future; Syriac, Fry and Hengstenberg use the present tense; but the large majority agree with our version. Rewarded, in Ps. xiii. 6; cxvi. 7; in the preterite rendered hath dealt bountifully. The uprightness of God's servants is the occasion of great blessings. The cause is found in his infinite excellence. Recompensed, elsewhere rendered returned, rewarded, requited, brought back, restored.

The principle involved here is the same so fully asserted in vv. 25, 26, and in Gal. vi. 7, 8.

21. For I have kept the ways of the LORD, and have not wickedly departed from my God. Good men are as slow to confess sins of which they are not guilty, as they are ready to acknowledge their real faults. David's enemies accused him of "rebellion and treason, plunder and robbery, sedition, cruelty and many flagitious actions." Of all these charges he declares himself innocent. God had put him in the way of rising to the throne, and he left his cause with God without taking any wicked measures to effect the result. The last verb employed in this verse denotes "not one fall only, but a revolt or defection, which utterly removes and alienates man from God." A fall is not an apostasy.

22. For all his judgments were before me, and I did not put away his statutes from me. In this place, as in Ps. xix. 9, and sometimes elsewhere, by judgments is to be understood authoritative decisions. To make the word here signify punishments, or alarming events of providence gives a poor sense. By statutes we are to understand the precepts of the whole law of God under which David lived. David devoutly studied, and habitually lived by the only infallible rule, and so proves his righteousness and the cleanness of his hands. There seems to be no sufficient reason for making judgments refer to the second table of the law, and statutes to the first.

23. I was also upright before him, and I kept myself from mine iniquity. Calvin: "All the verbs in this verse are put by David in the future tense, I will be upright, etc., because he does not speak confidently of one act only, or of a good work performed by fits and starts, but of steady perseverance in an upright course." For the signification of upright, see on Ps. xv. 2. To be upright before God, or with God is not merely to be sincere in his sight, but undefiled in his way. It is not the phrase found in Ex. xx. 3, and rendered before me, before my face. David was sorely tempted and vexed. Saul had been in his power; but he refrained from taking his own cause into his own hands. He resisted all inducements to do wrong to his enemies.

24. Therefore hath the Lord recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his eyesight. Recompensed, righteousness and cleanness of hands, the same as in v. 20. This is a repetition, after argument, of what was there stated to be true, but was not yet proven. All this particular history prepares the way for the general proposition laid down in several forms in the next verse, viz.: that God deals with men very much after the manner of their own acts.

25. With the merciful thou wilt shew thyself merciful. Merciful, elsewhere rendered holy, Ps. lxxxvi. 2; godly, Ps. iv. 3; and in the plural saints, Ps. xxx. 4. Hengstenberg: Toward the pious thou art pious; Alexander: With the gracious thou wilt show thyself gracious; Edwards: With the beneficent man thou behavest thyself beneficently; Venema, almost the same; Fry: With the tender thou wilt show thyself tender; Septuagint, Vulgate and Doway: With the holy thou wilt be holy; Syriac: With the pure thou wilt be pure; Arabic: With the innocent thou wilt be innocent. Though in our version some of these words are never given as a correct rendering of the original, yet all the above propositions are true. The doctrine taught is often asserted in Scripture, Matt. v. 7. The converse is also true, James ii. 13. The same principle extends to the three succeeding clauses. With an upright man thou wilt shew thyself upright. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: With the innocent man thou wilt be innocent; Arabic: With the honest thou wilt be honest; Syriac: With the simple thou wilt deal in simplicity; Venema: To the man of integrity thou art accustomed to show thyself uncorrupted; Jebb: With the man of perfectness thou wilt be perfect; Alexander: With the perfect man thou wilt show thyself perfect; Fry: With the perfect man thou showest thy perfections; or, With the plain, honest, simple man, thou dealest with simplicity; or, With the man that was perfectly or wholly with thee, thou wilt show thyself to be wholly with him. For the various shades of meaning given in our version to upright, see on Ps. xv. 2.

26. With the pure thou wilt shew thyself pure. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate and Doway: With the elect thou wilt be elect; Jebb: With the clean thou wilt be clean; Fry: With the true thou showest thyself true; Pool: "Purity is often put for sincerity." The same principle extends to the wicked. And with the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward. In 2 Sam. xxii. 27, it is, With the froward thou wilt show thyself unsavory. The word first rendered froward is always so rendered, or it is translated perverse or crooked. Most of the ancient versions, Calvin, Edwards and Hengstenberg prefer perverse; Fry: With the politic thou showest thy policy; or, With the crooked thou showest thyself to be tortuous; Jebb: With the froward thou wilt wrestle; Alexander: With the crooked thou wilt show thyself perverse, Judges i. 7. Any course of divine justice will bring certain, righteous and amazing ruin on the incorrigibly wicked. When Jehovah shall arise, they will find that he is to them a more terrible enemy than the most perverse of all their earthly foes, though he swerve not from perfect truth and rectitude. It could not be otherwise.

27. For thou wilt save the afflicted people. Afflicted, elsewhere rendered meek, poor, humble, lowly. It is God's nature and plan to grant deliverance to them that are poor, meek, lowly. His past deeds show what he will ever do. In effecting such deliverances the wicked must often perish, and so it is added: But [thou] wilt bring down high looks. God resisteth the proud. He hates pride in any. He will correct it in his people and punish it in his foes. He will bring down high looks. He that exalteth himself, whether saint or sinner, shall be abased; but he that humbleth himself shall be exalted.

28. For thou wilt light my candle. From the earliest ages darkness has been the emblem of distress and perplexity, and light the emblem of comfort, of knowledge of the right way, and of the favor of God. A candle [or lamp] gives light; so several times in Job as here also it is used to express the above blessings. In 2 Sam. xxii. 29 it is, For thou art my lamp. God is a light to his people, when he causes light to arise unto them in darkness. The LORD my God will enlighten my darkness. The truth taught is the same as in the first clause, though it is differently expressed.

29. For by thee I have run through a troop; and by my God I have leaped over a wall. Of the events here noticed we know nothing beyond the simple statement here and in 2 Sam. xxii. 30, unless the latter clause refers to 2 Sam. v. 7. This boasting is not idle. It is in God, 1 Cor. xv. 10; 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10; Phil. iv. 13. Luther: "In confidence on thee I am terrified at no assault, contend against all kinds of enemies, leap over walls, and whatever else is opposed to me; that is, I who in myself am weak shall be invincible in thee." In God is better than by God. To leap over a wall may have been to escape a foe, or to capture a fortress. The Chaldee: By the word of my God I shall subdue fortified towns; Hammond: By my God I have taken a fort. In the Hebrew the verbs are in the future.

30. As for God his way is perfect. God, El as in Ps. v. 4. God's way is perfectly just, perfectly wise, perfectly holy, perfectly good, perfectly sure to prevail, perfectly honorable to himself, perfectly safe to his people. It sometimes looks dark or doubtful, because we see not the end. When that comes all is right. Perfect, also rendered in our version upright, Ps. xv. 2; vv. 23, 25. The word of the LORD is tried. Tried, some render it fire-tried, purified, most pure, refined, free from dregs. Some suppose there is special reference to God's word of promise. But all his word has been thoroughly tried ten thousand times, and always like pure gold was none the worse for the severity of the trial. It never has failed, though tried in times both of peace and of peril, by old and by young, for comfort, support, guidance, deliverance and glory. See REMARKS on Ps. xii. 6. He is a buckler to all those that trust in him. Buckler, the same in v. 2. In v. 35, and in Ps. iii. 3, it is shield; in Ps. vii. 10, defence.

31. For who is God save the LORD? Here first in the Psalms occurs the name Eloah, rendered God. It occurs more than fifty times in the Scriptures, but only four times in the Psalms. It is the singular of Elohim. Many have supposed that this name specially refers to God as an object of religious worship. That idea may well be prominent in this place. He adds: Or who is a rock save our God? On God considered as a rock, see on v. 2.

32. It is God that girdeth me with strength, and maketh my way perfect. God El. See on Ps. v. 4. Both here and in v. 30, Alexander instead of God has Almighty. We need no stronger girdle. Almightiness can protect any man in any circumstances. David delights in often stating that his deliverances were from God. From the same source comes the blessing that our way is perfect. Perfect, the same in Hebrew as in v. 30, on which see. Without God nothing is strong, nothing holy, nothing finished, nothing successful, nothing perfect.

33. He maketh my feet like hinds' feet. The hind or female deer, is wonderfully active and nimble, can leap a great distance, and run with great swiftness, and though naturally timid, yet, when excited to contend, is a formidable enemy, fighting with the fore feet. The reference here is to the swiftness of this animal. Hengstenberg: "In the Egyptian paintings, the hind is the image of fleetness." The swiftness here claimed by David was not used merely for flight, but also for attack, 2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8; Hab. iii. 19. God who does these things does more. He setteth me upon my high places. High places always so rendered except once, where it is heights. This word not only designates generally all eminences as hills and mountains, but it points out particularly high positions, that are made strong by nature or art, the fastnesses of a country, the strong-holds of a land. David here asserts that he is quite beyond the reach of his foes.

34. He teacheth my hands to war, so that a bow of steel is broken by mine arms. According to Scripture everything skilfully done in the arts of peace or war is ascribed to divine teaching, Gen. x. 9; Ex. xxxi. 2-5; Ps. cxliv. 1. The word rendered steel occurs ten times, and is thrice rendered steel and seven times brass. Clarke: "A bow of steel is out of the question. In the days of David it is not likely that the method of making steel was known. The method of making brass out of copper was known at a very early period of the world; and the ancients had the art of hardening it, so as to work it into the most efficient swords." Is not this learned author probably mistaken? Our translators are not apt to impute to the ancients a knowledge which they did not have. They thrice give us the word steel. The art of converting iron into steel is as well understood far in the interior of Africa as at Sheffield. Brass has very little elasticity in it and would be of little use in making bows. And while the ancients could indeed make brass, yet where is the evidence that they could make it equal to steel? It is admitted that they could give to copper a temper equal to that of a Damascus blade. But the proof that they could do the same with brass is not before the public. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Arabic and Syriac read: Thou hast placed or strengthened my arms like a brazen bow; Horsley follows this; Chaldee: Thou hast given me my arms as a bow of steel; Calvin and Amesius prefer steel; Venema, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer brass; Ainsworth is satisfied with either brass or steel; Pool's paraphrase is: "My strength is sufficient, not only to bend a bow of steel, but to break it;" Diodati: "This seems to be understood of David's admirable strength, 1 Sam. xvii. 35." Street has it: "Making mine arms of the stiffness of brass." To bend a strong bow without the aid of the feet required great strength. But to break it required prodigious muscular power. The rendering and sense of our version are probably to be preferred.

35. Thou hast also given me the shield of thy salvation. On the word shield see v. 30. God's protection is unfailing. His shield always secures deliverance. It is none the less sure because bestowed on those who deserve no good thing. It is given to his people. And thy right hand hath holden me up. Omnipotence can make a worm as strong as an angel, and none, who are upheld by God's right hand, can fall. And thy gentleness hath made me great. The word rendered gentleness is elsewhere translated humility, meekness, Pr. xv. 33; Zeph. ii. 3. Calvin reads thy clemency; Venema, thy all-sufficiency; Edwards, thy answering me; Street, thy kindness; Fry, thy aid or help; Horsley, thy humiliation; Hengstenberg, thy lowliness; Cobbin and Alexander, thy condescension. The Septuagint reads, Thy discipline has corrected me. If Christ, who was meek and lowly, was so perfectly like the Father, that he who had seen the Lord had seen the Father, then Jehovah is meek and lowly, lenient, gentle and condescending. Just such God proves himself to be in all his word, by all his dispensations to his chosen. It is this patience, forbearance, clemency and condescension of God, that make great and good men all that they are. Otherwise they would be ruined.

36. Thou hast enlarged my steps under me, that my feet did not slip. The leading idea has been several times expressed. The form of it is often found in Scripture. Gen. ix. 27; Isa. liv. 2. "Enlargement and deliverance" properly go together, v. 19; Esth. iv. 14. The enlarging of the steps, or place of standing gave a firmness and courage which nothing could shake. His feet slipped not; Calvin: staggered not. David had often clambered among the precipitous cliffs of Judea, where he had but small foot-hold, a fit emblem of the peril he was in. But now he has a plain, open path, and his standing is secure. Hengstenberg, instead of feet did not slip, reads ankles fail not; this is no improvement.

37. I have pursued mine enemies and overtaken them: neither did I turn again till they were consumed. For a long time it seemed as if David could never sit on the throne of Israel, yet how utterly and how suddenly his enemies lost their power, and how perfect was his victory. Some prefer the future in this and the next verse in accordance with the original, thinking it gives a better sense, i. e., expresses confidence for the future drawn from past experiences. This may be so, but the sense in our version is good. David not only gained a victory, but it was complete.

38. I have wounded them that they were not able to rise; they are fallen under my feet. For wounded Calvin has afflicted or smitten; Hengstenberg, dash in pieces; Edwards, crush them to pieces. They were effectually and utterly disabled and disarmed; yea, as enemies they were extinct. He wished them no lower. Like the mire of the street, they were under his feet. The reason for such perfect success is next given:

39. For thou hast girded me with strength unto the battle, [or war]. Venema: Thou hast girded me with warlike courage. David would arrogate to himself nothing. All his strength and success were of God. On this he insists also in the next clause: Thou hast subdued under me those that rose up against me. For subdued Calvin has bowed down; Edwards, bringest down. Cast down gives the exact idea.

40. Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies; that I might destroy them that hate me. When God fights against men, what can they do? There is some doubt whether neck or back is the best rendering. The original word is rendered both ways. See Ex. xxiii. 27; Is. xlviii. 4. The import is clear. David had his enemies completely in his power, even to their destruction. They were routed and so turned the backs; he could take their lives and so had their necks.

41. They cried, but there was none to save them: even unto the LORD, but he answered them not. Hengstenberg's rendering is very concise: They cry, but there is no helper, to the Lord, but he does not hear them. Some suppose they cried first to idols, and, not succeeding, they cried to Jehovah. But the structure of the sentence and the history of the opposition to David's accession to the throne do not require such a view. Men may maintain any form of worship to the true God, and may pray very earnestly, yet so long as they are warring against God's counsels and righteousness they cry in vain. God cannot, will not deny himself. Denial of such petitions preferred to him is wholly consistent with the tenor of Scripture, Prov. i. 24-28; Is. lxxv. 12-15; Jer. vii. 13-16; Zech. vii. 13.

42. Then did I beat them small as the dust before the wind; I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets. John Rogers' translation: I wyll beate them as small as the dust claye in the winde, I wyll cast them out as the claye in the stretes; Bishop's Bible: I will beat them as small as the dust before the winde: I will cast them out as the clay in the streetes; Genevan translation: Then I did beate them as small as the dust before the winde: I did tread them flat as the clay in the streetes. Hengstenberg thinks the sense of the first clause is, Their crushing is only a sort of pastime to me; and of the second, I have as little respect for them, I use as little ceremony with them as with the offscourings which one treads upon. Perhaps it would be better to employ the future in rendering the verbs of this verse, as do many ancient and modern translations. Like several other verses of this Psalm this never had its complete fulfilment in David. It points to Christ.

43. Thou hast delivered me from the strivings of the people; and thou hast made me the head of the heathen: a people whom I have not known shall serve me. This verse cannot have its complete fulfilment except in Christ. The best sense is probably obtained by rendering all the verbs in the future, thus expressing confidence gathered from promises and past successes. "The people" here spoken of are his own people, the people of Israel, in whose contentions he would often have perished but for God's timely and merciful interpositions. Before David's accession to the throne his country had been greatly harassed and oppressed; but on becoming king, he destroyed the power of the adjacent nations, making many of them tributary. So great was David's success that some, quite remote from Judea, felt and acknowledged his power. See 2 Sam. viii. throughout, as explanatory of the latter clauses of this verse. Verses 9-12 specially explain the last clause.

44. As soon as they hear of me, they shall obey me. The fame of David's successes, like that of other great captains, saved him many a battle. Nothing in the form of human influence is more potent than the prestige of great conquerors. One has it, "As soon as the fame of my name reaches their ears, they shall obey me." The strangers shall submit themselves unto me. There is an evident allusion here to Deut. xxxiii. 29, "Thine enemies shall be found liars (shall feign) unto thee." See also Ps. lxxvi. 3; lxxxv. 15, where the same word is used. Abenezra, followed by Munster and Edwards, explains these words: "They who before gloried and boasted of their great courage and valor, and of their future victory over me, as they vainly promised themselves, are found to be liars, when they submit to me; or, they lie to me." Mudge, followed by many others: "They fawn, sneak and disguise the real sentiments of the heart, profess a most profound respect and submission, though at the same time within they retain their enmity." Calvin: "They shall be humbled after a slavish manner." Hengstenberg thinks it expresses "an external and constrained obedience," so that "the fear awakened overcame the strongest aversion." For the strangers Calvin has the children of strangers; Hengstenberg, the sons of the stranger; Edwards, the sons of the foreigners; Alexander, the sons of outland. The same phrase is found at the beginning of verse

45. The strangers shall fade away. Fade away in Ps. i. 3; xxxvii. 2, wither; in

Isa. i. 30; Jer. viii. 13; Ezek. xlvii. 12, fade. Sometimes it is rendered act foolishly, come to naught, be lightly esteemed, Pr. xxx. 32; Job xiv. 18; Deut. xxxii. 15. The meaning is, They shall lose their power before David, as a plant in a dry place withers before a scorching sun. And be afraid out of their close places. Calvin: Tremble out of their places of concealment; Edwards: Tremble in their strong-holds; Fry: Delivered themselves up from their strong-holds; Alexander: Tremble out of their enclosures; Horne: They shall come trembling from their strong-holds, as places not able to protect them, therefore they shall sue for peace. A fortress is no defence when God weakens the hearts and hands of those who hold it. The cause of all this success to David, and of failure to his foes is next given, vv. 46-50.

46. The LORD liveth. Jehovah is not dead, as the gods of the heathen are. No. He has life in himself. He alone hath independent immortality. No marvel then that he only doeth wonders. There seems to be no good reason for the rendering preferred though not insisted on by Calvin, Let Jehovah live. Nor does there seem to be any intended allusion to the form of the Hebrew oath, As the Lord liveth. David is accounting for his victories. He adds, And blessed be my rock. Rock, see on v. 2, where the same word occurs. Calvin renders it strength, meaning thereby him who gives strength. The word blessed here is not the same as in Ps. i. 1. It does not mean, Let God be happy, but, Let him be praised. The verb is the same used in Ps. lxvi. 8; lxviii. 26; xcvi. 2, where it is rendered bless. He adds, And let the God of my salvation be exalted. Hengstenberg, following the German fondness for compound words, prefers My salvation-God. This is not idiomatic English. Alexander says the phrase designates God, of whom it is one essential character that he is a Saviour. The original is striking. To exalt God is to extol him, to praise his name, to ascribe to him the excellence and wonders, which are his due, and so to make him high, not in himself, but in the esteem of his creatures. Like his nature his works are full of marvellous loving-kindness.

47. It is God that avengeth me. God, original El. The Mighty, the Almighty, God who is might. To avenge is to do justice in behalf of one. This commonly implies terrible retribution on the wrong-doer. God, who had given David a throne, in coming to which he was greatly wronged, was now doing him ample justice by the overthrow of his enemies. This was manifestly the work of God and none other. And subdueth the people unto me. The people, plural, peoples. It includes all the nations, who had annoyed him. The same word in the singular is found in Ps. iii. 6. Jehovah is the God of battles. He lifts up one and puts down another.

48. He delivereth me from mine enemies. Delivereth, in v. 2 rendered deliverer. Another form of the same verb is found in v. 43, hast delivered. Enemies, the same word is found in the title and vv. 3, 37 and 40 of this Psalm. Yea, thou liftest me up above those that rise up against me. Lifest up, the same verb in v. 46 is be exalted. To lift up, to exalt, and to lift up the head or the horn indicate success, victory. As when one is ashamed or languid, the head droops, so when he is strong, courageous, or flushed with victory he holds up his head. Yea, God's deliverance to David was such that his whole person was quite beyond the power of his foes. Thou hast delivered me from the violent man. Hast delivered, the same word as that so rendered in the title; it is sometimes rendered preserved, saved, rescued, Gen. xxxii. 30; 2 Sam. xix. 9; 1 Sam. xxx. 18. It implies that danger had been imminent, and that deliverance was not in the course of nature. It points to help from without. Violent man, literally, man of violence, elsewhere rendered oppressor, Pr. iii. 31. See Ps. vii. 16.

49. Therefore will I give thanks unto thee, O LORD, among the heathen. Calvin: "The meaning is, O Lord, I will not only give thee thanks in the assembly of thy people, according to the ritual which thou hast appointed in thy law, but thy praises shall extend to a greater distance, even as thy grace towards me is worthy of being recounted through the whole world." Heathen, the same word found in v. 43, and in Ps. ii. 1, 8, which see. And [I will] sing praises unto thy name. Alexander: "The verb in the last clause means to praise by music." Ainsworth: "This sense is applied in Rom. xv. 9 to the calling of the Gentiles unto the faith of Christ, and praise unto God therefor. By which we are taught that of Christ and his kingdom this Psalm is chiefly intended."

50. Great deliverance giveth he to his king. David was God's king in opposition to Saul, whom God had rejected. The will of God in this matter was well made known by God's sending Samuel to anoint David, when yet a lad. This is referred to in the next clause; And [he] sheweth mercy to his anointed. The whole ceremony of the anointing is stated in 1 Sam. xvi. 1-13. He next states that the anointed is David. No good man could doubt that David was called of God to reign. This mercy is not only to David, but also to his seed for evermore. Here again we clearly find the reference to 2 Sam. vii. 16. In this verse we are compelled to look beyond David and Solomon to Christ.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Both the title and body of this Psalm suggest that a very fit employment of old age is the recounting of God's mercies received through life. We should go far back. At the writing of this song Saul had been dead for a long time, perhaps thirty years; yet David speaks as if his death were of recent occurrence. Neither our sins nor God's mercies ought ever to grow out of date.

2. However long the strife of God's people may last, it will at length have a close. God will finally deliver from all enemies.

3. All the Scriptures call for ardent love to God. We cannot delight in him too much, v. 1; Deut. vi. 5; x. 12; xi. 1; xiii. 22; xix. 9; xxx. 6; Mark xii. 30, 33; Luke x. 27. Love to man is often inordinate; love to God, never. Luther: "Our sweet and joyful affection ought to impel us with great force to those to whom we owe it, when we have been delivered from huge evil and misfortune."

4. How very feeble we are! Like the conies our strength is in the rock. We can do nothing as of ourselves; yet God is a sufficient protection, support and deliverer, v. 2. Morison: "How sweet is our belief of God's moral government of the world, when we are enabled to feel that some of its most striking agencies have been made to bear on our own particular condition." Calvin: "Those whom God intends to succor and defend are not only safe against one kind of dangers, but are as it were surrounded by impregnable ramparts on all sides, so that, should a thousand deaths be presented to their view, they ought not to be afraid even at this formidable array," John xix. 11.

5. Necessary is belief in the stability and unchangeableness of the divine nature and counsels, v. 2. No name nor title of God fairly interpreted implies the contrary. Nearly all of them fairly assert it. He is our rock, fortress, God, etc.

6. How condescending is God, to present himself before us as in this Psalm, particularly in v. 2; Calvin: "Let us learn to apply to our own use those titles which are here ascribed to God, and to apply them as an antidote against all the perplexities and distresses, which may assail us." Cobbin: "A believing view of God's greatness and power will cause us to exult in him. Whatever is strong in art, may be heaped together as emblems of the believer's God, who is his rock, fortress, buckler, high-tower. Whatever is grand in nature only reflects his greatness and majesty."

7. There is in Scripture hardly any limit to the commendations of prayer, v. 3. Here we have example to arouse us. Here as elsewhere prayer and praise are also united, Phil. iv. 6; Col. iv. 2; 1 Tim. ii. 1. Many a prayer is hindered because while it supplicates blessings, it fails to adore God for what he is and to thank him for what he has already done. Morison: "What honor has been put upon prayer and praise in every age! They have been as a mystic ladder between heaven and earth, upon which the angels of mercy have been ascending and descending." Luther: "One cannot believe what a powerful assistance such praise of God is in pressing danger. For the moment thou wilt begin to praise God, the evil also will begin to abate, the consoled heart will grow, and then will follow the calling upon God with confidence."

8. To what great straits even good men are often brought, vv. 4, 5. The sorrows of death and of hell, the floods of ungodly men and the snares of death surround and beset them. In this way they are disciplined and made courageous. Good soldiers are not made in parlors. The fearful strife of the battle-field is necessary to show who is calm and valorous. It is no small mercy that God lets us triumph in many a conflict before the last great battle is fought.

9. Hordes of the sons of Belial are no novelty, v. 4. Although they are finally put down, they have long made good men afraid. It is not without cause that discerning people have a peculiar dread of suffering sent by the hand of the wicked, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. The cruel taunts and horrid brutality of the wicked give a fearfulness to temporal misery, which it could never otherwise acquire.

10. However frightful our conflicts, it is well to review them when past, vv. 4, 5. The greater our just apprehensions of danger, when instant, the higher will be our estimate of divine wisdom, power and mercy in our rescue. Bunyan never forgot Bedford jail. He loved to think of the mercies he had there received, and of the deliverance God had granted him from its bars and gloom.

11. Many portions of Scripture enjoin earnestness in prayer, v. 6. Calling upon the Lord may denote any religious service offered to Jehovah, though not excluding prayer. But crying to him denotes earnest supplication. We may as well not pray at all, as offer our petitions in a lifeless manner. Every sacrifice was consumed with fire. Calvin: "No calamities however great and oppressive may hinder us from praying, or create an aversion to it."

12. Such prayer is wondrously efficacious, v. 6. Nothing is more so. Dickson: "No strait is such but God can deliver out of it, no case is so desperate as to make prayer needless or useless." Morison: "All nature pays homage to the spirit of prayer, by becoming the willing, active deliverer of him, who pours out his complaint before that gracious Being, who is nature's Sovereign, and who can summon all her most mysterious agencies to the defence of his chosen people." Jonah: "Out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice."

13. As it is a bad sign after a deliverance to strive to make little of it, so it is a good sign to strive to magnify every mercy granted us, vv. 7-15.

14. No folly can be greater than that of fighting against God, v. 7. When he is wroth, all nature stands aghast. Solid mountains and the earth itself tremble like a leaf.

15. When God chooses, his judgments are as terrific as they are ever represented to be, v. 8.

16. All attempts to comprehend God must ever prove failures. The very darkness, with which he surrounds himself, is but an emblem of the impenetrable obscurity, in which he forever abides, vv. 9, 11. Owen: "God hath ends of surprisal, hardening, and destruction towards some, for which they must be left unto their own spirits, and led into many snares and by-paths, for their trial, and the exercise of others, which could not be accomplished, did he not come in the clouds, and were not darkness his pavilion and his secret place; on this account is that cry of men of profane and hardened spirits, Isa. v. 19."

17. When God comes to punish his foes and rescue his people, nothing has ever surprised his friends or his foes more than the admirable swiftness, with which he moves and acts, v. 10. He flies on the wings of the wind.

18. God is at no loss for agents to effect any purpose. Whenever he will he commands the cherubim, v. 10. The universe is not a howling wilderness. It is well peopled with living creatures.

19. Nor does Jehovah ever lack means to execute his wrath or display his delivering power, vv. 12-15. Thick clouds, hail-stones, balls of fire, lightnings, stormy wind, all things in nature are tributary to the purposes of God, and at a moment will execute his will.

20. It must ever be utterly impossible for men to arrive at a settled conclusion that there is no God. The phenomena of nature often so grand and terrific must themselves invest with uncertainty so monstrous a proposition, if in no other way at least in this, by raising the question whether the cause that produces so great effects might not do things that would satisfy the most incredulous that there is a First Cause, a Being whose existence is uncaused? He who can do what is said in vv. 12-15 to have been done might do anything, might to the most skeptical prove his own existence.

21. How marvellous the displays of God's power in producing from the same cloud the most vivid lightnings and a shower of balls of ice, v. 12. Surely if things so contrary may be evolved from a wild storm-cloud, we ought not to be surprised at very variant results proceeding from the moral government of God.

22. It is a clear duty of piety to recognize God in nature, vv. 13, 14. He thunders. His voice shakes heaven and earth. Let us learn to read his will in his works as well as in his words. Calvin: "The import of the words is, Whoever does not acknowledge that I have been preserved by the hand of God, may as well deny that it is God who thunders from heaven, and abolish his power which is manifested in the whole order of nature, and especially in those wonderful changes which we see taking place in the atmosphere."

23. God works without labor, vv. 14, 15. His word is followed by the most amazing results. His will is the law of universal nature. To him nothing is hard, nothing difficult, nothing impossible, nothing wearisome.

24. It is a glorious truth that God would, if necessary, change the whole course of nature to save one of his children, vv. 15, 16. He will shake the pillars of heaven, and make the earth to reel like a drunken man, so as to deliver one poor man from his foes.

25. Seldom do troubles come alone, and as seldom are God's deliverances from one trouble only, v. 16. Often does God draw his loved ones out of many waters. He can save from a world of troubles as easily as from one. Nor does our inability to help ourselves make the displays of God's power less but more illustrious. Whether he saves by means, or without means, or contrary to means, he is still our deliverer.

26. With amazing interest does an experience of personal distress invest every portion of Scripture, especially that which records the trials and deliverances of eminent servants of God, v. 17. Any afflicted, persecuted friend of God, understanding the scope of this Psalm, must be greatly encouraged by its teachings.

27. The escapes of God's people from bodily death, from worldly ruin and from spiritual overthrow are all worthy of deep reflection and religious celebration, v. 17.

28. How busy are our foes, v. 18. They never rest. They always oppose us. It is marvellous that they do not sometimes accomplish the ruin of a good man. But they never do, for

29. God is on his side. The Lord was my stay, v. 18. If God puts underneath us the everlasting arms we shall surely be holden up.

30. When God undertakes our cause he delivers like a God. It is no partial rescue that he effects, v. 19. He brings his chosen into a large place. When he restores peace and joy to Jacob's family the reconciliation between the hostile members is perfect. When he heals the lame man he walks and leaps and praises God. When he undertakes to put David on the throne all the kingdom of Israel may oppose, but cannot hinder the design.

31. If God is dear to his people, v. 1, so are his people dear to him, v. 19. He delights in them. They are as the apple of his eye. Before all worlds God's eternal Son thought with delight on the souls he should redeem, Pr. viii. 31.

32. It is a glorious truth that infinite rectitude will forever reign in all God's ways and decisions, v. 20. If in our conflicts with men we are right and innocent, all will in the end be as we could wish. Many a time slander covers us with the foulest ignominy, as it did David. But God showed his innocence, and abundantly "freed him from the slanders of ingratitude, rebellion, treachery against his father-in-law, and his prince." Calvin: "God will never fail us, provided we follow our calling, keep ourselves within the limits it prescribes, and undertake nothing without the command or warrant of God."

33. Who can duly estimate the unspeakable value of a good conscience? v. 21. Without it David could not possibly have passed through all his trials with composure and confidence: Nothing but uprightness and a pure conscience could ever present that sublime spectacle, recorded in 1 Sam. xxvi. 21-25. This was but a sample of what often occurred. As "no man ever offended his own conscience, but first or last it was revenged upon him for it;" so no man ever kept a good conscience, but that in his hour of trial it gave him wondrous support.

34. True piety renders universal obedience to the preceptive will of God, v. 22; Ps. cxix. 6; Rom. vii. 22; 1 John v. 3. The obedience of God's servants on earth may be imperfect, but it is not hypocritical. It falls short of the law, but not intentionally. They love holiness.

35. So that real piety will bear divine scrutiny, v. 23. God often judges his people more favorably than they judge themselves, Job i. 8; xlii. 6, 7. True piety implores the examination of omniscient purity, Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24; John xxi. 15-17. Blessed be God, he knoweth them that are his, and can see a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff.

36. It is lawful for good men to defend their good name, when it is wickedly assailed, v. 24. To do this both with meekness and firmness is no easy task. Let us never take our cause out of the hands of God. In this David, and much more he, of whom David was but a type, set us a good example, 1 Pet. ii. 23.

37. The great principles of retribution are the same from age to age, vv. 25, 26. Compare Lev. xxvi. 21-24. God's government is so perfect, so comprehensive, that it is impossible for man to violate any of its great laws without sooner or later meeting consequences the most painful, making him feel that his pains are the fruit of his own folly and wantonness. When it is said that with the froward God will show himself froward, the meaning is that the result will be as if it were so. Pool: "Man's perverseness is moral and sinful, but God's perverseness is judicial and penal."

38. God's hatred of pride is right, v. 27. Calvin: "The more the ungodly indulge in gratifying their own inclinations, without any fear of danger, and the more proudly they despise the afflicted poor who are under their feet, so much nearer are they to destruction."

39. Light and comfort, manifestly received from God, are great blessings, v. 28. The gift has its value chiefly from the giver. Calvin: "It is certain that we will never have the comfort of seeing our adversities brought to an end, unless God disperse the darkness which envelops us, and restore to us the light of joy."

40. However many and great may have been our exploits, let them all be referred directly to God, vv. 29-34. From him we have all our strength, agility, courage, wisdom, success. To think and feel otherwise is to practise atheism. Calvin: "Strength and skill in war proceed only from a secret virtue communicated by God." Prodiges of valor and strength can be performed when God stands by any man. Horne: "Vain is every effort, by whomsoever it is made, against the counsels of omnipotence."

41. There is never a post so difficult, a trial so severe, a night so dark, a duty so hard, but that it is as wise as it is obligatory to trust the Lord, v. 30.

42. Nor should we ever forget that God's word, though tried so long, and by so many, in every condition of life, has never failed in one instance, v. 30. Could such a case be found, our joy would be at an end. Morison: "The accumulated experience of the whole church of God has but served to demonstrate, that gold seven times purified is not more genuine or unmixed, than is that word of the living God, which has been the guide, the spiritual nourishment, and the divine support of the children of God in every age."

43. Nor is there any helper, or defence like God, who is power, is almighty, vv. 30, 31. All claims to divinity by any other are idle. The gods of the heathen are vanities.

44. It is easy to carry out our plans, and effect our purposes, when God girds us with strength, v. 32. Then the worm Jacob threshes the mountains, and beats them small, and makes the hills as chaff.

45. To be beyond the reach of enemies is as great a mercy as to be saved in the midst of foes, v. 33.

46. A good man may sometimes clearly see that his steps have been ordered by the Lord; yea, and upheld by him often in the most singular manner, v. 35. In our perils for our own temporal advantage it may not be our duty to risk much. But in the cause of God it may be right to risk all. Luther: "It proceeds from the divine loveliness and grace, if we are held up and honored, not from our designing and undertaking; so that the whole glory remains with God." His succors are seasonable; his condescension infinite. Thy gentleness hath made me great.

47. It is marvellous that failures are not more frequent. How easy it is to slip, v. 36. The righteous are scarcely saved.

48. The righteous may confidently expect an utter routing of all their foes at last, vv. 37-42. Calvin: "As the victories secured to David involve a security of similar victories to us, it follows that there is here promised us an impregnable defence against all the efforts of Satan, all the machinations of sin, and all the temptations of the flesh."

49. Let God have the praise of all our victories, vv. 39, 40, 41, 43, 48. Let God be exalted, and man abased.

50. Even prayer will not save a bad cause, v. 41. Could anything, rightly considered be more alarming to sinners!

51. The disesteem, into which workers of iniquity are often brought on earth, points to something far worse hereafter, v. 42. If in a state of imperfect retribution so dreadful ills came on the wicked here, what must be the shame and everlasting contempt, which shall befall them when God's hand fully takes hold on vengeance!

52. Many worldly victories and perhaps all spiritual victories reach much further than it is at first supposed, vv. 43, 44. When the wicked begin to fall, they generally plunge on from depth to depth till their ruin is complete. In the mean time the righteous rise higher and higher, Esther vi. 13.

53. When he shall so will, it will be easy for Christ to subdue the earth to himself, v. 44. Missions shall surely succeed. The brightness of Immanuel's rising shall scatter all his foes. He can cut short the work in righteousness.

54. Opposition always gives way as of no account, when God comes down to settle contests, v. 45. When he would fully give the kingdom to David, his old enemy king Saul falls on his own sword, and ends his days. When he would break the neck of the persecution against the Jewish converts, he brings Saul of Tarsus to his knees as in a moment.

55. Admit the existence of Jehovah, and all other religious truth naturally follows, ver. 46. It may require statement and even argument; but it is still a logical deduction from the first great truth.

56. Nor is there any fear that we shall ever by word or deed exalt God too much. Let us praise him at all times, v. 46. In the darkest days of the Reformation, Luther said, "Come, let us sing the 46th Psalm, and let them do their worst."

57. How sweet is peace after war, especially when it is plainly and clearly God's blessing, v. 47. When he giveth peace, who shall cause trouble?

58. Even when our trials are brought upon us by means of men, it is best to leave all in God's hands, v. 48. He can deliver us from violent and unreasonable men also, and he alone can effectually give relief.

59. Even personal benefits often call for the most public praises of God, v. 49. This is true of many inferior gifts as well as of salvation.

60. Morison: "We may learn from this Psalm, that the best of men, that such even as are after God's own heart, may be greatly overwhelmed with the sorrows, afflictions and persecutions of life. Such was David's condition; but he sought and found relief at a throne of grace; and so will every one who honors God in this exercise."

61. Much of the Old Testament points to Christ! Many passages of the prophets can bear no full interpretation, unless applied to our Saviour. This is true of portions of this Psalm. The last verse is a striking illustration of this remark. See Acts iii. 18, 24; Rom. xv. 9; Heb. ii. 13. Clarke says, this last word of this Psalm, "shows that another David is meant, with another kind of posterity, and another sort of kingdom. From the family of David came the man Christ Jesus. His posterity are genuine Christians; his kingdom, in which they are subjects, is spiritual. This government shall last through all time, and extend through eternity; for that is the kingdom of glory in which Jesus Christ reigns on the throne of his Father, and in which his followers shall reign with him forever and ever."

PSALM XIX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 THE heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.
- 2 Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.
- 3 There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.
- 4 Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,
- 5 Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.
- 6 His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.

7 The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple.

8 The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes.

9 The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether.

10 More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.

11 Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.

12 Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.

13 Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

14 Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my strength, and my redeemer.

WE have had the same words in titles. See on Ps. iii., iv. Cobbin puts this song next in time after Ps. xii.; Scott, eighteen years later; while Rosenmuller says: "When this Psalm was composed, cannot be shown with any probability."

Strangely enough Clarke says: "It is not very clear that this Psalm was written by David." The title expressly gives it to him. Nor is there either internal or historic evidence to the contrary. Hengstenberg: "Of the Davidic authorship of this Psalm there can be no doubt."

The names of the Most High here found are El God and Jehovah LORD, on which see respectively on Ps. v. 4; i. 2.

Henry's first remarks on this Psalm are: "There are two excellent books which the great God has published for the instruction and edification of the children of men; this Psalm treats of them both, and recommends them both to our diligent study. I. The book of the creatures, in which we may easily read the power and Godhead of the Creator. II. The book of the Scriptures, which makes known to us the will of God concerning our duty." Rivet divides the Psalm into three parts; the first giving us lessons from nature, which is common to all men; the second pointing us to the oracles of God deposited with his church; and the third treating of experimental religion, or the internal, efficacious and saving grace of God, administered by the Spirit. Alexander: "The doctrinal sum of the whole composition is, that the same God who reared the frame of nature is the giver of a law, and that this law is in all respects worthy of its author." Scott: "This Psalm seems especially to have been intended to prove, that the idolatry and irreligion of mankind were wholly inexcusable." Mudge: "The author in this Psalm, as in many other places, considers the works of nature, and the words of revelation, as both of them laws of the same hand, and standing firmly by the same authority; both highly perfect in their kind, and containing great matter of instruction, one for the whole world, the other for his favored people, and himself particularly." Geddes: "No poem ever contained a finer argument against atheism, nor one better expressed." Sherlock: "When a king stands before the altar, we may well expect a regal sacrifice."

1. The heavens declare the glory of God. Heavens, as in Gen. i. 1. The term embraces all the known creation except the earth. Declare, the same word is often rendered speak, tell, show forth. It signifies to narrate, preach, or proclaim. Jebb and Alexander: The heavens are telling the glory of God. The form of the Hebrew implies that the heavens are continually declaring God's glory, that is, his honor, as it is rendered in Ps. vii. 5; iii. 3; iv. 2. And the firmament sheweth his handywork. For firmament the Chaldee, Calvin, Edwards, Venema, Amesius, Bythner and Mant read expanse. The same word is often used in Gen. i. The Hebrew gives no countenance to the Greek philosophy indicated by the word firmament. God's handywork is the work of his hand, nothing more.

Each clause of this verse teaches the same truth, and each contains a bold personification.

How much can we know of God from his works alone? Here David says that we learn God's glory and see that he has been at work. Paul says that from God's works of creation we learn "his eternal power and Godhead." From his works we may learn his existence, goodness, wisdom, power, sincerity, and providence. Beyond this it is hardly safe, surely it is not necessary to any end of religious doctrine to assert anything.

In selecting the heavens, David does not deny that the earth teaches the same lessons; but he selects a striking and excellent part of creation, which a man must be blind not to see. Calvin: "When a man, from beholding and contemplating the heavens, has been brought to acknowledge God, he will learn also to reflect upon and to admire his wisdom and power as displayed on the face of the earth, not only in general, but even in the minutest plants." Hengstenberg tells us that "when C. Niebuhr, many years after his return from the East, lay in bed under the blindness and exhaustion of old age, 'the glittering splendor of the nocturnal Asiatic sky, on which he had so often gazed, imaged itself to him in the hours of stillness, or its lofty vault and azure by day, and in this he found the sweetest enjoyment.'" Returning from Egypt through the Mediterranean, Napoleon heard his officers avowing atheism. Pointing to the stars he said, Who made all these? and atheism had no answer. Early in June, 1858, at Lewisburg, Va., some two thousand feet above the level of the sea, the atmosphere was in the best condition for seeing. The heavens were so brilliant that I do not think I can forget the splendid vision while memory does her office. Bright stars and numerous nebulae overwhelmed my imagination. Had a man never before beheld such a sight, it seems impossible but that he must have confessed a God. So stupendous and glorious is the blazing universe above and around us that one of our poets has said,

An undevout astronomer is mad.

Cicero: "What can be so plain and so clear as when we behold the heavens and view the heavenly bodies, that we should conclude there is some deity of a most excellent mind by whom these things are governed?"

2. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. Edwards: Day succeeding day uttereth instruction, and night after night discovereth knowledge; Fry: Day after day language is poured forth, and night after night knowledge is communicated; Venema expresses the force of the first verb by adding the words in a perpetual stream. The verbs are in the future, and so intimate that day and night shall continue to teach these lessons. Calvin gives an excellent summary of the respectable opinions concerning this verse: "First, No day passes in which God does not show some signal evidence of his power: Secondly, Every succeeding day contributes something new in proof of the existence and perfections of God: Thirdly, The days and nights talk together, and reason concerning the glory of the Creator." This last preserves the personification. It is certain that there is but one Being in the universe who could make so wondrous and glorious a display as that which we behold any day, or any night. A day or a night without clouds is perhaps most impressive to contemplative minds. But the alternations of day and night, and the exact recurrence of the same annual phenomena at a distance of three hundred and sixty-five days demonstrate beyond all reasonable doubt the existence and power of God.

3. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard. The voice is that of the heavens and of the firmament. So the context shows. There are good reasons for adhering to the sense suggested by the authorized version. It is sustained by the ancient versions and by the old English translations generally, also by others. If this is correct, then the import of the verse is that however diverse human languages and tongues may be, and however unintelligible the speech of one people may be to another, yet the mute, inarticulate but clear language of the heavens above us is that there is a glorious Creator, a strong God, as El signifies. Yet quite a number of able writers take another view. Waterland: They have neither speech nor words: without these is their voice heard; Boothroyd: No speech, no language, nor is their voice heard; Jebb: There is no speech, and there is no language; it is not heard, their voice; Amesius: There is no speech, nor are there words to them; and without these their voice is understood; Fry: There is no speech, there are no words; no voice is heard among them; Hengstenberg: There is not speech and there are not words, their voice is not heard; Alexander: There is no speech, and there are no words; not at all is their voice heard. The margin supports this rendering. So also do Clarke and Scott. The sense then would be that, "The traces of God's glory are so strongly impressed on the heavens that they need no speech to make him known as their Creator, but as dumb heralds of the divine greatness publish abroad his glorious existence." Either view gives a good sense.

4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. Line is the only rendering anywhere in the English version. In Isa. xxviii. 10 it evidently points to a line of legible writing. So in this place Calvin reads writing instead of line. Then the sense is "that the glory of God is written and imprinted in the heavens, as in an open volume which all men may read." Instead of line Fry reads call; Jebb, voice; Septuagint and Vulgate, sound. Paul quotes the Septuagint in Rom. x. 18. But he may have employed the passage merely because it conveyed the idea he wished to express, and without sanctioning the translation as the best as he did, Ps. iv. 4. Bellarmine thinks the Hebrew text was corrupted by some transcriber after the time of Jerome, and with Glassius and others prefers to add a letter so as to read, their voice. Calvin: "The apostle designed to say that God, from ancient times, had manifested his glory to the Gentiles, and that this was a prelude to the more ample instruction which was one day to be published to them." Their and them refer to the heavens and the firmament. In them hath he set [pitched, placed, made] a tabernacle [pavilion or tent] for the sun. The plain meaning is that the place of the sun is in the heavens, but the poetic figure is that, like an oriental dignitary, the sun in the skies has his pavilion.

5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber. This imagery is borrowed from eastern marriages, the forms of which are still to some extent preserved. Bridegrooms put on their best apparel, assumed the most joyous manners and were attended by the best retinue possible in their circumstances. There is no good reason for the rendering which makes the tabernacle to be the abode of God, and the place of it the sun. A sun-rise at sea, or on a prairie, or on a mountain often surpasses all human powers of description. In October, A. D., 1838, a number of us stood on the top of the Blue Ridge at Rockfish Gap in Virginia, just after the sun had risen. Dense fogs covered the valleys, but left exposed to the sun the tops of the high hills for perhaps forty miles eastward. Our great elevation by means of the reflected rays of the sun, discovered to us below a sea of glory all studded with beautiful islets. It was a view of a like scene at the same spot that led a great but eccentric orator and statesman to say to his servant: "Johnny, if you ever see a man who says, There is no God, tell him he is a fool." The sun is also compared to a giant courser—And rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race. In his Seasons Thomson has this figure, but in an enfeebled form:

But yonder comes the glorious king of day,
Rejoicing in the east.

A king may be very feeble and faltering, but a strong man rejoicing in his race none can mistake. Strong man, in 1 Sam. xvii. 51 rendered champion; commonly mighty man, Gen. vi. 4; Josh. i. 14; Ps. xxxiii. 16; lii. 1; sometimes valiant man, Cant. iii. 7. Nothing could better express a high conception of the grandeur of the motions of the sun than that of a powerful racer, exulting in his vigor. Homer speaks of "the unwearying sun."

6. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof. This language is popular, not scientific. Calvin: "David proposes to us three things to be considered in the sun—the splendor and excellency of his form—the swiftness with which he runs his course—and the astonishing power of his heat." On the first see vv. 4, 5; on the second, vv. 5, 6; on the third, v. 6. Both the light and heat of the sun are necessary to animal and vegetable life. The number, vigor and beauty of plants are much affected by the quantity of light and heat. Professor Wildenow says: "In Spitzbergen there are 30 plants; in Lapland 534; in Iceland 553; in Sweden 1299; in the Marquisate of Brandenburg 2000; in Piedmont 2800; on the coast of Coromandel nearly 4000; as many in the island of Jamaica; in Madagascar above 5000." Similar remarks might be made in regard to the animal kingdom. Without the light and heat of the sun this world would be dreary in the extreme. With all his power during long summers many mountains even in warm climates are covered with perpetual snow and ice. Even in Virginia there is in Hampshire County a mountain on the north side of which ice may be found any day of the year. Some have thought that the heat is here spoken of as if it were an enemy pursuing us. Calvin "understands it of the violent heat which scorches men, plants and trees." But Edwards more nearly gives us the clue to a right interpretation when he translates: Nothing is hid from his enlivening heat; Boothroyd: nothing is deprived of his heat. That the beneficial effects of the sun are here spoken of is required by the following verses. Wonderful and excellent as are the heavens, and especially the sun, yet David has something of still higher excellence to celebrate. Alexander: "The God, whose glory is thus shown forth by the material creation, is the author of a spiritual law, which the Psalmist now describes in the next three verses, by six characteristic names, six qualifying epithets, and six moral effects produced by it."

7. The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul. Dimock: "The expressions in this, and the following verses, showing the superior influence of the law upon the soul to that of the sun upon the earth, are very beautiful." Law, very commonly so rendered; in the margin, doctrine. Ainsworth: "It implies both doctrine and an orderly disposition of the same." We had the word in Ps. i. 2. It is a general name given to Scripture, of which the law is an important part. Besides, all Scripture is a rule, a precept—profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. But it is the law of Jehovah that has this power. Rules of life invented by serious men among the heathen and in Christian lands may have produced a civil discipline, and so may have profited for this life. But they were much mixed with error. Nor had they saving power. They were not perfect, as is the law of God "in doctrine, in precept, in promise, in threatening." Nor did they convert the soul. He who knew them all and lived accordingly, had not yet the key of knowledge, but was blind, and foolish, and far from the right way. His soul was not thereby restored from its wanderings, its errors, its sins, its sicknesses, its death. Nor was it converted to truth, to righteousness, to life, to God. There is no good reason for limiting the meaning of the word, converting, to anything short of a saving change of heart. God's word is not the agent but only the instrument in the renewal of the soul. It is a fit instrument, and as such is greatly honored of God. He has exalted it above all his name. Although every restoration is not strictly a conversion, yet every conversion is a restoration. The word here rendered converting is of the same root as that which in Ps. xxiii. 3 is rendered restore; in Ps. lxxxv. 1, hast brought back; in Ps. xiv. 7, bringeth back; in Ps. lxxxv. 4, turn us; in Ezek. xiv. 6, repent, and often turn ye. For converting, Hengstenberg reads quickens. We have another name given to God's word in this verse: The testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple. Testimony, not before found in the Psalms, but the same which occurs so often in the pentateuch, in Ps. cxix., and elsewhere. In his word God appears as a witness for truth and righteousness. His testimony is his word. It is sure, that is reliable, durable, faithful, trustworthy, standing fast, to be believed. Sure, in Hebrew a participle of the verb, from which the adverb amen is formed. There is no doubt about a thing, if God once says it. His testimony makes wise the simple. Many translations, including John Rogers', Calvin, Vulgate, etc., for simple read babes, or little ones. Ezekiel (xlvi. 20) once uses the word rendered simple in the precise form found here. With this exception, it is found only in the writings of David and his son, Solomon. The latter always uses it in a bad sense, as indicating a vicious character; but his father David uses it in a good sense, pointing out those who indeed need instruction, but are willing to receive it. The rendering is unvarying, except in Pr. ix. 6, foolish. The testimony of God in his word relates in chief part to things which we never could have known, had he not spoken. It is suited to make wise, not only for the true and excellent matter it contains, but because it is clear, teaches the best lessons in the simplest manner, is precisely adapted to man's weakness and wickedness, being the testimony of him who knows all hearts. The fact that it does make wise the simple is manifest in the case of every pious student of the Bible. In the life of such men as Bunyan, its power is illustrious. It is also shown in its vast influence over nations.

8. The statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart. Calvin: "The word rendered statutes is by some restricted to ceremonies, but improperly, in my judgment: for I find that it is everywhere taken for ordinances and edicts. In Ps. ciii. 18; cxi. 7, the same word is rendered commandments; in Ps. cxix. it is always rendered precepts; here only statutes. But the sense is the same. These statutes are right, i. e., upright, righteous, in equity. They rejoice the heart of all right-minded persons. No good man counts any commandment of God grievous, even though it enjoins new and difficult duties, or forbids customary sins. Of course all other parts of revealed truth make glad the saints of God. He who loves the precepts will love the promises and the doctrines." The commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes. The word rendered commandment is not before found in the Psalms. It occurs frequently in Deuteronomy, in Ps. cxix., and in several other books of Scripture. Hengstenberg: "The name here given to the law is one that prescribes what one has to do." It points to the whole law. Paul also uses the singular even where he speaks of the decalogue, Rom. vii. 8-12. The commandment is pure. It is free from injustice, error, sin. The Septuagint has it, clear, radiant, bright. The doctrines of Scripture show us what we must believe; the precepts, what we must do; the threatenings, what we must shun; the promises, what we must hope for; and so far as these are necessary to our salvation they are wonderfully clear. Instead of pure, Hammond has for food; and his paraphrase is "God's commands are our spiritual food." There is no error taught by this rendering. Yet the change is not required, nor is it supported by sufficient reasons. This pure, clear commandment enlightens the eyes. It removes a thousand misconceptions, prejudices and follies which like fog and darkness obscure our perceptions. It shows us the real nature of the things of which it treats, the greatest things in the world. Calvin: "Understanding is the most excellent endowment of the soul." Illumination, knowledge and wisdom are names often given to the whole of religion, because they are so excellent a part of it.

9. The fear of the LORD is clean, enduring for ever. The word rendered fear is given in our version with great uniformity. Only in Ps. lv. 5 it is fearfulness. Once or twice it is rendered as an adjective afraid, or dreadful. Once does the Scripture say, The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge; twice, The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom; and once, The fear of the LORD, that is wisdom. God complains of some that their fear toward him is taught by the precepts of men. In this case the fear of Jehovah, the effect, is put for the word of God, the cause, which teaches us to fear him. The word is elsewhere so used. Ps. xxxiv. 11; Pr. ii. 5. Diodati: "The rule of his fear and of all true religion contained in his word." Calvin: "It is taken in an active sense for the doctrine which prescribes to us the manner in which we ought to fear God." Rivet and Cobbin take the same view. Hengstenberg: "The fear of the Lord here marks the instruction afforded by God for fearing him." This fear of God is clean; Edwards, uncorrupt; Fry, pure; Doway, holy; Ethiopic and Arabic, chaste. Our version follows the Chaldee, Syriac and many others. No man perfectly following God's word will ever be defiled. It leads to no corrupt thoughts, emotions, words or deeds. Particularly does it maintain a pure worship. This fear of the Lord endureth for ever. Amesius, Fry and Alexander: standing forever; Hengstenberg: continues for ever. In Ps. cxix. 91 it is continue; in Ps. xxxiii. 9, stood fast; in Ps. cii. 26; cxi. 3, 10, endure. Jesus Christ neither abolished nor changed the law. Nay, the final conflagration shall not relax the bond, which binds us to purity, reverence, holiness in heart and worship. "This is the treasure of everlasting happiness." The rest of the verse reads: The judgments of the LORD are true and righteous altogether. By judgments Diodati understands the statutes and ordinances by which God judgeth man, and according to which men ought likewise to frame their conscience. Alexander: "Judgments are properly judicial decisions, but here as in Ps. xviii. 22 are put for all God's requisitions." The same word is often found in the Hebrew Scriptures, but occurs with great frequency in Deuteronomy, in Ps. cxix., in Isaiah and Ezekiel. It is given in our version with much uniformity, judgments. Pool: "The judgments of the Lord are his laws, frequently called his judgments, because they are the declarations of his righteous will, and as it were his legal and judicial sentence, by which he expects that men should govern themselves, and by which he will judge them at the last day." God's decisions in his word are true. For true Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Hengstenberg and Alexander following the original read truth. The word is the same as in Ps. xv. 2; xxv. 5; cxlvi. 6, the common word for truth. Thy word is truth—truth without any mixture of error, fiction, falsehood, deceit. Moreover God's judgments are righteous. Vulgate and Doway: justified in themselves; Calvin: justified together; Venema: together just; Amesius: alike just; Ainsworth: just together, that is, all of them together, and each of them apart, is just, or justified; Edwards: full of righteousness all together. Hammond paraphrases it thus: "They are in themselves most just and equitable, fittest to be done by us, if they were not commanded, nor should ever be rewarded in us." Altogether, the same rendered together in Ps. ii. 2; xiv. 3; in Ps. iv. 8, both; in Ps. xxxiii. 16, alike; in Ps. lxxiv. 6, at once; in Ps. cxli. 10 withal.

10. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold. The things here said to be more to be desired are God's judgments, embracing his law, testimony, statutes, commandment and the precepts concerning his fear. All parts of God's word are of the highest value, above gold, yea, much fine gold. The word rendered fine gold occurs nine times in Scripture, and is always so rendered except once (Ps. xxi. 3) where it is pure gold. It is first found in Job xxviii. 17. The Septuagint sometimes as here renders it "a precious stone;" in Ps. cxix. 127, a topaz. According to Hesychius topaz is derived from paz, which is the Hebrew word here rendered fine gold. Calvin: "The sense is, that we do not esteem the law as it deserves, if we do not prefer it to all the riches of the world." It is a great matter to have our practical judgments of divine things correct. But men may loudly praise God's word as the fountain of history, of sublime composition, of instruction on the weightiest matters, yea, as divinely inspired; and yet they may have no relish for its truths, and so be unable to add concerning God's decisions that they are sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. Calvin, Ainsworth, Street, Venema, Edwards, Fry, Jebb and Alexander would read sweeter than honey, and the dropping of [the combs or] the honeycombs. Amesius in his translation speaks of the unboiled or unheated honey. The first word rendered honey signifies honey of any kind; the last signifies the pure honey, as it dripped down without any pressure or heating, which could injure flavor and quality. So to the taste of David and all right-minded men God's word is a precious feast. The same is declared in Ps. cxix. 103. Hear Job also: "I have esteemed the words of his mouth more than my necessary food," chap. xxiii. 12; Jeremiah: "Thy words were found, and I did eat them; and thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of my heart," chap. xv. 16. No estimate of God's word will avail unless we have a taste, a relish, a zest for its holiest requirements.

11. Moreover by them is thy servant warned. For warned, Calvin, following the Chaldee, has made circumspect; Edwards: admonished; Ainsworth and Pool: clearly admonished; Boothroyd: instructed; Clarke: fully instructed; Street, Hengstenberg and Alexander: enlightened; church of England: taught; the Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway all follow the Septuagint and read: For thy servant keepeth them. But our version is preferable. In this clause David simply tells what had been up to this time the practical influence of God's word on his life. In the next clause he tells of the success attending such a course. In keeping of them there is great reward. Alexander: "Reward is here used not to signify a recompense earned in strict justice, but a gratuity bestowed." There are rewards of grace* as well as of debt. The latter are inferior to the former. Though God's people do not serve him with a mercenary spirit, yet they do not forget the end reached by the obedient, Heb. xi. 26; Matt. vi. 4, 6; 1 Tim. iv. 8. Patrick's paraphrase is: "I say nothing but what I have tried: for by following the admonitions of thy holy laws, both in my private and my public capacity, thy servant is become thus illustrious: and in their observance there is not only much satisfaction at present, but a far greater reward in the conclusion." Yet no good man, with any tolerable degree of knowledge of himself, can be ignorant of the fact that he comes far short of the absolute perfection required by God's word, especially by the law, and so David exclaims:

12. Who can understand his errors? By errors Ainsworth understands unadvised errors, or ignorant faults, unwitting and inconsiderate sins. Alexander: "The word translated errors is akin to one sometimes used in the law to denote sins of inadvertence, error, or infirmity, as distinguished from deliberate, wilful and high-handed sins such as are deprecated in the next verse. See Lev. iv. 2, 27; Num. xv. 27." Many other passages might also have been cited. Yet the same verb seems in other places to have in general the signification of sinful error, see Isa. xxviii. 7; (where it occurs thrice,) 1 Sam. xxvi. 21; and elsewhere. This led Calvin to say that "all the sins to the commission of which men give themselves loose reins, not being duly sensible of the evil that is in them, and being deceived by the allurements of the flesh, are justly included under the Hebrew word here used by David, which signifies faults or ignorances. Pool also says, "his errors are either, 1. His sins of ignorance, of which the word is used, Lev. iv. 2, 22, 27; Ecc. v. 6; or rather, 2. His sins in general, (which afterwards he divides into secret and presumptuous sins) or all deviations from God's law, which are thus called, 1 Sam. xxvi. 21; Ps. cxix. 67, 118; Heb. ix. 7; Jas. v. 20." This view is the safest, gives the fullest sense, and coincides with the analogy of faith. It is as true of sins committed against light as of sins of ignorance chargeable to any man, that he knows neither their number, magnitude, guilt, depravity, nor the mischief they are likely to effect. David next prays, Cleanse thou me from secret faults. The word faults is supplied by the translators. Horsley has disguises, concealments, dissimulations. The word secret is in v. 6, rendered hid. The common rendering of the verb from which this participle is derived is to hide, Ps. xiii. 1; xvii. 8. Our faults may be hidden from our neighbors, and from ourselves, but not from God. To him all things are naked and opened. The sum of this petition is, Cleanse me from those sins which may be unknown to my neighbors, or which are unknown to myself. The primary and prominent idea suggested to the Hebrew mind by the word cleanse, is that of remission, holding guiltless, or guiltless, clearing, setting free from punishment, acquitting. Num. v. 31; Jud. xv. 3; Num. xiv. 18; Pr. xi. 21; Nah. i. 3. Schmidt says: "It is a judicial term and means acquittal;" Calvin: "The word cleanse is to be referred not to the blessing of regeneration, but to free forgiveness; Amesius; Absolve me; Hengstenberg: Acquit me. He adds that the word rendered cleanse, "always signifies to declare innocent, to acquit." Alexander for cleanse reads clear. But as in both the Old and New Testaments justification and sanctification are declared to be inseparable, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2; Rom. viii. 1; and as it is common to take an important part for the whole, so we are not to understand David as saying that he desired mere remission without purification. Pool therefore well says: "Cleanse thou me; both by justification, or the pardon of my sins, through the blood of thy Son, which is to be shed for me; and by sanctification through thy Holy Spirit, co-working in and with thy word, to the further renovation of my heart and life; for these are the two ways of cleansing sinners most frequently mentioned both in the Old and New Testament; though the first may seem to be principally, if not only intended, because he speaks of his past sins which could be cleansed no other way but by remission." God may also cleanse us by leading us not into temptation, by restraining us from sin. Edwards: Keep me clean from secret faults; Fry: From concealed ones do thou keep me clear. Prevention is better than cure. It is better not to sin than to sin, and repent. It is a sad thing to be always repenting of the sins we have committed, and repeating the sins of which we have repented.

13. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins. Here is prayer for restraining and supporting grace. The Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic for presumptuous sins read strangers; Doway: From my secret sins cleanse me, O Lord; and from those of others spare thy servant; Chaldee: Set thy servant free from the proud; Syriac: From iniquity restrain thy servant; Venema: Withhold thy servant from the proud; Amesius: Withdraw thy servant from the contumacious; Fry: From presumption, etc.; Horsley: From evil spirits, etc. The context is speaking of sins, not of persons. When the word rendered presumptuous is found without a noun we have no right to supply men or spirits, if we can as well use the word found in the preceding verse, which is errors, faults, sins. Calvin: "By presumptuous sins he means known and evident transgressions, accompanied with proud contempt and obstinacy." Hammond understands "known deliberate sins, which have not the alleviation of ignorance or weakness, but are committed against express knowledge of duty, and after mature consideration." The word is in our version rendered either presumptuous or proud, Ps. lxxxvi. 14; and the corresponding noun pride or presumption, Deut. xvii. 12; xviii. 22; Pr. xi. 2; Obad. 3. Such sin is always based in arrogance and contempt of God. It is the fruit of an imperious lust. It is not the result of mere surprise. In its nature it is daring. Keep back, also rendered withhold, hold back, hinder, spare, reserve, and in the margin restrain. Let them not have dominion over me. Dominion is prevailing power. The Canaanites lived in Judea even after the times of Joshua, and they greatly annoyed the Israelites, but they were not the lords of the land. In Ps. viii. 6 to have dominion expresses man's supremacy over inferior animals. The participle is often rendered ruler, Gen. xlv. 8; Jud. xv. 11; Ps. cv. 20, 21; Pr. xxviii. 15. The import of the prayer is, Let not any presumptuous sin have the mastery over me. Hengstenberg: "Presumptuous sins are here personified as tyrants who strive to bring the servant of God into unbecoming subjection to them. That the Lord alone can keep from this servitude, discovers the depth of human corruption." Thus saved from outbreking sins he adds: Then shall I be upright. Upright, as in Ps. xviii. 25; elsewhere perfect, finished, Job xxii. 3; Josh. iv. 10. Absolute perfection is found in no mere man on earth, 1 Kings viii. 46; Ecc. vii. 20. Comparative perfection or uprightness belongs to sincerity, and is found in the consistent holy life of every child of God. Such a man may add: And I shall be innocent from the great transgression. Be innocent, elsewhere be clear, be guiltless, be blameless, be cleansed, be cleared, the same root as cleanse in v. 12. From the great transgression; Chaldee: From great sin; Calvin: From much wickedness; Edwards: From heinous transgressions; Venema: From much defection; Amesius: From great defection; Hengstenberg: From great iniquity; Alexander: From much transgression. Doubtless the best sense is he shall be free "from innumerable sins, which usually follow the commission of one presumptuous sin." There seems to be no good reason for inserting the before great; nor for rendering it, as Fry, the great rebellion; nor as Horsley, the great apostasy. Morison thinks it refers to "the easily besetting sin of a man's constitution and temperament;" but this cannot be shown to be always the worst kind of transgression.

14. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O LORD, my strength and my redeemer. The Chaldee, Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Pool, Horne, Henry, Scott, Clarke, Jebb and Hengstenberg agree with our version in making this a prayer, Let, etc. But the Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Fry and others closely follow the original, and read it in the future: Then shall be acceptable, etc. The pious student of Scripture gets an excellent sense from either reading. Each coincides with truth and experience. If the future form is to be adopted then we have an inspired declaration that the words and even the thoughts of such a man as is previously described are pleasing to God. But if we follow the common version, which is perhaps the best, then the Psalmist prays that God would not merely free him from sins secret and presumptuous, but that he would make his speech to be pure, kind, godly, edifying, and his thoughts chaste, devout, holy, heavenly. There seems to be no good reason for supposing that the words and meditation are merely those contained in this Psalm, and none else, as some have thought. Be acceptable, elsewhere be to the pleasure, to the good pleasure, to the good-will, to the favor, to the delight, to the acceptance. Two grounds of confidence in this petition are expressed. 1. The LORD is his Strength, or Rock. See Ps. xviii. 2. Clarke thinks the word equivalent to Fountain or Origin. He gives no reason for this rendering, nor is the word ever so translated in our common version. There it is rendered Rock, Strength, Beauty, mighty One, mighty God. David's confidence was in God's ability to do all he needed and all he asked. 2. The LORD is his Redeemer—literally, The one that redeems me; or, My kinsman, whose right and office it is to redeem. An old Psalter reads it, My Helper and my Buyer. We are bought with a price, a great price, a price far above our value. Well may every believer say: "In the Lord" Jesus "have I righteousness and strength."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The distinction between natural and revealed religion is just. Truth requires it. The Scriptures admit it, vv. 1-11.

2. All unperverted knowledge is useful. Everything God has made and everything God has spoken, with all the relations and uses of each, may teach us some valuable lesson, vv. 1-11.

3. If man had never sinned, if he were laboring under no blindness of mind, nor hardness of heart, the teachings of natural religion are so clear and so impressive that they would assuredly awaken pious wonder and devout praise to the Maker of all things, vv. 1-4. His works declare, preach, show, publish his existence all the time and in every place. Tholuck: "Though all the preachers on earth should grow silent, and every human mouth cease from publishing the glory of God, the heavens above will never cease to declare and proclaim his majesty." The smallest piece of granite or of old red sandstone, the least shell or insect as truly requires a Creator as the heavens above us. Morison: "It is impossible to direct even a cursory glance to the greater and lesser lights which rule by day and night, without being compelled to think with reverential awe of that incomprehensible Being who kindles up all their fires, directs all their courses, and impresses upon them all laws, which contribute alike to the order, beauty and happiness of the universe." Well did the apostle say that all men, even the heathen, are without excuse. Even one day or one night proves that there is a God, as there is but one being that could cause either. Everett: "I had occasion, a few weeks since, to take the early train from Providence to Boston; and for this purpose rose at two o'clock in the morning. Everything around was wrapt in darkness and hushed in silence, broken only by what seemed at that hour the unearthly clank and rush of the train. It was a mild, serene, midsummer's night—the sky was without a cloud—the winds were whist. The moon, then in the last quarter, had just risen, and the stars shone with a spectral lustre but little affected by her presence. Jupiter, two hours high, was the herald of the day; the Pleiades just above the horizon shed their sweet influence in the east; Lyra sparkled near the zenith; Andromeda veiled her newly-discovered glories from the naked eye in the South; the steady pointers far beneath the pole looked meekly up from the depths of the north to their sovereign.

"Such was the glorious spectacle as I entered the train. As we proceeded, the timid approach of twilight became more perceptible; the intense blue of the sky began to soften; the smaller stars, like little children went first to rest; the sister-beams of the Pleiades soon melted together; but the bright constellations of the west and north remained unchanged. Steadily the wondrous transfiguration went on. Hands of angels hidden from mortal eyes shifted the scenery of the heavens; the glories of night dissolved into the glories of the dawn. The blue sky now turned more softly gray; the great watch-stars shut up their holy eyes; the east began to kindle. Faint streaks of purple soon blushed along the sky; the whole celestial concave was filled with the inflowing tides of the morning light, which came pouring down from above in one great ocean of radiance: till at length as we reached the Blue Hills, a flash of purple fire blazed out from above the horizon, and turned the dewy tear-drops of flower and leaf into rubies and diamonds. In a few seconds, the everlasting gates of the morning were thrown wide open, and the lord of day, arrayed in glories too severe for the gaze of man, began his state. . .

"I am filled with amazement, when I am told that in this enlightened age, and in the heart of the Christian world, there are persons who can witness this daily manifestation of the power and wisdom of the Creator, and yet say in their hearts, 'there is no God.'"

Morison: "The bridegroom's ornaments, and the giant's power are but faint images of the sun's mild splendor, and his swift penetrating light. All nature rejoices at his approach; the sweet melody of wood and grove hails his rising; before his face the shadows of night flee away; wild beasts of the forest hasten to their retreats; and light, and cheerfulness, and happy industry revisit the habitations of men." Indeed one bright sun should forever silence all cavillings respecting the fundamental truths of natural religion. "Where is your God? show him to me," said a proud heathen monarch to a devout Jew. "I cannot show you my God, but come with me and I will show you one of his messengers." Taking him to the open air he pointed to the unclouded sun, and said, "Look at that." "I cannot, it pains my eyes," said the monarch. "Then," said the Jew, "how couldst thou look on the face of him, at whose rebuke the pillars of heaven tremble?"

4. A poor, puny creature is man! Compared with God he is as nothing. All nature and all revelation teach him that he is a mite, a worm, a vanity. He looks up and sees the sky as a molten looking-glass, Job xxxvii. 18, reflecting the image of God; but all nations of men are so much like the grasshoppers that their image is not once seen, except they look downward. Everything above us speaks of the greatness of God not of man.

5. Some good pieces have been written on the poetry of Scripture and on the indebtedness of elegant literature to the Bible. Much more remains to be told. Let some one lay out his strength on the subject. The imagery of the sun in vv. 4, 5, is but a specimen of what is meant.

6. Thankful should we poor gentiles be that to us God always gave the lessons of natural religion as clearly as to others, that in so doing there was a prophetic pledge that he would finally give us clearer light, and that that light, even the Sun of righteousness, has arisen on the nations. When God suffered all nations to walk in their own ways, he nevertheless left not himself without witness, Acts xiv. 16, 17, thus proving to them all the time that he was as good and would be as gracious as Revelation said he should be to the blinded aliens from the commonwealth of Israel.

7. Glorious as the sun is, compared with other creatures, it is yet infinite condescension in God to make the sun an emblem of himself to us poor ignorant mortals, Ps. lxxxiv. 11.

8. Great as are man's natural endowments, and clear as are the lessons taught by God's works, yet history and observation alike prove that a revelation was necessary. The world by wisdom never did know God. Having forsaken him, every step men take in any system of mythology or philosophy leads them farther from the truth. The Bible was a needed blessing. "If God is seen in his works, he is much more seen in his word."

9. The rule of faith and practice given in Scripture is perfect, v. 7. It is perfect in wisdom, in truth, in equity. In it nothing is lacking, nothing redundant, nothing vexatious, nothing capricious. We need all it teaches us; and it teaches us all we need to learn. When one examines the collected wise sayings of the heathen, the impression is necessarily made, that in the truths relating to a right belief and a right life the best of them were mere children. And when one searches the word of God, he does not wonder that under its teachings the simple grow wise, and the immoral become pure. The rules, the encouragements, the directions, the incentives are perfect. They all have adequate clearness, authority and majesty. Even the promises are august; the threatenings, salutary and awful.

10. In the hand of God's Spirit Scripture has all the power necessary to control the strongest inclinations of human nature. It converts the soul, v. 7. Nor is this energy confined to a few cases. It renovates millions. Nor is it adapted to change the hearts of none but the moderately wicked. No demon ever enters the soul, but that it can be made to say, Paul I know, and Jesus I know.

11. It is infinite condescension in the God of truth personally to become a witness, and give us his testimony, v. 7. Nothing short of this would have met our case; but our weakness and low estate had put us far beneath the glory of Jehovah, and our sins had exposed us to his righteous displeasure. In salvation everything is of mercy.

11. But God gives his testimony not only to the heads of society, the dignitaries of earth, but to the humblest souls, v. 7. He loves to instruct the feeblest, who has a teachable disposition. Renunciation of our own wisdom, and child-like simplicity are essential to success in the study of God's word, 1 Cor. iii. 18.

12. Good men delight in the law of God and intend to keep it, v. 8. He who loves God must love his law, for it is a transcript of his character.

13. True piety has its sorrows, weeping over sins and short-comings; but it has its joys also, v. 8. These are unspeakable and full of glory. A good conscience is the best treasure ever held, the best pleasure ever tasted, the best honor ever conferred. To a sinner it comes through atoning blood: but it never co-exists with a slighting of God's statutes.

14. Although many systems of false religion do contain some truth; yet it is the peculiar glory of Scripture that it contains pure truth, and no error, v. 8. It is always safe to receive what God has spoken.

15. God's word contains all necessary truth. It so enlightens the eyes that they need no further illumination, v. 8. He who should know the true sense of all that God has revealed would be unspeakably the wisest mere man that ever lived. To be wise unto salvation is the highest feat of sagacity.

16. The religion of the Bible differs from all false religions by the purity it requires and promotes. The fear of the Lord is clean, v. 9. All other religions agree in leaving sin and corruption to riot in the soul. They crop out even in their worship.

17. The more true religion is tried, the more it is found unto praise; for it has in it indestructible excellence. It endureth forever, v. 9. While all that is false, base and selfish shall be forever put down; the true, the noble, the benevolent shall stand, eternally stand. The foundation of all stability is truth and righteousness.

18. Every part of Scripture condemns will-worship and human inventions in the house of God, v. 9. God's fear and judgments have a very different basis from man's precepts.

19. Everywhere in Scripture right, rectitude, holiness have the pre-eminence, v. 9. No inspired writer ever expresses a doubt concerning the final triumph of a principle or of a cause, if it is righteous.

20. The renewal of man's fallen nature by the word and Spirit of God is a reality. Conversion is not a dream, vv. 8, 10. Luther: "This is a great wonder of the Holy Spirit and of the judgments of the Most High, that they change everything, rendering that most acceptable, which was before distasteful. For what do men seek more eagerly than riches and pleasures? and yet the spirit has far greater delight in the law of God, than the flesh can have in its goods and pleasures." Every generation contains some men who do prove that they are born of God.

21. How vain are great riches compared with God's word, v. 10. They are fleeting, disturbing, inferior even to many earthly good things. But the divine word enriches the soul of man. "It is able to bring to him an everlasting kingdom." Wealth can heal no wounded spirit, cheer no sinking soul, give hope to no desponding mind, defend against none of the worst ills of life, point no weary traveller to the way of rest, give no assurance of happiness beyond the grave. God's word can do all these things, and a thousand times more.

22. No marvel then that to a pious soul, God's word has an incomparable sweetness, v. 10. The divine life within us is full of comforts and supports, pleasant beyond anything the world ever tastes.

23. In a teacher or witness, experience is a good quality, v. 11. By experience God's children know how blessed is his service, and they speak what they know. The wicked know not what they say, when they rail at religion.

24. From the doctrine of gracious rewards taught us in v. 11, let us like Paul make this very weighty inference: "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labour is not in vain in the Lord." Those were blessed words spoken to Abraham: "I am thy exceeding great reward." Well may such words arouse and animate any man to do his best in God's cause. Yet every good man will sympathize with Hooker, of New England, who, when told that he was going to receive his reward, said, "I am going to receive mercy."

25. How useful for humiliation is the whole law of God! v. 12. It shows mortals their defects and enormities in such a way that the very best men have cried out bitterly under a sense of their manifold corruptions.

26. There is great folly in claiming to be without fault, v. 12. Modern perfectionism gets no countenance from Scripture. Calvin: "The more diligently any one examines himself, the more readily will he acknowledge with David, that if God should discover our secret faults, there would be found in us an abyss of sins so great as to have neither bottom nor shore."

27. If our sanctification goes no further than we can see our own faults, and so particularly renounce each one, we shall never be saved, v. 12. Blessed be God, he sees all our sins, and if he loves us, he will not leave us under their power.

28. How important is prayer, especially such prayer as David offers in vv. 12, 13. If we ever get beyond prayer, we shall either be fit for heaven or for hell.

29. Although it is of great importance, on many accounts, that we should have a high degree of self-knowledge, yet observation unites with inspiration in teaching that it is exceedingly difficult of attainment. Very few men know themselves, and especially their own defects. It would seem that the mind of man, like his eye, was originally made rather to look out on the works of God than on itself. It is only by a reflex act that we get a knowledge of the size, color, or appearance of our eyes, or of the powers, tempers and exercises of our minds. Mental philosophy makes slow progress. Sin also blinds the mind, so that though men have eyes they see not. Self-love has become inordinate, so that in civil and criminal suits no man is allowed to be his own judge; yet in matters of self-knowledge each man is judge, jury, witness, prosecutor and advocate. Self-inspection is to most men irksome. Sin riots in carelessness. Nor is this all. Good and bad in character often seem very much alike. Saul and Judas appeared to repent much as Peter. Ahab's humility looked like that of David. Herod's reformation appeared to go almost as far as was required. Systems of education in which concealment has a large place also help to rivet upon us the chains of self-ignorance. When a man has learned to deceive others, he has learned still more effectually to deceive himself. In fact, our very familiarity with our own faults hides their deformity from us. How many men mistake their talents and their manners, thinking the latter agreeable when they are highly offensive, and the former shining when they are hardly up to a tedious mediocrity. Good men deplore their want of self-knowledge; and bad men evince it in many ways. Hazael considered himself insulted when the prophet predicted his career of crime, yet he did all the wickedness foretold of him. In some cases even the conscience of men is perverted so that they believe their worst crimes to be virtues. No marvel then that men's judgment of themselves should often be erroneous.

30. Sins of ignorance are yet sins, and need forgiveness as well as others, v. 12. Henry: "The best of men have reason to suspect themselves guilty of many secret faults, and to pray to God to cleanse them from that guilt, and not to lay it to their charge; for even our sins of infirmity and inadvertency, and our secret sins would be our ruin, if God should deal with us according to the desert of them. Even secret faults are defiling, and render us unfit for communion with God; but when they are pardoned, we are cleansed from them," 1 John i. 7. Beware of secret sins.

31. Some sins are worse than others. All sins are criminal, but some are presumptuous, v. 13. "These we should particularly lament, against these we should particularly pray."

32. Even regenerate men may commit great sins, enormous crimes. Left to themselves they are as weak as water, vv. 12, 13. Rivet: "Inasmuch as David, who here calls himself the servant of God, and who was truly such, confesses his need of divine restraint so that he may not boldly and impudently break the law of God, and fall into transgressions, it is clear that no one should so far presume on his own virtue or strength, as to regard himself beyond the possibility of the worst falls, as Paul also teaches, 1 Cor. x. 12;" Morison: "One secret sin, unsubdued, may plunge the soul into perdition; but open, glaring, and presumptuous transgression may lead at once to the double 'shipwreck of faith and a good conscience,' and may render the subject of it an equal outcast from earth and heaven. It will not do in the face of such imminent dangers as this, to indulge the fearful, and, I had almost said infernal, casuistry, how far a man may be plunged into the gulf of sin and yet be recovered?"

33. If sin has dominion over us, we are its servants and not the servants of God, v. 13; Rom. vi. 16.

34. Though some sins are less than others, yet the tendency of all sin is to ruin; and the least sins often lead to the worst; and a great sin often leads to many lesser sins, vv. 12, 13.

35. Constantly and in all things we need divine grace, v. 14. Dickson: "As pardoning grace, and preventing grace, and restraining grace must be prayed for; so also powerful, sanctifying, or enabling grace, both for inward and outward service; yea, and grace accepting the service when it is offered, must be sought for by prayer to God."

36. Sherlock: "The best of men have their failings, and an honest Christian may be a weak one: but weak as he may be, the goodness and sincerity of his heart will entitle him to put up the petition of v. 14, which no hypocrite or cunning deceiver can ever make use of."

37. Everywhere as here the Scriptures call our serious attention to the words of our mouth, v. 14. Let men take heed to their tongues.

38. Yet out of the heart are the issues of life. As a man thinketh in his heart so is he, v. 14. If our thoughts are not such as to please God, we may be sure our lives are not holy.

39. Gloriously is Christ the end of the law, meeting its demands, satisfying its claims, bringing in everlasting righteousness. All depends on him, who is our strength and our Redeemer, v. 14. Dickson: "As all our prayers, and all our holy endeavors, and abilities to serve God must be furnished unto us by our Redeemer, who is Jesus Christ: so also every other grace, and the acceptance of our persons and services must come through him."

40. Sherlock: "The piety of this Psalm is so natural, and yet so exalted; so easy to be understood, so adapted to move the affections, that it is hardly possible to read it with any attention, without feeling something of the same spirit by which it was indited."

PSALM XX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 THE LORD hear thee in the day of trouble; the name of the God of Jacob defend thee;
- 2 Send thee help from the sanctuary, and strengthen thee out of Zion;
- 3 Remember all thy offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifice; Selah.
- 4 Grant thee according to thine own heart, and fulfil all thy counsel.
- 5 We will rejoice in thy salvation, and in the name of our God we will set up our banners: the LORD fulfil all thy petitions.
- 6 Now know I that the LORD saveth his anointed; he will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand.
- 7 Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God.
- 8 They are brought down and fallen: but we are risen, and stand upright.
- 9 Save, LORD: let the king hear us when we call.

FOR an explanation of the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. That David wrote this Psalm is generally agreed. Those who think differently give no sufficient reason for their views. On this matter the title is decisive. Scott dates it B. C. 1037; Clarke, B. C. 1036. This is conjectural rather than historical. There is nothing, by which the particular year of its composition can be ascertained. It is supposed by both these writers to be of the same date with Psalm xxi. Patrick, Pool, Dodd, Scott, Clarke and others, following the Syriac, think it probable (from v. 7) that it was composed by David to be used in prayer for his success in his great expedition against the Ammonites and Syrians, who came with vast numbers of horses and chariots to fight with him, 2 Sam. x. 6, 8; 1 Chron. xix. 7. Arama supposes it to have been composed on the occasion of David's great victory over the Philistines. Luther: "It seems to me as if David had composed this Psalm, that it might serve as a devout and pious battle-cry, whereby he might admonish himself and the people, and draw them to prayer;" Calvin: "The design of the Holy Spirit, in my judgment, was to deliver to the church a common form of prayer, which, as we may gather from the words, was to be used whenever she was threatened with any danger. God commands his people, in general, to pray for kings, but there was a special reason, and one which did not apply to any other kingdom, why prayer was to be made in behalf of this kingdom; for it was only by the hand of David and his seed that God had determined to govern and maintain his people. It is particularly to be noticed, that under the figure of this temporal kingdom, there was described a government far more excellent, on which the whole joy and felicity of the church depended. The object, therefore, which David had expressly in view, was to exhort all the children of God to cherish such a holy solicitude about the kingdom of Christ, as would stir them up to continual prayer in its behalf." This view is perhaps to be preferred; though the Chaldee explicitly applies the whole to Messiah, the king; Abenezra says some interpret it of Messiah; and Ainsworth says, The whole Psalm is a prophecy of Christ's sufferings, and his deliverances out of them, for which the church with him triumpheth. Horne also applies it all directly to Christ. Yet the view of Calvin is more natural, consistent throughout and no less evangelical and heavenly in its doctrines.

This Psalm can be well interpreted without making it a dialogue as Mudge, Morison, Clarke and Tholuck have done.

The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

The verbs hear, defend, etc., in the Hebrew are in the future. See Introduction, § 6. Jebb prefers the future; Fry, the present tense. But the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin, church of England, Edwards, Amesius, Venema, Hammond, Ainsworth, Diodati, Patrick, Pool, Henry, Scott, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others properly prefer the optative form, as in the English text.

1. The LORD hear thee in the day of trouble. Hear, commonly rendered answer. It means so to hear as to answer, as in Ps. iii. 4; iv. 1 and often. For trouble the Doway, following the Vulgate, has tribulation. The same Hebrew word is found in Ps. ix. 9; x. 1. It is elsewhere rendered affliction, distress, adversity, anguish. The name of the God of Jacob defend thee. The name of God is here put for God himself. This is often done in Scripture, Deut. xxviii. 58; Neh. ix. 5; Ps. xlv. 8, 20; Pr. xviii. 10. God's essence is hid from us; his name is that by which he is known to us. The prayer is that all whereby we know God may defend the king. God remarkably defended Jacob in great perils. This may be the reason why his name is here introduced. Jacob is also a name of God's church. Jehovah is the God of all Israel, and keeps his people as the apple of his eye. The sense is perhaps this: May he who is the God of the whole church defend thee. Defend, set thee up, set thee on high, exalt thee, make thee safe, Is. ix. 11; Ps. lxix. 29; Job xxxvi. 22; Pr. xxix. 25. Hengstenberg thinks defend here is to transfer to a high and secure place. Waterland and Houbigant read, Raise thee up.

2. Send thee help from the sanctuary. For sanctuary, Jebb and Fry read the holy place; Calvin, Venema, and Alexander follow the Chaldee and Syriac, and read his sanctuary. Help was said to come from the abode of the ark, 1 Kings viii. 29-49. The holy place, the sanctuary was pre-eminently God's earthly residence. Send, commonly so rendered. Help, always so rendered. The appeal is to God's covenant, of which the prescribed worship of the temple was a sign and memorial. And strengthen thee out of Zion. Strengthen, so rendered in Ps. xli. 3; civ. 15, elsewhere uphold, establish, refresh, several times comfort, Pr. xx. 28; Ps. xciv. 18; Isa. ix. 7; 1 Kings xiii. 7; Jud. xix. 5, 8. Calvin: "As God, by appointing mount Zion to be the place where the faithful should continually worship him, had joined the kingdom and priesthood together, David, in putting into the lips of the people a prayer for help out of Zion doubtless had an eye to this sacred bond of union. Hence I conjecture that this Psalm was composed by David in his old age, and about the close of his life."

3. Remember all thy offerings. Remember, commonly so rendered; sometimes think upon, be mindful of, record, recount, make mention of. The word may be taken either in a good or bad sense, the connection determining, Hos. vii. 2; Neh. vi. 14. Here it is evidently in a good sense; Remember for good. Offerings; Ainsworth and Edwards: oblations; Venema, Jebb, Amesius and Alexander: gifts; Hengstenberg:

meat-offerings. The same word is found in Gen. iv. 3-5. Elsewhere in that book it is always rendered present, Gen. xxxii. xxxiii. In Exodus, Leviticus and Numbers it is almost without exception rendered meat-offering. It is the name of a gift to God or to man, Is. xxxix. 1; Hos. x. 6; Ps. xl. 6. Here it clearly points to the meat-offering, which was consumed by fire on the altar, and was offered with oil and incense for a memorial, Lev. ii. 1-3. The prayer proceeds: And accept thy burnt sacrifice. Accept, turn to ashes, consume with fire, that is, express acceptance by causing fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice. The same word is often rendered to make fat, Pr. xi. 25; xiii. 4; xxviii. 25; Is. xxxiv. 7. The margin allows this reading here. Hengstenberg: "The word signifies to make fat and then to declare fat, good, to accept with satisfaction." Our version gives the sense. Burnt sacrifice; the old versions use whole burnt-offering. The sense of both clauses of this verse is a prayer for the public and divine acceptance of the king in each act of solemn prescribed worship. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

4. Grant thee according to thine own heart, and fulfil all thy counsel. Heart and counsel in the usual sense. Counsel as in Ps. i. 1. Calvin: "As it would be absurd to ask God to grant foolish and wicked desires, it is to be regarded as certain, that there is here described a king who was neither given to ambition, nor inflamed with avarice, nor actuated by whatever the unruly passions might suggest, but wholly intent on the charge which was committed, and entirely devoted to the advancement of the public good; so that he asks nothing but what the Holy Spirit dictated to him, and what God, by his own mouth, commanded him to ask."

5. We will rejoice in thy salvation. Hengstenberg, Alexander and others continue the optative form, May we rejoice, etc. The original bears this construction. Calvin has, That we may rejoice, etc., thus stating the effect of granting former petitions. But many versions besides that in common use suggest a better sense by making the petitioners here express joy through confidence in the salvation, or safety, or deliverance of their king in the great enterprize which he had on hand. Any one of these renderings is good. Each shows the same pious state of mind. The first is perhaps to be preferred. And in the name of our God we will set up our banners. The same remarks as on the preceding clause apply to the construction here. To set up banners is to display ensigns of victory, to hold up signals of triumph already effected or confidently expected. Horsley: "The sense is, We will take the field against our enemies, in full reliance upon God's assistance." For set up banners Street following the Septuagint reads grow great. Conquerors displayed many ensigns and trophies, thus declaring the greatness of their achievements. The LORD fulfil all thy petitions. Our version, church of England and others here return to the optative form. Fulfil, i. e., grant to the full extent all thy petitions. In Ps. xxxvii. 4 the same word is rendered desires of thine heart.

6. Now know I that the LORD saveth his anointed. Clarke supposes the speaker here to be the high-priest, after the victim was consumed. Morison thinks it is David himself, or his great antitype. Fry supposes Christ himself is the speaker. But the weight of opinion is against these views. There is no necessity for supposing a new speaker here. In the Psalms a change in number and person is common. Alexander: "The change to the first person singular does not indicate a different speaker, but merely puts what follows into the mouth of each individual believer or of the whole body viewed as an ideal person." The Hebrew rendered saveth is literally hath saved; thus expressing high confidence that the thing will as surely be done as if it had already been accomplished. I know; I have an assurance without doubt. His anointed, literally Messiah. David was God's anointed, but Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah, the Christ, the anointed in a much higher sense than all who came before him, or shall come after him. He received the oil of gladness. He had the Spirit without measure. The next clause has the future form of the verb. He will hear from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand. Calvin: He will hear from the heavens of his sanctuary, in the mightiness of the salvation of his right hand; church of England: And will hear him from his holy heaven, even with the wholesome strength of his right hand; Mudge: He will answer him from his holy heavens; with the victorious prowess of his right arm; Edwards: He will answer him from the holy heavens with the victorious strength of his right hand; Houbigant: He will hear him from his holy heavens: the salvation of his right hand will be most powerful; Ainsworth: He answereth him out of the heavens of his holiness, with powers the salvation of his right hand; Fry: He answereth from his holy heavens—in mighty deeds is the victory of his right hand; Hengstenberg: He hears from his holy heaven, through his right hand salutary exploits. Diodati thinks the last clause equivalent to these words, with miracles and glorious effects of his power. Horsley's exposition is: "In all situations of power and strength, whatever a man's natural means of deliverance may be, his preservation must be the work of God's right hand." The idea of the last clause of the text is elsewhere in Scripture expressed more clearly, as in Ps. cxviii. 16, the right hand of the LORD is exalted; the right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly. See also Ps. lxxxix. 13; Ex. xv. 6. The right hand is the emblem of strength and prowess.

7. Some trust in chariots, and some in horses: but we will remember the name of the LORD our God. Lowth:

These in chariots, and those in horses;

But we in the name of Jehovah our God will be strong.

The word trust is not found in the Hebrew anywhere in this Psalm, nor is it supplied by any of the ancient versions. The substance of what is taught is no doubt given by our version and by Calvin in the French, both using trust. Fry has boast. The correct rule in all such cases is to supply the verb from the immediate context, if that will make good sense. In this verse we have such a verb, remember, for the significations of which see on v. 3. We may adopt any one of the significations there given, and supply it here, and the sense will be good. Thus we may read: Some think upon chariots, and some upon horses, but we will think upon the name of the Lord our God; or, Some make mention of chariots, and some of horses, but we will make mention of the Lord our God. As the verb in another form is used in v. 3 it is probably repeated here with design; q. d., As God remembers the offerings of our anointed king, we will remember his name. For he is the LORD our God; ours by a gracious, glorious covenant.

8. They are brought down and fallen; i. e., those who trust in chariots and those who trust in horses are brought down; Calvin, Edwards and Jebb, bowed down; Fry, bent down; Alexander, bowed; Hengstenberg, stoop. The Hebrew in some forms expresses the couching of a beast, Num. xxiv. 9. In Judges v. 27 it is thrice applied to Sisera. Sometimes it expresses kneeling, 1 Kings viii. 54. In 2 Kings ix. 24 it is sunk down. Are fallen; the verb is often followed by the phrase, by the sword. It here signifies complete overthrow and powerlessness to do further harm. Not so those who remember the name of the Lord. They say: But we are risen and stand upright, as men neither discomfited, nor disheartened. Calvin: Are risen and are erect; Edwards: Rise and stand firm; Hengstenberg: Rise and stand upright. The verbs in this verse are all in the preterite. Alexander: "Here, as in v. 6, the past tense expresses the certainty of the event, or rather the confidence with which it is expected.—The last verb occurs only here in this form, which is properly reflexive, and may be explained to mean, We have straightened ourselves up."

9. Save, LORD; let the king hear us when we call. Calvin, Amesius, Hengstenberg and Alexander give the same punctuation as in our version. But there is great diversity both in pointing and in translating the verse. Venema: Jehovah has saved the king; he will hear us in the day when we shall call; Street:

Jehovah hath saved the king,
He answereth us always, when we invoke him;

Edwards: Jehovah save the king, and hear us when we call upon thee; Houbigant: May Jehovah save the king, and hear us, when we call; Jebb: O LORD, save the king: hear us in the day when we call; Fry: O Jehovah, give the victory to the king: he heareth us in the day of our calling; Ainsworth: Jehovah, save thou the king, he answers us in the day we call; Waterland: Lord save the king: he will hear us when we call; Horsley: Jehovah hath saved the king, and will hear us when we call; Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway: O Lord, save the king: and hear us in the day that we shall call upon thee; church of England: Save, LORD; and hear us, O King of heaven, when we call upon thee; Hammond: Lord, save the king. He will hear us in the day of our calling; Chaldee: O Lord, redeem us; O mighty King, receive our prayer in the day of our invocation; Syriac: The Lord shall deliver us, and our king shall hear us. It must be confessed that there is great difficulty in this passage, not in finding a good sense, but in knowing the mind of the Spirit. The Hebrew would indicate a pause at the words save LORD; but the pointing is not infallible, and Pool asserts, perhaps he proves, that the pause in the sense does not invariably attend similar pointing. Some think that by king, the King of kings is spoken of. If so, then our version is right. Others suppose Christ alone is intended by the king; and that he is supplicated. Others think that by king, David is pointed out. If so, the Septuagint rendering is to be preferred. It is surely unusual to mingle in the same song and even in the same verse prayers to Jehovah and requests to any creature, though he be a type of Christ. Perhaps it is best to read the whole thus: Jehovah, save the king, meaning David, both as a leader of Israel and a type of Christ; and then to give the last clause in the future: He [the Lord] will hear us when we call. This requires a change from the second to the third person, but that is very common. Alexander: "By taking the last verb as a future proper the Psalm may be made to close with a confident anticipation of God's blessing." The words save and hear in this verse evidently allude to v. 6. Patrick thus paraphrases it: "Let it be unto us, O LORD, according to our desires, and our hopes: preserve our king; and in the day when we cry unto thee for help, make our armies victorious." Clarke thinks the easiest way of making all plain is to paraphrase it thus: "Lord, save David, and David will save us. If thou preserve him, he will be thy minister for good to us." These views of Patrick and Clarke are inserted rather out of respect to their authors than from confidence in their correctness.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God's word invests the persons and acts of lawful rulers with a high dignity, teaching all, whom they govern, to pray for them, vv. 1-5; compare 1 Tim. ii. 1-3. Jeremiah called his prince "the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, under whose shadow we shall live among the heathen," Lam. iv. 20. Abuse of lawful magistrates is no part of true piety.

2. The greatest men, even mighty kings, are subject to sorrow, and need the prayers of others, and the help of God.

3. When our troubles are so great and grievous as to lead us directly to God, we often get a safe deliverance from them, or a sanctified use of them much sooner than when they are lighter or less sharp.

4. None but a foolish and wicked man would make light of the prayers of the humblest people in his behalf. Henry: "Even great and good men, and those that know well how to pray for themselves, must not despise, but earnestly desire the prayers of others for them, even those that are their inferiors in all respects." David composed this Psalm that the people might pray for him.

5. Cobbin: "A praying nation is not disregarded in heaven. In some way or other they shall see an answer to their prayers, and shall be able to rejoice in God's salvation."

6. In all trouble, personal, domestic, or national, prayer is the best resort of high and low. On earth no man is so afflicted, or forsaken, or beset by the wicked, that God cannot save him, and no man is so great as not to need help from on high. Henry: "David, though a man of business, a man of war, was constant to his devotions; though he had prophets, and priests, and many good people among his subjects to pray for him, he did not think that excused him from praying for himself."

7. The church has experience of the power, pity, care and faithfulness of her God and friend. He is the God of Jacob, v. 1. He will treat every believer as faithfully and defend him as effectually as he did the patriarch Jacob in his eventful life. God will not, cannot forsake his people, because they are his, and because it would be contrary to all his past dealings with them, and a disregard of all his relations to them. The name—the perfections, and the providence of Jehovah, shall defend those, whose cause God espouses.

8. The relations of God to his people are by a gracious compact. Of that covenant Zion, the sanctuary, and all the accepted worship in it were signs, v. 2. Help from the sanctuary is federal.

9. When in anything we get help in God's appointed way, it is not only sweet in itself, but a pledge of farther good, v. 2. Help from Zion and the sanctuary has in all ages been uniform and of like excellent nature.

10. How admirable is the condescension of God, making himself known in Zion, and the sanctuary as he has, v. 2. If he is to reveal himself at all, how could he do it more seasonably, more graciously, more instructively, or in a more captivating way than he has done in his law and gospel, his word and worship?

11. Accepted worship is an amazing mercy. No wonder it is greatly desired by good men, v. 3. It is an infallible token of all truly good things here and hereafter.

12. It is an inestimable blessing to have good rulers, for the granting of whose wishes and fulfilling of whose plans we can heartily pray, v. 3.

13. True religion and accepted worship are always substantially the same. Luther: "As in the new law, there are other persons, other matters, other times, other places, so are there also other sacrifices; though still there remain one faith and one spirit; the external only has changed, the internal remains the same."

14. As the pious Jew had his thank-offerings, so he had his bloody sacrifices for atonement, v. 3. In like manner sinners, in the midst of their thanks and praises, must not forget that now, as in the days of Abel or Aaron, without the shedding of blood, even the precious blood of Christ, there is no remission.

15. God certainly and gloriously concurs with good wishes, good counsels, pious prayers, vv. 4, 5. His whole nature and purposes lead him precisely in that direction. Henry: "Those, who make it their business to glorify God, may expect that God will, one way or other, gratify them; and they who walk in his counsel may promise themselves that he will fulfil theirs."

16. The more we have prayed for a deliverance, and the more manifestly it is from God, the greater is our joy, v. 5.

17. When we set up our banners, engage in any necessary contest or conflict, personal or national, or give expression to the joys of victory, it ought always to be in the name of our God, v. 5. David went forth against Goliath in the name of the Lord of hosts, and so he slew him, 1 Sam. xvii. 45-51. All issues are with God. We have no more right to make war like atheists, than we have to live without God in the world in times of peace.

18. Those, who are sharers in the church's afflictions shall also be partakers of her glorious victories, vv. 1-5.

19. Dickson: "A believer may be sure that he hath his request granted, when he hath prayed according to God's will; in special when he prayeth for the safety of the church and kingdom of Christ. 'I know that the Lord saveth his anointed,'" v. 6.

20. As neglect of prayer makes faith weak, so lively prayer greatly strengthens our reliance on God's word, vv. 1-6.

21. Often in Scripture is salvation made to appear in close union with the anointed of the Lord, v. 6. If the deliverance is temporal in the kingdom of David, yet it must be by him whom God anointed for that end. Much more is eternal salvation by the great Anointed, CHRIST, THE MESSIAH.

22. Everywhere in Scripture the law has a shadow of good things to come, even the sanctuary being a type of heaven itself, vv. 2, 6. Compare Heb. viii. ix. Calvin: "Under the visible sanctuary, which was made with hands, there is set forth the fatherly goodness of God, and his familiarity with his people; while, under the heavenly sanctuary, which was not made with hands, there is shown his infinite power, dominion and majesty."

23. Vain is the confidence of all wickedness. In war, chariots, horses, navies, numbers, discipline, former successes are relied on; but the battle is not to the strong. "Providence favors the strong battalions" may sound well in a worldling's ear; but neither providence nor the Bible so teaches. In peace riches, friends, ships, farms, stocks are relied upon, yet they can neither help nor save. Let him that glorieth glory in the Lord, v. 7.

24. Very different are the effects of religious truth on different minds, v. 7. God's servants think on his name with delight; but the wicked with aversion. The saints know that the worst which comes is right, because sent by God; but this reconciles no wicked man to sad events. The pious think on God in prosperity; but at that time the wicked despise him. The righteous fear God and cling to him; the wicked fear him and are driven from his presence by terror. They remember God and are troubled.

25. The righteous put nothing with God to form the basis of their joy and trust. He alone is enough. They need neither help, nor guidance, nor wisdom, nor strength, nor righteousness but in him alone, v. 7.

26. In its power over human nature the faith of God's elect is the most wonderful principle known. It walks in darkness, has no light, and yet trusts in the Lord. It endures as seeing him, who is invisible. It anticipates victories when appearances are all against it, v. 7. Dickson: "That which terrifieth the believer in the first assault of a temptation, before he go to his refuge, is contemned by the believer when he looks to the Lord, his true defence."

27. This is not marvellous, for a change in the positions and states of saints and sinners must come, vv. 7, 8. God's word makes it sure. The righteous sees it coming; the wicked does not.

28. As often as the grasp of true faith is weakened or slackened, it must and will renew its hold on the covenant and perfections of God, v. 9.

29. The atheism of nations respecting God's dealings with them is commonly much more striking in their latter than in their early history—in their fulness and prosperity, than in their weakness and besetments. This Psalm would hardly be acceptable to a whole people, on whom wealth and victory had long exerted their usually corrupting influence.

30. The bearing of this whole Psalm on the great ANOINTED and his kingdom is generally and piously admitted by the best commentators. Scott: "In answer to the hopes and prayers of the Old Testament church, the anointed King of God's people came in the appointed season: he was heard in the day of his trouble; his sacrifice was accepted; his intercessions have prevailed; his kingdom has been set up; and we are called to partake of its blessings." Morison: "The desire of Messiah's heart, in the salvation of millions of perishing sinners, was granted to him, and all his counsels, purposes, and plans have succeeded, and shall ultimately triumph over all the opposition of earth and hell. . . Nor shall one petition for himself or his church fall to the ground ineffectual. All shall be heard, all shall be answered; and each member of the redeemed family shall share his inalienable part in the intercession of his Lord." Calvin: "Since Christ our King, being an everlasting priest, never ceases to make intercession with God, the whole body of the church should unite in prayer with him; and farther, we can have no hope of being heard except he go before us, and conduct us to God."

31. In the great conflict between Christ and the dragon the issue is not doubtful. A battle may seem to be lost, but the war must end in the triumph of truth, in the reign of righteousness, in the crowning of Messiah. Luther: "How should God not hear when his kingdom, his interest, his honor are in danger?"

32. Really good wishes are good things, and should be expressed in words and deeds. The whole Psalm thus teaches. "Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty. There may be a great deal of obliging kindness in that which costs us little."

PSALM XXI.

To the Chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 THE king shall joy in thy strength, O LORD; and in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice!

2 Thou hast given him his heart's desire, and hast not withholden the request of his lips. Selah.

3 For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness: thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head.

4 He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever.

5 His glory is great in thy salvation: honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him.

6 For thou hast made him most blessed for ever: thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance.

7 For the king trusteth in the LORD, and through the mercy of the Most High he shall not be moved.

8 Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies: thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee.

9 Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thine anger: the LORD shall swallow them up in his wrath, and the fire shall devour them.

10 Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth, and their seed from among the children of men.

11 For they intended evil against thee: they imagine a mischievous device, which they are not able to perform.

12 Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back, when thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them.

13 Be thou exalted, LORD, in thine own strength: so will we sing and praise thy power.

FOR an explanation of the title see on Psalms iii. iv.

But few of the Psalms, without testimony from other parts of Scripture, are more clearly of Davidic authorship than this. There is no good reason for doubting that he wrote it. Clarke and Scott both give to it the same date as to Psalm xx.; Clarke B. C. 1036, and Scott B. C. 1037. The precise date is not known.

The application of this Psalm is not confined to any particular occasion. Theodoret singularly supposes it to have been written on occasion of the sickness and recovery of king Hezekiah. There is no evidence to support this opinion. Delaney and Tholuck think it was composed by David in the height of his joy and in the spirit of thanksgiving after the conquest of Rabbah, and the victory over the Ammonites, 2 Sam. xii. 26–31. This opinion, though less improbable than the foregoing, needs confirmation. Mudge thinks the Psalm of the same kind as Ps. xx. Calvin says its subject is almost the same. Some have thought that this Psalm relates to the fulfilment of the prayer in that. Alexander thinks neither the structure nor contents would justify this view. He says these two songs “are rather parallel than consecutive, the principal difference being this, that while the twentieth Psalm relates to the specific case of assistance and success in war, the twenty-first has reference to the whole circle of divine gifts bestowed upon the Lord’s Anointed.”

The most important matter relates to its aspect towards Christ. The Chaldee and several Jewish interpreters apply it to Messiah. On this point Calvin is very decided: “Above all, it was the design of the Holy Spirit here to direct [the minds of the faithful to Christ, who was the end and perfection of this kingdom [of David], and to teach the whole people that they could not be saved except under the head which God himself had appointed over them.” Ainsworth is no less disposed to give it a distinct and direct reference to Christ. With him agree Horne, Horsley, Fry and others. On the Messianic character of the Psalm see Introduction, § 8, and the preceding Psalm. The church of England uses it on Ascension day.

The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD and Gel-yohn Most High, on which see above on Ps. i. 2; vii. 17.

This Psalm is not dramatic; though some have thought differently, and introduce several speakers. That would not necessarily vary the practical truths taught.

1. The king shall joy in thy strength, O LORD. The king; Chaldee has King Messiah; Street, a king; others, the king, i. e., David, the king of Israel, the type of Christ. Shall joy; some read, will joy, elsewhere, be glad, or rejoice, Ps. v. 11; ix. 2; xiv. 7; xvi. 9. The king shall be glad in thy strength; i. e., says Diodati, in the effects of thy sovereign power, which thou hast unfolded for his deliverance, victory, preservation and exaltation. Strength, the same word as in Ps. viii. 2, elsewhere rendered as here, also might, power. It never signifies authority. The prophet here celebrates the divine efficiency. And in thy salvation how greatly shall he rejoice! Salvation, sometimes help, or deliverance, more commonly, salvation, Ps. iii. 2, 8; xiii. 5; xiv. 7; xviii. 50. Greatly; elsewhere exceedingly, mightily, diligently, especially, loudly, very much, Gen. vii. 19; Deut. vi. 3; Ps. xxxi. 11; cxix. 4, 107; Nah. ii. 1. Ainsworth prefers vehemently. Rejoice; like the first verb, it is rendered not only as here commonly, but be glad, be joyful. Amesius, Edwards, Fry and Alexander prefer exult; Hammond: Rejoice and triumph exceedingly; Venema: Is carried to the highest exultation. Both the verbs in this verse are in the future. Alexander says this shows "that the gift has not yet been consummated, without excluding the idea of it as begun already."

2. Thou hast given him his heart's desire. Hast given, appointed, ordained, made, delivered, sent. It was purely the act of God. And hast not withholden the request of his lips. Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Fry also read request; Ainsworth, earnest request; Doway, will; Hengstenberg, desire; Alexander, quest. Hengstenberg: "The silent wish and the spoken prayer stand in contrast;" Luther: "The arrangement is certainly fine here, namely, that the prayer of the heart must go before, without which the prayer of the lips is an unprofitable howling." For remarks on Selah see Introduction, § 15.

3. For thou preventest him with the blessings of goodness. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, Diodati, Edwards and Pool render the verb in the past tense; Chaldee, Calvin, church of England, Venema, Jebb and Alexander in the future; Amesius, Ainsworth, Fry and Hengstenberg in the present. In Hebrew both the verbs of this verse are in the future. The most common rendering of the first verb is by the word prevent, which is literal and which in the early stages of English literature signified the same as the Latin prævenio, go before or come before, not hinder. Fry has meetest; Hengstenberg, surprisest. See Ps. xvii. 13; xviii. 5. With the blessings of goodness; Ainsworth, church of England and Alexander do not differ from the common version; Calvin, Amesius and Venema: With the blessings of good; Vulgate and others which follow it: With blessings of sweetness; Arabic: With the best blessings; Syriac: With the best blessing; Edwards: With the choicest blessings; Fry and Hengstenberg: With the blessings of prosperity. The word rendered goodness is found in Ps. iv. 6; xiv. 1, 3; xvi. 2. Castalio renders the clause: Thou hast bestowed most eminent favors on him. Calvin: "The king shall want nothing which is requisite to make his life in every respect happy, since God of his own good pleasure will anticipate his wishes and enrich him with an abundance of all good things." Diodati: Thou hast prevented him with thy graces and benefits, which thou hast bestowed upon him of thine own free will. Thou settest a crown of pure gold on his head. For remarks on the word rendered pure gold, see Ps. xix. 10. This is the clause which led Patrick, Morison and Clark to suppose that the crown alluded to is that mentioned in 2 Sam. xii. 30; 1 Chron. xx. 2. But this gives a very low sense. David was hardly so weak as to be tickled with a flashing gewgaw taken from the head of an idolatrous enemy; nor would he be apt to mention it in devout song. The lowest admissible sense is that the crown is the emblem of royal majesty; and so the meaning would be that God had, even when he was thinking of no such blessing, given him a kingdom. But as Patrick well says, "Truly there are some things in this Psalm which are more literally fulfilled in CHRIST than in David;" so it is with ease that we refer this expression, through David, to his seed, Christ. Of him language of the same import had been used in Ps. ii. 6; viii. 5. The same imagery is found carried forward into the latest prophecy, Rev. xiv. 14; xix. 12, 16, where it is applied to the glorified person of our Redeemer. Hengstenberg: "The setting on of the crown marks the bestowment of dominion. David was crowned, as it were, anew,—or even for the first time, for the earlier crowning did not come, in this respect, into consideration,—when he received that great promise of the everlasting supremacy of his offspring," 2 Sam. vii. "That respect could not be had to David's first crowning, or to the conferring on him of the kingly office in general, is shown by the following context, which is to be regarded as a farther enlargement of the words before us." Scott: "The passage, in its fullest import, can only be accomplished in Christ himself." Calvin and others express themselves much to the same effect. Gill: "This crown being of pure gold denotes the purity, glory, solidity, and perpetuity of his kingdom."

4. He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway: He asked life of thee: and thou hast given him length of days forever and ever; Calvin: He asked life from thee, and thou hast given him length of days forever and ever; church of England: He asked life of thee, and thou gavest him a long life, even forever and ever; Ainsworth: Life he asked of thee, thou gavest it him; length of days ever and aye; Venema: Life he asked of thee, and thou gavest it him; thou wilt give him long life to everlasting; Amesius: Life he asked of thee, thou gavest it him, even length of days forever and everlastingly; Jebb: Life he asked of thee: Thou gavest him length of days for ever and ever; Fry: He asked of thee life—thou gavest it him; Lengthening of days forever and ever. Edwards: He asked life of thee; thou hast given him length of days forever and ever; Hengstenberg: He asked of thee life, thou gavest him long life forever and ever; Alexander: Life he asked of thee, thou hast given (it) to him, length of days, perpetuity and eternity. Both the verbs in this verse are in the same form. The rendering, asked, and gavest, is the best. Horsley for life reads immortality, and for length of days, the whole extent of infinite duration, but this is not translation. The Chaldee has it, Eternal life he asked, etc.; and Diodati says that the phrase, length of days, "is to be referred to eternal life, which David had assurance of by God's Spirit, besides temporal blessings, Matt. xix. 29; 1 Tim. iv. 8; Eph. iii. 20. Or else to the continuance of his kingdom in his posterity until the coming of Christ, who should change it into an everlasting kingdom, 2 Sam. vii. 19." The life David is here said to have asked for was not eternal life, a blessed immortality; this would have made his prayer and the blessing secured in no wise different from that of any other pious man; but the life he asked was his natural life, which for a long time was in hourly peril, hunted by Saul and his men like a partridge on the mountains. This life he asked might not be taken away, and he had his wish, and a great deal more. He lived to a good old age, died in peace, was succeeded in the throne by his own posterity while the polity of the Jewish people lasted, and then God gave him a Son, who was at once the root and the offspring of David, and who has perpetuity and eternity in his kingdom. And as David's life was in danger, so often was the life of Jesus, the great stem of Jesse, but it was preserved in the midst of more deadly enemies than ever beset any other man, until his hour was come, when he breathed out his spirit into the hands of his Father, who speedily gave him a nobler life, so that he dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him, behold he is alive for evermore, Rom. vi. 9; Rev. i. 18; Heb. v. 7; vii. 25. The highest contrast in this verse is between the natural life of David in peril and the everlasting kingdom of his Son, as promised in 2 Sam. vii. 13, 16; Ps. lxxxix. 4, and as now possessed by him in heaven. Alexander: "The last words of the verse are often used adverbially to mean for ever and ever, but as they are both nouns, it is best to put them here in apposition with the same part of speech which immediately precedes." See above on Ps. ix. 5.

5. His glory is great in thy salvation. There is great uniformity in rendering this clause both in ancient and modern versions. Fry varies it thus: His glory is great in the victory thou givest. But in our version the word is never anywhere rendered victory, usually salvation, a very few times deliverance, help. We have the same word in Ps. iii. 8; xx. 5. Glory, commonly so rendered, sometimes honor. The verb in this clause must be supplied. Alexander prefers to give it in the future, shall be. The sense of the passage is that the great honor of David was, and the high glory of Immanuel should be manifestly through the power of God, and not by the wit of man. So the people devoutly confess. The next clause is of like import: Honour and majesty hast thou laid upon him. The variations in the rendering here are not very important. For honour and majesty Calvin has splendour and beauty. The first of these words is found in Ps. viii. 1, where it is rendered glory; the second, in Ps. viii. 5, where it is rendered honour. Both words are frequently rendered majesty; the latter sometimes comeliness as in Isa. liii. 2. The sense is that by whatever words dignity, majesty and excellence are expressed, they are all manifest in the throne of David, and shall be far more illustrious in that of his glorious offspring, Christ, the Son of God.

6. For thou hast made him most blessed for ever. Edwards follows our version. The Septuagint, Ethiopic and Arabic read, Thou wilt give to him a blessing, etc.; Chaldee, Syriac, Vulgate and Doway: Thou wilt give him to be a blessing, etc.; Calvin, Fabritius and Horne: Thou hast set him to be blessings forever; Venema: Thou wilt set him to be blessings forever; Amesius: Thou hast appointed to him blessings for ever; Ainsworth: Thou hast set him to be blessings for perpetual aye; Fry: Thou hast decreed him blessings forever; Jebb: Thou set on him blessings forever; church of England: Thou shalt give him everlasting felicity; Clarke: Thou hast set him for blessings forever; Hengstenberg: Thou settest him for blessing forever; Alexander: Thou wilt make him a blessing to eternity. Indeed it seems hardly possible to examine the verse with critical care without reaching the conclusion that our version is not so good as that given by several just cited. The verb rendered hast made is the same that is rendered settest in v. 3, though in the Hebrew in both these cases it is in the future. If the primary reference is to David and through him to Christ, which is perhaps the best interpretation, then the verb is best put in the past tense; but if it is a direct prophecy respecting Christ, then it is best to follow the original exactly. If it should be rendered set him to be blessings, then it is a declaration that he is set or shall be set to be the instrument or source of manifold blessings to others. In this case there is probably a reference to Gen. xii. 2. Some think the sense is that he is set as an example, showing how greatly God can bless one, and leading others to pray that they may be as highly favored. This is Calvin's view: "The king, abounding in all kinds of good things, was an illustrious pattern of the liberality of God." Yet it must be admitted that our version gives a good sense, and is not without support from parallel passages, which are rendered in the same way and with confessed propriety, as Pool shows. Hengstenberg: "The plural points to the rich fatness of the blessing." Thou hast made him exceeding glad with thy countenance. The Arabic, Syriac, Calvin, Ainsworth, Fabritius, Amesius, Edwards and Fry here use the past tense; Hengstenberg, the present; Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Venema, Jebb and Alexander, the future. The remarks on the tense in the first clause of this verse are applicable here. This gladness was imparted by God's countenance, see on Ps. iv. 6; xi. 7.

7. For the king trusteth in the LORD. The way of accounting for the preceding blessings is to point to their all sufficient cause, Jehovah, and to show that he, on whom the blessings came, was in communion with God by the exercise of pious confidence united with hope. See on Ps. iv. 5. It is added, And through the mercy of the Most High he shall not be moved. For the force of the word mercy see Ps. v. 7; xvii. 7. It signifies favor, goodness, loving-kindness. On Most High, see Ps. vii. 17. He shall not be moved; Venema: Shall not waver. He shall not be moved from his purpose, from his throne, from his honors, from his victories and successes, from the love and favor of Jehovah. The Chaldee reads it: King Messiah trusteth in Jehovah.

8. Thine hand shall find out all thine enemies: thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee. There seems to be no good cause for varying the rendering of these two clauses as is done by the Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Doway and church of England. In the Hebrew the verbs are the same, and both in the future. By far the most common rendering of these verbs is find, sometimes find out, then get hold upon. Edwards in each case has will reach; Fry, reacheth. Alexander: "If any difference of meaning was intended, it is probably not greater than that between find and find out in English." In Num. xi. 22 our version has suffice. Calvin says some "explain the verse as if it had been said, Thy hand shall be able for all thine enemies, thy right hand shall find out those that hate thee. Thus the sentence will ascend by degrees,—Thy hand shall be able to withstand, thy right hand shall lay hold upon thy enemies, so that they shall not escape destruction." Horsley favors this view: Thine hand shall be successful. There is no error taught by such a reading, but it is hardly supported. The reader will notice that the third person of v. 7 is here changed to the second person. Does not this verse receive its complete and highest fulfilment in Christ alone, who is maintained in his kingdom by all the perfections of God?

9. Thou shalt make them as a fiery oven in the time of thy anger. The ancient versions are quite harmonious in rendering this clause very much as we have it above. Some moderns vary considerably. Calvin, Venema, Rogers, Horsley and Walford: Thou shalt put [or place] them as it were into [or in] a furnace of fire. The verb is often rendered put, frequently set, sometimes appoint, lay, make. The word rendered oven is either oven or furnace. It occurs fifteen times in the Hebrew, and is four times rendered furnace; in all other cases oven. Both these images are employed in Scripture to represent the doom of God's foes. Horsley thinks this passage "describes the smoke of the Messiah's enemies perishing by fire, ascending like the smoke of a furnace." In the Apocalypse John says of the wicked: "The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever." Mant: "How awfully grand is that description of the ruins of the cities of the plain, as the prospect struck on Abraham's eye on the fatal morning of their destruction: 'And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and lo! the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.'" But the word here rendered oven is not that rendered furnace in Gen. xix. 28; but it is the word rendered oven in Mal. iv. 1. Pool thinks that the sense is that as "wood, when cast into an oven, is quickly consumed," so God will destroy his foes. Hengstenberg: "Thou wilt put them in such a condition that they shall be as if they were in a fiery oven." This shall be done in the time of thine anger. Surely the ultimate reference here must be to the Lamb and to the great day of his wrath. It is at once added: The LORD shall swallow them up in his wrath. Swallow up, the word used of the whale swallowing up Jonah, Jon. i. 17; of Aaron's rod swallowing up those of the magicians, Ex. vii. 12; of the dragon, Jer. li. 34. It intimates a total destruction, Ps. lvi. 1, 2, so that there is nothing of them left. And the fire shall devour them. Calvin: "It does not seem to me to be out of place to suppose, that in this clause, there is denounced against the enemies of Christ a destruction like that which God in old time sent upon Sodom and Gomorrah." Destruction as by fire is a just and frequent method of representing the overthrow of the wicked.

10. Their fruit shalt thou destroy from the earth. Fruit; Chaldee, children; Edwards, descendants; Fabritius and Clarke, posterity. Other versions commonly cited in this work give fruit. Speaking of children as fruit is very old, Gen. xxx. 2; Deut. vii. 13; xxviii. 4; Ps. cxxvii. 3; cxxxii. 11; Isa. xiii. 18; Lam. ii. 20; Hos. ix. 16; Mic. vi. 7. So that the Psalmist here teaches the same truth as in the next clause: And [thou shalt destroy] their seed from among the children of men. For awful instances of the destruction of the children of the wicked see Josh. vii. 23-26; Isa. xiv. 21, 22. That God will so deal with men he fully declares, Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Num. xiv. 18; Deut. v. 9. In accomplishing this work God may employ Joshua or Cyrus, as we have seen, or David and his anti-type, Messiah, as in this verse.

11. For they intended evil against thee. Intended evil; Edwards, laid out mischief; Alexander, stretched out evil. The meaning is they were intent upon doing mischief, and thought they had made all necessary arrangements to effect his ruin. The imagery is by some thought to be taken from weavers, who warp their yarn, or from archers, who bend their bows. Perhaps the latter is the better. They imagined a mischievous device. Calvin: They have devised a stratagem; Edwards: They have contrived a plot; Ainsworth: They have thought a crafty purpose; Fry: They formed a plan; Hengstenberg: They conceived designs; Alexander: They devised a plot. But it was a device, which they are not able to perform. If this world could be made as the wicked would have it, if they could bring to pass all the evil that is in their hearts, earth would soon differ but little from hell; but they are often as impotent as they are base and malignant. They are always so, when God sees best to restrain them. How true is this verse of the literal David and of Messiah also.

12. Therefore shalt thou make them turn their back, when thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them. The general import of this verse is no doubt given by our version, but the difficulty is in construing the Hebrew, so as fairly to get this sense. Perhaps the word when supplied in our version might as well be omitted, and the verse be left as vv. 8, 9, 10, in two distinct clauses. The first clause has several classes of renderings, which may here be noticed. The first substantially agrees with our version. The church of England and Jebb have it, Thou shalt put them to flight; Alexander: For thou shalt make them turn their back. The second is that suggested by the word shoulder, as given in the margin of our version. Some would read it, Thou wilt make them turn their shoulder. The Hebrew word is commonly in our version rendered shoulder. Here as in 1 Sam. ix. 2, where the same word is found, the sense, whether you read back or shoulder, is the same, equivalent to put to flight. But Hengstenberg renders it: For thou wilt make them for shoulder, which he paraphrases thus: Thou wilt transplant them into a condition, that they shall be altogether shoulder, thou wilt chase them in flight. Moller and Brent: Thou wilt make them a shoulder. This may be interpreted as Hengstenberg does his version; The Chaldee: Thou hast set them to thy people one shoulder. Hammond thinks this "signifies sure and uniform slaughter." The third rendering is that of Piscator and Calmet, Thou wilt place them as a heap of earth. The sense is either they shall be as the grave, where the earth is heaped up, or they shall be no more regarded than a heap of earth. The fourth construction is that of several Jewish writers, Thou wilt thrust them into a corner. They contend that the word rendered back sometimes signifies a corner. A fifth mode of translation is that of Mudge and Edwards, approved by Dodd and others: Thou wilt make them as Shechem; the original word rendered back being Shechem. They contend that the phrase is proverbial, and in proof refer to Ps. lx. 6; cviii. 7. The sense, they say, is, Thou shalt subdue them, and portion them out, as formerly the two brothers did Shechem. The sixth rendering is that of Calvin, Venema, Ainsworth, Castellio, Diodati, Pool, Horne and others: Thou wilt set them as a butt. Fry varies a little: Thou dost set them as a target; Horsley: Truly, thou shalt make them a butt for thine arrows. In support they refer to Job vii. 20; xvi. 12; Lam. iii. 12, where the same idea is brought forward. This is perhaps the best rendering. A shoulder seems in some way to have come in figurative language to signify a target, perhaps as a retreating foe's shoulders were mere targets to the archers. This rendering is favored by the last clause: When thou shalt, or, Thou shalt make ready thine arrows upon thy strings against the face of them. The imagery seems clearly taken from archery. In explanation of its use here see Ps. vii. 12, 13.

13. Be thou exalted, LORD, in thine own strength. This rendering agrees with the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Amesius, Piscator, Calmet, Fabritius, Ainsworth, Pool, Brent, Edwards and Jebb. But others vary. Calvin: Raise thyself, O Jehovah, in thy strength; Venema: Thou art high [or mayest thou be high,] Jehovah, in thy strength; Fry: Arise, O Jehovah, in thy strength; Hengstenberg: Praise to thee, O Lord, for thy strength; Alexander: Be high, Jehovah, in thy strength. Calvin, Henry, Scott and Fry regard this clause as a prayer, while Venema and Hengstenberg look upon it as praise. Scott: "This conclusion greatly resembles the first petitions, and closing doxology of the Lord's prayer." Fry: "The prayer of the redeemed of Christ must ever be agreeable with the closing verses of this Psalm: Hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.—So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord: but let them that love HIM be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might." But the parallelism is best preserved by making both clauses of the verse expressive of praise. Hengstenberg's paraphrase of the first member is: "Be exalted in our consciousness, i. e., praise to thee." Alexander: "Be high, exalted, both in thyself and in the praises of thy people." The power of God both in settling David and Messiah in their respective kingdoms is very illustrious. The Psalmist adds: So will we sing and praise thy power. Calvin's rendering is more full: Then we will sing, and celebrate in psalms thy power; Jebb: We will sing, and make a psalm to thy power; Fry: We will sing and chant thy might; Edwards: Let us sing and celebrate thy power. Alexander says the last verb always means to celebrate by music. In 1 Chron. xvi. 9, it is rendered sing psalms; in Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2, 11; xviii. 49, and many other places it is sing praise or sing praises.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Happy is that people, whose chief magistrate and all whose officers fear God, and joy in his strength, and in his salvation, v. 1. Such blessings are rare, but in a truly pious and patriotic mind they awaken high joy.

2. All effectual deliverances are from God, v. 1. If he saves, we may well defy all foes.

3. There are many reasons why God's people delight in his interpositions and rejoice in his salvation, v. 1. One is that he rescues so effectually. All foes are seen to be harmless. Another is that the deliverance was effected by so unexpected means. Another is that it came in the very nick of time. Nothing could be more seasonable. "God is never a moment too late with his mercies, but he sometimes comes just at the last moment."

4. The Scriptures do not repress or discourage the highest religious emotions. We have divine authority for rejoicing greatly and for being exceeding glad, vv. 1, 6. We may rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. So fear may rise so high that rottenness will enter into our bones, and love be stronger than death, and faith know that its Redeemer liveth. Those, who are truly converted, ought to have more religion. The present prevailing type of piety is too low.

5. In prayer the heart's desire and the request of the lips must agree, v. 2. God can never be pleased with an idle form. There is no substitute for sincerity. The cattle on a thousand hills are as nothing without the heart.

6. When the heart and lips unite in seeking things agreeable to God's will, we may confidently expect speedy answers and great mercies, v. 2. A full record of gracious answers to prayer would comprise nearly the whole of the history of believers.

7. If God is good to us, we ought to be ready to say so, v. 2. Henry: "God's gracious returns of prayer do, in a special manner, require our humble returns of praise."

8. A large portion of our blessings is given us before our asking or seeking, v. 3. Existence, reason, intellect, a birth in a Christian land, the calling of our nation to the knowledge of Christ, and Christ himself, with many other things, are unsought bestowed on men, as was David's right to the throne on him. No one ever asked for a Saviour till God of his own motion promised "the seed of the woman." God is always preventing men with the blessings of his goodness. Henry: "When God's blessings come sooner, and prove richer, than we imagine; when they are given before we prayed for them, before we were ready for them, nay, when we feared the contrary; then it may be truly said that he prevented us with them."

9. God is a sovereign over sovereigns, v. 3. He gives crowns and he takes them away. He is King of kings. The mightiest potentate on earth is a worm, a rod, a sword, a curse or a blessing in God's hand, as he is sent in mercy or in wrath.

10. Christ's crown and kingdom shall never be taken from him, vv. 3, 4. He is God's elect to all the ends and offices of a glorious and perpetual mediatorship. His human nature did not aspire to union with the divine; but the divine nature in amazing condescension sought union with the human. Christ is no usurper. He has right and title to all the glories of his everlasting and infinite possessions. Calvin: "The doctrine of the everlasting duration of the kingdom of Christ is, therefore, here established, seeing he was not placed upon the throne by the suffrages of men, but by God, who, from heaven, set the royal crown upon his head with his own hand."

11. It is lawful to pray for the continuance of life, v. 4. David did it. Hezekiah did it. Christ did it. We may pray earnestly for such a blessing; yet we must pray submissively, always adding as did our Lord, Nevertheless, not my will but thine be done, O Father. Life is not an absolute good. It is not a good of itself, as pardon and renewal and glory are. It is only a good when God makes it so. For several reasons and on several occasions we may greatly desire life. One is when wicked attempts are made to take it away, as in the case of David. Another is when we are in the midst of our days, and our departure out of the world would frustrate some important purpose, as the education of our children, or the accomplishment of some great design for the public good. The love of life, if not inordinate, is neither unnatural, a weakness, nor a sin.

12. God often gives more than we ask, v. 4. David asked for life and got majesty, and honor, and glory. The same is strikingly illustrated in Solomon, 2 Chron. i. 10-12, and in the case of every truly pious man, Mat. vi. 33. Nevins prayed for years that he might write one tract. Who can tell the good he has done with his pen? Heaven will be more blessed, the crown of righteousness brighter, the weight of glory heavier, the rest of heaven sweeter, than any mortal ever dared to hope or was able to conceive.

13. Full of Christ are the minds of the prophets! Easily they pass from all other subjects to the person and kingdom of Messiah, from the types to the anti-type, vv. 3, 4. To them no theme seems so welcome as that of "Him who is to come." To true piety it is pleasant to find the Saviour everywhere spoken of. Well did Jesus on his way to Emmaus begin at Moses and all the prophets, and expound to his disciples in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself, Luke xxiv. 27; see also Acts iii. 24. Surely the Old Testament contains much more of Christ than some admit. Parts of this Psalm can never receive any but a flat and meager interpretation, unless they are applied to Christ, yet it is never once quoted for any purpose in the New Testament, though it may perhaps be once or twice alluded to, as in Heb. ii. 9; xii. 2.

14. The more manifestly our deliverances are from God, the greater may be our glorying, v. 5. Dickson: "Nothing can make men more glorious, even before the world, than God's owning them before the world, and putting respect upon them." No small part of the glory of the redeemed in the day of judgment will arise from the fact that God and Christ will then publicly treat them as friends.

15. It is a joy to believers that they never can be in a worse condition than some who have gone before them, and who have been rescued, delivered, glorified, vv. 4, 5. See David hardly escaping the jaws of death for years, yea, see Christ crowned with thorns, disowned with every mark of malice and ignominy, tried, condemned, crucified, dead and buried. Yet God saved them from all at last. Believer, thou canst never be lower than some good men, who have gone before thee, never so burdened and afflicted as was thy Redeemer. Yet he is alive for evermore, yea, he is over all blessed forever.

16. There is no point of honor so high that God cannot, if he choose, raise us to it, v. 5. He takes the poor from the dunghill and sets him among princes. He takes David from the sheep-cote and puts him on the most dazzling throne on earth. Jesus receives from God the Father glory and honor, and from the sepulchre of Joseph he ascends to the throne of the universe. Let no virtuous, pious soul fear anything. God is on its side.

17. What a glorious person is the Lord Jesus Christ! v. 5. All honor, majesty, glory, comeliness centre in him. He is THE WONDERFUL.

18. All history, all experience, all observation, unite with all inspired writings in saying that out of evil comes good; out of weakness, strength; out of sorrow, joy; out of trouble, glory. The whole history of David and of Messiah, as brought out in this Psalm, shows this.

19. When God begins truly to bless, it is commonly the signal for a long series of amazing mercies, v. 6. Dickson: "God will never make an end of blessing whom he will bless."

20. Men may gauge the dimensions of most blessings which are purely temporal, but who can tell the value of any mercy which possesses the attribute of eternity? vv. 4, 6.

21. The plaudits of millions may soon be followed with an eternal overthrow; but the favoring providences, the comforting communion, and the inestimable blessings expressed by God's countenance, shall appear more and more valuable, the longer duration lasts, the more thoroughly fair tests are applied, and the more fully causes have their course, v. 6.

22. Jehovah is himself an all-sufficient good, v. 7. He who has God for his God, needs no more. Calvin: "The world turns round as it were upon a wheel, by which it comes to pass, that those who were raised to the very top are precipitated to the bottom in a moment; but it is here promised, that the kingdom of Judah, and the kingdom of Christ, of which it is a type, will be exempted from such vicissitude. Let us remember, that those only who have the firmness and stability here promised, who betake themselves to the bosom of God by an assured faith, and relying upon his mercy, commit themselves to his protection."

23. As in the divine plan the kingdom of David was inwoven with that of Messiah, so is the inheritance of every believer with that of his Redeemer. God could not break covenant with his people without breaking covenant with his Son. The saints are heirs of God and joint-heirs with Jesus Christ. They are one in him. Because he lives they shall live also, v. 7. Compare Ps. cxxv. 1.

24. The wicked of all ages are alike. They are the enemies and haters of good men, of Christ and of God, v. 8. The sentence, "his enemies shall lick the dust," is perfectly righteous and wholly necessary. There never was so unreasonable and wicked aversion as that which turns sinners away from God, his Christ, his people and his laws, Rom. viii. 7. All this hatred is "without a cause." Nothing can justify it.

25. The Lord will so govern the world as shall finally, infallibly and universally lead to the detection, arrest and punishment of his foes, v. 8. Even in this life they seldom wholly escape. But full and final exposure and retribution are reserved for another world. The open blasphemers, the cunning hypocrites, the profane and the unbelieving moralists shall find that there is a God who judgeth in the earth, Mark iv. 22; Luke viii. 17. There is no worse logic than that which from divine forbearance infers impunity. The defeat and overthrow of the enemies of the literal David were mere shadowings forth of what shall befall the haters of Messiah. Rocks and mountains cannot hide from the wrath of the Lamb.

26. It is right that a time of mercy abused should be followed by a time of anger, v. 9. The day of judgment cannot possibly be postponed. The day is appointed. To none more than to those who scoff at sacred things will it seem to come with awful speed and suddenness.

27. The doom of the wicked will be exceedingly terrible, v. 9. The history of the Jews "from the siege and sack of Jerusalem to this day, awfully warns every one, not to entail misery on his descendants, and bring destruction on himself, by opposing the Redeemer's kingdom, or neglecting his salvation. The discoveries however which will be made, and the vengeance which will be executed, at the day of judgment, on every enemy of Christ, will form the most tremendous comment on this Psalm."

28. As in an oven every combustible thing helps to destroy and consume everything like itself, so does one wicked man help to destroy others, though like the brand in the oven he finally perishes himself, v. 9.

29. Why do not the wicked believe the dreadful things here threatened against them? Is there not an unaccountable mystery in their slumbers? They have fair warnings in Scripture, v. 9 and in many events, and in many states of their own minds. Morison: "In ten thousand ways God can and does still terrify his incorrigible foes. He blights their schemes of ambition and pride; he withers their prospects in life; he cuts down the desire of their eyes; he dries up the stream of their comfort; he makes their beauty consume like the moth; and withal he sends awful terrors into their conscience, making them pine away under the touch of his anger, and causing their very hearts within them to 'burn like a fiery oven.'" There are infallible signs of a coming storm. Why do not men discern them?

30. The coming destruction of the wicked will be total. It will swallow them up. It will devour them, v. 9. It will leave them neither root nor branch. It will leave them no peace, no joy, no hope, no comfort, no recreation, no amusement, no means of escape, no means of grace, no gospel, no heart to pray, no room for prayer, no Saviour, no Comforter, no God. Even their souls will be lost.

31. There must be something to mortals inconceivably dreadful and malignant in the nature of sin to make its dire consequences reach so far, even to all a man's works, and labors, yea, and even to his posterity, v. 10. Dickson: "After the Lord's vengeance is come upon the enemies of Christ's kingdom, his curse shall follow the works of their hands, and upon whatsoever they sought to make themselves happy by in their life: and his vengeance shall follow upon their posterity, till he have rooted out their memorial from among men." Calvin: "It is a doctrine common enough in Scripture, that God not only inflicts punishment upon the first originators of wickedness, but makes it even to overflow into the bosom of their children," Isa lxxv. 6. 7.

All that forsake the Lord shall be ashamed; and they that depart from him shall be written in the earth, Jer. xvii. 13.

32. No man can do his duty to his offspring, nor give a good account of himself or of them in the last day, unless he is at heart a friend and servant of God. Without love to God how can he bring up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? And yet "there is a blessing attending the religious training of families, which extendeth itself often to many generations; but there is also an equally general curse attendant upon the unhappy neglect of family religion. Impiety seems in many families to be a sort of entail upon the wretched descendants."

33. Endless are the devices of wicked men, v. 11. Craft and cunning and artifice seem to be the necessary fruit of depravity. Sin is in its nature tortuous and guileful. It is essentially a lie. It is wonderful that the righteous escape the snares spread and the pits dug for them. But the wicked are not able to perform the half of the evil they intend.

34. Wicked as may be the lives of ungodly men, their intentions are still worse, v. 11. Their hearts are the worst part about them. This is not all. The worse they are, the better they often think themselves to be. Even when they persecute the innocent, they do it under some false charge or pretext.

35. Bold, daring and impudent as the wicked may be now, in the end they will all prove cowards and turn the back, v. 12.

36. Nothing is more vain than the war waged by the wicked. He, who attempts to face the arrows of the Almighty will but prove himself a monument of folly.

37. The salvation of the church or of any of her members is not by power inherent in the creature, but only by the strength of Jehovah, v. 13.

38. It is a mark of true piety to have and evince a good will to Zion and her head, to wish well to the people and kingdom of Messiah, v. 13.

39. Good cause of continual praise and thanksgiving have all the people of God, v. 13. There is not an hour, a state, a condition, a sorrow, a temptation, or a pang, but that God's children still have far more reason for joy than for grief. If they can say no more they can shout and sing, The Lord God omnipotent reigneth: Jesus lives: All things work together for good to them that love God.

40. Christ is the wonderful! On earth he was a pattern of all virtues, of all goodness, of all excellence. In him still dwells all fulness of grace and truth. But his sorrows are all ended. He is now of a long time full of ineffable joy. Indeed his joy is made the measure and sum of heavenly bliss. "Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." Matt. xxv. 21. Scott: "If David rejoiced greatly in the honor conferred on him, as king of Israel; what is the joy of our Redeemer in his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, and in the salvation of his people! And if Israel, from love to David and his auspicious government, rejoiced, and praised God for him, how great should be our joy to behold by faith our Brother and Friend thus glorified, and our praises for all the blessings we may expect from him."

PSALM XXII.

To the chief Musician upon Aijeleth Shahar, A Psalm of David.

1 My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring?

2 O my God, I cry in the day-time, but thou hearest not; and in the night season, and am not silent.

3 But thou art holy, O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel.

4 Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them.

5 They cried unto thee, and were delivered: they trusted in thee, and were not confounded.

6 But I am a worm, and no man; a reproach of men, and despised of the people.

7 All they that see me laugh me to scorn: they shoot out the lip, they shake the head, saying,

8 He trusted on the LORD that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him.

9 But thou art he that took me out of the womb: thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts.

10 I was cast upon thee from the womb: thou art my God from my mother's belly.

11 Be not far from me; for trouble is near; for there is none to help.

12 Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me round.

13 They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion.

14 I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels.

15 My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and my tongue cleaveth to my jaws; and thou hast brought me into the dust of death.

16 For dogs have compassed me: the assembly of the wicked have inclosed me: they pierced my hands and my feet.

17 I may tell all my bones: they look and stare upon me.

18 They part my garments among them, and cast lots upon my vesture.

19 But be not thou far from me, O LORD: O my strength, haste thee to help me.

20 Deliver my soul from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog.

21 Save me from the lion's mouth: for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns.

22 I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the congregation will I praise thee.

23 Ye that fear the LORD, praise him; all ye the seed of Jacob, glorify him; and fear him, all ye the seed of Israel.

24 For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted: neither hath he hid his face from him; but when he cried unto him, he heard.

25 My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation: I will pay my vows before them that fear him.

26 The meek shall eat and be satisfied: they shall praise the LORD that seek him: your heart shall live for ever.

27 All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD: and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee.

28 For the kingdom is the LORD's: and he is the governor among the nations.

29 All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship: all they that go down to the dust shall bow before him: and none can keep alive his own soul.

30 A seed shall serve him; it shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation.

31 They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this.

THIS Psalm may be called THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO DAVID.

For an explanation of the words, To the Chief Musician, and A Psalm of David, see above on titles of Psalm iii., iv. The remainder of the title, Upon Aijeleth Shahar, occurs in no other Psalm. Aijeleth is not found in the Hebrew Bible except here and in Prov. v. 19; Jer. xiv. 5, where it is rendered hind. Shahar is in Gen. xix. 15; Ps. cxxxix. 9; Cant. vi. 10, and frequently rendered morning; in Job xxxviii. 12, day-spring. Instead of Upon Aijeleth Shahar, the margin has it, Upon the hind of the morning. So also Calvin, Fabritius, Rivet, Moller, Pool, Hammond and Alexander. Ainsworth: Concerning the Hind of the morning; Hengstenberg: On the hind of the morning-twilight; Mudge and Edwards: To the morning-hind. Those who give these renderings are not agreed as to the import of the phrase. Calvin: "I think it highly probable that it was the beginning of some common song; nor do I see how the inscription bears any relation to the subject-matter of the Psalm." Pool thinks it is given "to note that the person here designed was like a hind, comely and meek, and every way lovely, but withal persecuted by wicked men, and that oftentimes is in the morning, when she comes out of her lurking and lodging-place, and when the hunters used to go abroad to their work. Or this was the title of some musical instrument, or tune, or song, which was usually sung in the morning." Ainsworth thinks it "means Christ, who as a hind was by Jews and Gentiles, the dogs, v. 7, hunted and worried in the morning, John xviii. 28, and also rose from death early in the morning, John xx. 1, when God had made his feet like hinds' feet, and set him on his high places, Ps. xviii. 33." Hengstenberg: "It will be very readily admitted that the hind is a very appropriate emblem of the suffering and persecuted righteous man who meets us in this Psalm. . . That the hind may be a figurative expression significant of suffering innocence is put beyond a doubt by the fact, that the wicked and the persecutors in this Psalm, whose peculiar physiognomy is marked by emblems drawn from the brute creation, are designated by the terms dogs, lions, bulls," etc. Alexander: "The hind may be a poetical figure for persecuted innocence, and the morning, or rather dawn for deliverance after long distress;" Hammond: "The title, belonging primarily to David in time of his persecution, very fitly also belongs to Christ at his crucifixion." Instead of the foregoing, Piscator and Amesius read, At [or To] the early morning. There seems to be nothing sufficient to bear out this rendering. Jebb does not translate it, but says, "What is there to hinder us from supposing that Aijeleth may mean a harp of Aijilon," though he says he is "utterly unable to assign any probable meaning to the epithet Shahar." Horsley renders it, "Concerning the interposition of the darkness." It is not easy to see how such a rendering was reached, even if the Psalm be allowed to refer to "THE HOUR OF DARKNESS." Fry thinks it probable that it "refers to some direction concerning the music or tune." Chaldee: "For the strong oblation, perpetual to the morning;" or, For the mighty continual morning sacrifice. The whole caption of the Syriac is: A Psalm "of David, when he was mocked by his persecutors. Also concerning the passion of Christ, and the calling of the Gentiles;" Arabic: "Spoken by him when he had subdued his enemies. Also a prophecy respecting the crucifixion." But the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Symmachus, Belarmino, Calmet and the Doway read, For the morning protection, or, For the help of the morning; Street: An earnest petition for aid. From the resemblance of the word Aijeleth to another Hebrew word, Fenwick would render it strength, and so read The strength of the morning. He thinks it relates to Christ as the bright and morning star, the day-spring from on high. Luke i. 78; Rev. xxii. 16. The various plausible opinions reached by different writers may be thus summed up.

1. The words in question are by some supposed to designate the choir, who should sing the piece. Such would read the whole title thus: "A Psalm of David, addressed to the music-master, who presides over the band called the Morning Hind." So Calmet and others.

2. Some suppose these words designate a piece of music, well known in the service of the tabernacle by the name of Aijeleth Shahar. This view is favored by Abenezra, Gesenius and Calvin. Pool does not wholly reject it.

3. Others think Aijeleth Shahar is the name of a musical instrument. This view is favored by Jarchi and Kimchi. "And Leo Mutinens, an Israelite of great learning, goes so far as to say that Aijeleth Shahar was the particular musical instrument which the mourning women used on account of distress which was sudden, not known till it came, as a man does not think of the morning till he sees it." This view is favored by Jebb.

4. Others think the title contains the subject-matter of the Psalm. See names already cited and the various opinions expressed favoring this view.

The sympathies of the pious naturally incline them to favor the last view especially if the Psalm is applied in any distinct manner to Christ. But Harmer and Clarke have showed at some length that it is customary in the East to give pleasing titles to odes without the slightest regard to their subject-matter. After the fullest investigation the author has been able to make, he inclines to the opinion that no key to the interpretation of the Psalm can be obtained from the title, that either of the foregoing views is harmless, that the whole subject is likely to remain involved in uncertainty, and that it is probable that Aijeleth Shahar in some way relates to the music. Calvin, speaking of the views differing from his own, says: "I find no solidity in these subtleties." Clarke says: "To me many seem to have spent their time uselessly in the investigation of such subjects;" Calmet: "Many titles of the Psalms are covered up in great darkness. This one is beset with peculiar difficulties. Interpreters speak as if they were divining, and nothing at all uniform or settled is found in their views."

A question of much more importance is, "Of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself, or some other man?" The sense and import of the whole depend on our answer to this question. The devices of interpretation have been very numerous. Jahn applies this Psalm to Hezekiah; Hitzig, to Jeremiah; some Jews, to Esther and her people in captivity, she being their head; other Jews, among whom is Rabbi David, to the present humiliating condition of the Jewish church, which though formerly famous, shining like a star, or the brightness of the morning, now lies forsaken and in obscurity; and some Jews and Christians, to the true Israel of God of all ages. It would hardly edify the reader to enter into a formal refutation of these opinions. It is as clear as words can make it that the Psalm speaks, not of bodies of people, but of an individual sufferer. Hezekiah and Jeremiah lived long after this Psalm was composed; and many of the things expressly stated in this Psalm never happened to either of them. Some others think that this Psalm refers to the personal history of David, and was all therein fulfilled. What part of his life is specially referred to is not agreed on. Some suppose it was his persecutions under Saul, especially as stated in 1 Sam. xxiii. 25, 26. Others think it refers to the perils into which he was brought in the rebellion of Absalom. Some, who hold this view, do not deny that in the higher sense some parts of the Psalm have their fulfilment in Christ. But many of the things here mentioned never at any time happened to David. There are three other views, either of which may substantially admit the application of the Psalm to Christ, but which nevertheless are not all equally good. The first is that of Hengstenberg: "While all existing interpretations are thus encumbered with serious difficulties, we make our escape at once, and completely from the region of embarrassment and constraint, if we consider the Psalm as referring to the ideal person of the Righteous One—a character which is introduced more frequently throughout the Psalms than any other, so that nothing but ignorance can object to this interpretation that it is an arbitrary one." So also Alexander: "The immediate speaker in the Psalm is an ideal person, the righteous servant of Jehovah, but his words may, to a certain extent, be appropriated by any suffering believer, and by the whole suffering church, as they have been in all ages." There are serious objections to this mode of expounding the Psalm. 1. It is confessedly novel. It was never heard of till the time of Hengstenberg, as himself informs us. 2. It is quite unnecessary. Every part of the Psalms can be well explained without it. This has been done for thousands of years. 3. It is a dangerous invention, very liable to abuse. In the hands of so evangelical, judicious and learned men as those just quoted it may be harmless. But when adopted by sound men it will probably soon be resorted to by those of an opposite character, and with a little ingenuity be applied to the wresting of many Scriptures. 4. It is a bad sign that instead of good strong arguments in its favor Hengstenberg uses such words as these: "Nothing but ignorance can object to this interpretation." It is proper to state distinctly that Alexander says this Psalm "is so framed as to be applied without violence to any case belonging to the class described, yet so that it was fully verified only in Christ, the head and representative of the class in question." Hengstenberg also says: "Every previous fulfilment pointed forward to a perfect one yet to come. By those in whom hope in the Messiah was in all circumstances a living one, this could be expected only in him. . . As the glory of God will be in proportion to the salvation vouchsafed, it must be in the time of the Messiah that this will for the first time appear in all its extent and depth, as here described." So that the result of this modern German invention is not necessarily against the most thoroughly evangelical views of the Psalm.

Another mode of explanation is that adopted in this work in regard to some of the previous Psalms, commonly called the Typical-Messianic plan. It supposes David to be here a type of the Messiah, and that things are said which cannot but very remotely, if at all, have any truth in application to the type, but are fully true of the antitype alone, yet that so much is literally true of the type as fitly to make him a figure of him that was to come. This is the view of Calvin, Melancthon, Fabritius, Calmet, Amyrald, Diodati, Rivet, Venema, Edwards, Dickson, Patrick and Hammond. That the reader may see the precise grounds of these authors, let us hear some of them: Calvin: "David sets before us, in his own person, a type of Christ, who he knew by the Spirit of prophecy behooved to be abased in marvellous and unusual ways previous to his exaltation by the Father." Calmet: "By occasion of his own griefs and sorrows David has here described the passion, death, burial and resurrection of Messiah, the calling of the Gentiles, and the rise of the church. This is his first and chief object. If he does now and then speak of himself, he does so only as he is a figure of Jesus Christ; but in many places David himself is entirely lost sight of." Fabritius: "Although we cannot doubt that David composed this Psalm from a consideration of his own most grievous afflictions, and so in some sense this composition suits him personally; yet it is also certain that it has respect to something beyond his own person, and that being led on by the Spirit of prophecy, even at the very time when he was writing this Psalm, he spread out before God his complaints and prayers, his whole mind and thought were carried by the Holy Spirit from a view and sense of his present griefs and calamities to a prophecy respecting the passion, death, resurrection, glory and spread of the kingdom of Christ, of whom he was not ignorant that he himself was a type." Venema: "Weighty reasons demand that the Psalm be applied both to David and to the Messiah, so that no course is left but to unite both as the subject of the Psalm, David directly and in a primary sense, Messiah indirectly and in the more inward sense."

The last mode of explication is that of applying the Psalm directly, entirely and exclusively to Christ. This view was taken by many in the primitive church, by

Ainsworth, Piscator, Amesius, Calovius, Bellarmine, Fenwick, Gill, Henry, Horne, Horsley, Scott, Stevenson and others. Justin Martyr: "The whole Psalm is spoken of Christ." Tertullian says it contains an account of "the whole passion of Christ." Theodoret: "The testimony of all the evangelists, and of the apostle Paul, and the words of the Psalm itself most clearly evince that whatsoever things are spoken in it are to be expounded of our Lord Christ." He says Christians should not doubt or question this view. Indeed when a celebrated critic, Theodore of Mopsuestia, denied that this Psalm had its literal fulfilment in Christ, he was condemned by the second council of Constantinople, which was the fifth general council. Ainsworth: "Christ speaketh this Psalm to God his Father;" Piscator: "This Psalm is prophetical. For it contains a prophecy of the sufferings and death of Christ, as also of his resurrection and spiritual kingdom. But this prophecy is by that figure of speech called personification, so that Christ himself is introduced as speaking, and even as hanging on the cross;" Gill: "It is plain that a single person is spoken of throughout; and he is manifestly distinguished from others, from his brethren, from the congregation, from the seed of Jacob and Israel, vv. 22, 23, and indeed, no other than the Messiah can be meant: and of this there ought to be no doubt with Christians;" Henry: "The Spirit of Christ, which was in the prophets, testifies in this Psalm, as clearly and fully as anywhere else in all the Old Testament, the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow; (1 Pet. i. 11) of him, no doubt, David here speaks, and not of himself, or any other man;" Scott: "No reasonable doubt can be made, that our Lord should be considered as the speaker, throughout this whole prophetic Psalm. It may even be questioned, whether David had any reference to his own case in it; as everything is applicable to Christ, and most things utterly inapplicable to David;" Horsley: "It seems to be the best account that can be given of this Psalm, to say that the Psalmist personates the Messiah in the garden; first, oppressed with the foresight of the circumstances of his sufferings; then comforted with the assurance of exaltation." Indeed Hengstenberg himself says: "The view which has always obtained throughout the Christian church, is that, which refers the Psalm directly and exclusively to Christ. The author by no means regrets that he adopted this view in his Christology. It was the easiest and most natural of those, which were then before the world, to which his attention was more immediately directed."

These remarks from several authors sufficiently explain what is meant by saying that the Psalm applies entirely, directly and exclusively to Christ. If any ask how he speaks here, the answer is, by David personating Christ. This has been already stated. It is also given by Amesius: "The subject of this Psalm is nothing else than a prayer presented to God by David, representing the person of Christ."

In confirmation of this latter view the following reasons are assigned. 1. The ancient Jews did not deny that this Psalm referred to the Messiah, just as they admitted that Gen. xlix. 10 and Isa. liii. 2-12 applied to him. Their device of turning it at all from him dates since the establishment of the Christian religion. 2. With the ancient Jews agree the primitive Christians. It would be surprising, if the whole church for hundreds of years both before and after the coming of Christ was mistaken about so important a prophecy as this. 3. Let any man give his reasons for applying Isaiah liii. 2-12 directly and exclusively to Christ, and he will find that a parity of reasoning will go far to make the same disposition of the whole of this Psalm. 4. Parts of this Psalm can, in no way but by a very meager interpretation, be applied to any but Christ. 5. There is no part of the Psalm that may not be applied to Messiah. 6. The scope of the whole composition requires this. 7. Many parts of it are expressly applied to Christ in the New Testament, Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 34. In the same chapter of Matthew, v. 35, and in John xix.

24 the evangelists show that v. 18 of this Psalm was fulfilled at the crucifixion. Matthew also tells that v. 8 of this Psalm contains the very words of taunt and bitterness used by Christ's murderers, Matt. xxvii. 43. The whole history of the crucifixion shows the fulfilment of that clause in v. 16. They pierced my hands and my feet. Now crucifixion was not a Jewish but a Roman punishment. Paul in Heb. ii. 12 arguing on the humanity and sufferings of Christ expressly applies to him the whole of v. 22. Immediately on his resurrection Christ calls the disciples "my brethren," Matt. xxviii. 10; John xx. 17, in fulfilment of the twenty-second verse of this Psalm. Indeed it would be hard to frame any argument proving any prophecy directly and exclusively Messianic, if this is not so.

But some may ask, Have individual believers no interest in this Psalm? May they never adopt any of these words as their own? The answer is that any child of God may properly adopt any of the language of this Psalm that suits his case; just as any follower of Christ may properly use any petition offered by Christ when on earth, if it expresses his own holy desires, such as, "Father forgive them, they know not what they do;" "O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt;" "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Nor is this all. Believers have communion with Christ in his sufferings, so that Paul is very bold and says, "The sufferings of Christ abound in us," 2 Cor. i. 5. Indeed we have the best authority for praying that we may "know Christ and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings." As God delivered Christ, so will he save all his people. Jesus says, "Because I live, ye shall live also." Death itself shall not hold the redeemed but till the appointed time, for, "them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

There is no reason for doubting that David is the author of this Psalm. The few, who have held or hinted a contrary opinion, have stated nothing that was even plausible in support of their novelty.

Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1060, and Clarke, B. C. 1058.

There is no good reason for supposing that any particular event in the life of David caused the writing of this ode.

The names of the Most High found in this Psalm are El God, Eloah God, Jehovah LORD, and Adonai Lord, on which respectively see on Ps. v. 4; xviii. 31; i. 2; ii. 4.

1. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? My God, Hebrew El. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway, after my God, have look upon me. This is without authority. The whole of this clause was repeated by Christ on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 46; Mark xv. 34); only that for the Hebrew verb he used a word in the Syro-Chaldaic, which was then commonly spoken; but both Matthew and Mark in explaining the cry of our Saviour use the verb here employed by the Septuagint, rendered hast forsaken. Instead of hast forsaken Venema and Street read hast deserted. According to the modern theological use of words this is the better rendering, though in our version it is never given desert, but commonly leave, leave off, leave destitute, fail, forsake, Gen. xxiv. 27; xxxix. 12; Ruth ii. 20; Ps. ix. 10; xxxviii. 10. The sense seems to be, Why hast thou failed me? left me destitute. Christ was innocent and holy, kept the law and perfectly pleased his Father, yet when he took the place of sinners, assumed their guilt and bore their punishment, then the wicked of earth and hell were let loose upon him, his friends hid as it were their faces from him, and even his Father left him without succor from the tormentors, and worse than all without his own comfortable presence. He felt the dreadful sting of sin, the sword of justice, the fire of wrath. Christ is often called a mysterious sufferer, and so he was. In his sorrows were manifested love so amazing, condescension so unparalleled, holiness so spotless, justice so inflexible, wisdom so boundless that without the explanations of Scripture we could know nothing satisfactory on the subject. Dreadful as were our Lord's sufferings he felt no remorse, for he was innocent, and no despair, for he still pleaded his covenant with the Father, saying, My God, my God. Faith may be very vigorous, when comfort is all gone. The misery of the man of Uz was at its height when he said, Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, Job xiii. 15. There is no better evidence of piety than that given by him, who fears God and obeys his voice, while he walks in darkness and has no light. No man more than such a one has a good warrant for trusting in the Lord, Is. l. 10. God never made a more important communication to Abraham respecting the nation that should descend from him than when "a horror of great darkness had fallen upon him," Gen. xv. 12-16. When the sun goes down the stars appear. When God hides his face, faith looks to the promises, the oath, the covenant. It is evident, therefore, that there are two ways in which God may forsake or desert a creature. One consists in a total and final withdrawal of all his mercies; the other, in a withdrawal of his animating, soul-cheering presence, which, however it may express his punitive displeasure at the time, shall be followed by marvellous mercies. There are also two very different modes of asking the question, Why hast thou forsaken me? One is a bold defiant mode of declaring all one's sufferings unjust. This Christ never did. The other is an humble, submissive, believing mode of addressing our cries and complaints to God. Christ knew that he was the substitute for sinners and that he was suffering for others. But his human nature was ready to sink under the load of our sins, and under the hidings of his Father's face, and he encouraged himself in this pious and natural way. The complaint expresses the same state of pious distress, of which we read in Matt. xxvi. 39, 42. He adds: Why art thou so far from helping me, and from the words of my roaring? Our translators have here supplied several words. The Chaldee: Far from my redemption are the words of my crying, i. e., my words of crying do not bring deliverance. The rendering of the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway is quite inadmissible: Far from my salvation are the words of my sins. The authors of the Doway feel that some explanation is called for and therefore give this note: "The words of my sins. That is, the sins of the world, which I have taken upon myself, cry out against me, and are the cause of all my sufferings." Though this note quite relieves the shock, which such a rendering is fitted to give, yet the construction is forced. Still worse if possible is the rendering of the Syriac: Thou hast put my salvation far from me on account of the words of my follies. Equally bad is the Arabic: Thou art far removed from my salvation on account of the language of my foolishness. The word rendered roaring in our version never signifies fault, sin, folly, or foolishness. In our version it is uniformly rendered roaring. The language seems to be borrowed from the roar of the lion, Jud. xiv. 5; Isa. v. 29; Jer. ii. 15; Hos. xi. 10; Amos iii. 4; Zeph. iii. 3; Ps. xxii. 13. Mant: "It is often applied to the deep groaning of men in sickness." Calvin: Why art thou far from my help, and from the words of my roaring? Hare and Lowth: Why art thou so far from my cry, from the words of my roaring? Quite a number, among whom are Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Street, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander read the whole verse in one sentence, and as one continued question, thus avoiding the repetition of Why? But our English version gives the full sense, preserves the parallelism in the verse, and is to be preferred.

2. O my God, I cry in the day-time, but thou hearest not; and in the night season, and am not silent. My God, as in the preceding verse, see on Ps. v. 4. Cry, the same as in Ps. iii. 4; xviii. 3; and often call. Either rendering is approved. Day and night, equivalent to continually and earnestly. Christ led a remarkable life of prayer, Matt. xxvi. 39, 42, 44; Mark i. 35; xiv. 35, 39; Luke iii. 21; v. 16; vi.

12; ix. 18, 29; xi. 1; xxii. 32, 41; Heb. v. 7. But no prayer of faith ever seemed for a season to be less answered than that of Christ. The blessing sought may not come in the time or manner most agreeable to flesh and blood, and it may seem as if our prayer was not heard at all. The phrase, am not silent, is perhaps not so well rendered in our version. Still worse is that of the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway: It shall not be reputed folly in me. But the Chaldee has it, There is no silence to me. This is followed by the Margin of our version, by Calvin, Amesius, Piscator, Ainsworth, Rivet, Pool and Alexander. The sense as given by Calvin is that the sufferer experienced no comfort or solace, nothing which could impart tranquillity. The parallelism requires that it correspond to hearest not in the first member of the verse. Waterland, Street, Hammond and Fry: I have no rest; Jebb: There is no rest to me; Edwards: I have no respite from my misery; Horsley: No relief is given me; Syriac: Thou attendest not to me; Arabic: Thou hast not heard me; Hengstenberg: I am not silenced; which he says, "is exactly parallel to thou answerest not," as he renders the verb in the first clause. Dreadful were the agonies of Christ. Never was there such praying. Never was there so great apparent cause for discouragement in prayer. Yet the Father heard him always.

3. But thou art holy, O thou that inhabitest the praises of Israel. The Septuagint and kindred versions: But thou dwellest in the holy place, the praise of Israel; church of England: And thou continuest holy, O thou worship of Israel; Arabic: And yet thou dwellest in the holy places, O thou glory of Israel; Syriac: And thou, O holy one, art also sitting [as King on his throne] in Israel thy glory; Vennema: For thou art holy, inhabiting the splendid praises of Israel; Amesius and Piscator: But thou art holy, continuing, the perfect praise of Israel; Ainsworth: Thou art holy, sitting, the praises of Israel; Edwards: Yet thou art the holy one that dwellest amongst the praises of Israel; Pool: But thou abidest holy, O thou who art the praises of Israel; Jebb: But thou continuest holy, thou that art the praise of Israel; Fry: Yet thou sittest in the sanctuary, the praise of Israel; Horsley: Yet thou, inhabiting holiness, art (the theme of) Israel's praise; Boothroyd: But thou inhabitest the sanctuary, amidst the praises of Israel; Hengstenberg: And thou art holy, sitting enthroned on Israel's praise; Calvin: Yet thou art holy, who inhabitest the praises of Israel; Alexander: And thou (art) holy inhabiting the praises of Israel. Street makes vv. 5, 6 a part of some well-known song of praise, quoted into this Psalm, and reads:

But, O thou that inhabitest the sanctuary,
The songs of Israel are,—
"In thee our fathers trusted," etc.

But in this he seems not to be supported by reason, or authority. The best sense and that well sustained every way is that of our version, Calvin, Edwards, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The word rendered inhabit occurs in the sense of sit in Ps. i. 1; ii. 4; xxix. 10; cx. 1; dwelt in Ps. ix. 11; xxiii. 6; ci. 7; cxxxii. 14; abide, endure, in Ps. ix. 7; lxi. 7. The participle in the plural is commonly rendered inhabitants. Praises, uniformly rendered. The conception is that the holy God, as king sits enthroned in the midst of the praises of Israel. Thus explained the whole verse may express either Christ's amazement at innocence suffering as he did under the government of a just and holy God; or, it is a strengthening of himself by reflecting that as God is holy, so in the end all will come right. There is no objection to including both of these ideas. The same general view may be taken of the force of the next verse:

4. Our fathers trusted in thee: they trusted, and thou didst deliver them. Trusted, found twice in this verse and once in the next, commonly so rendered, also hoped, put confidence. The same word occurs in Ps. iv. 5; ix. 10; xiii. 5; and in v. 9 of this Psalm. The praises of Israel were specially rendered to God for the deliverances he had wrought for their fathers. They never ceased to celebrate the wonders shown in the days of Moses and Aaron, of Joshua, of Samuel and of David. It is a great thing for any people to have a famous history. No nation could recount such prodigies of salvation as the Jews. Messiah here looks to the history of God's servants for long ages before him, and expresses first his amazement that he should be the only righteous one, who seemed quite deserted of God, and secondly his determination to adhere to God in pious confidence, because it was not possible that Jehovah would deny himself, and finally depart from the course of his administration established for ages. Deliver, the same as in v. 8. See also Ps. xvii. 13; xviii. 2, 48.

5. They cried unto thee, and were delivered. The faith of the fathers was not inoperative. It made them pray with the utmost earnestness. They cried unto God, and escaped, as the word is better and more commonly rendered. Calvin: "It is not without good reason that David has put the word cried in the middle between these words, They trusted in thee, they trusted, in the fourth verse, and these words, They trusted in thee, in the fifth verse." They trusted in thee, and were not confounded. Confounded, "continually used in Scripture for the disappointment and frustration of the hopes." Our version in a majority of cases, and many scholars often use ashamed.

6. But I am a worm, and no man. Chaldee: I am a weak worm. Christ here speaks, not of his nature, nor of his real character, but of his condition, and of the esteem in which he was held. That this is so is clear from the next clause: [I am] a reproach of men, and despised of the people. The whole verse has a strict parallel in Isa. liii. 3; and both verses may be alluded to in Matt. ii. 23, "He shall be called a Nazarene;" that is, he shall be despised, contemned and reproached, as were the inhabitants of Nazareth. Christ was lightly esteemed, not merely by a few, but by men in the masses, by the people. His rejection by the Jews as a people was both national and individual. "He came to his own, and his own received him not."

7. All they that see me laugh me to scorn; i. e., deride me, mock me. In Ps. ii. 4 the same is rendered have in derision. The Hebrew is in the future indicating that the scorning shall last to the end of our Saviour's life, as it did. His enemies were never more derisive than when his agonies were the greatest. Horsley: All who see me insult me with derision; Ainsworth: All that see me do scoff at me. They shoot out the lip, they shake the head. "To protrude the lower lip is, in the East, considered a very strong indication of contempt. Its employment is chiefly confined to the lower orders." Something of the same is manifest in the usages of all countries. When pity is called for, derision gives a sorry answer, yea, it is as iron entering the soul. The art of deriding is one of the most cruel. Gaping, shaking the head, putting out the lip and protruding the tongue are old arts of mockery, Job xvi. 4, 10; Ps. xxxv. 21; xliv. 14; Isa. lvii. 4. This verse and the next are applied to Christ in Matt. xxvii. 39, 43. See also Mark xv. 29; Luke xxiii. 35, 36. Some ancient and many modern translations unite in representing the next verse as containing the taunting words of those, who in this verse are said to mock by gestures. Here is their speech:

8. He trusted on the LORD that he would deliver him: let him deliver him, seeing he delighted in him. He trusted, literally he rolled on the Lord; margin: He rolled himself on the Lord; Calvin: He has committed his cause unto Jehovah, or devolved his cause upon Jehovah; Edwards: He resteth upon Jehovah; Hengstenberg: Devolve upon the Lord; Alexander: "The literal meaning of the first clause is: roll to (or on) Jehovah, which would be unintelligible but for the parallel expressions in Ps. xxxvii. 5, roll thy way upon Jehovah, and in Prov. xvi. 3, roll thy work upon Jehovah."

See also 1 Pet. v. 7. At the cross the wicked said that Christ had at all times professed a reliance on God alone; and Christ claimed that he was the object of his Father's complacential love.

9. But thou art he that took me out of the womb. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway give substantially the rendering of our version: Thou hast drawn, or, Thou art he that hast drawn me out of my mother's womb; Syriac: Thou art my trust from the womb; Calvin: Surely thou didst draw me forth from the womb; Gesenius: Thou drewest me from my mother's womb; Horsley: Thou hast been my bringer-up from the womb. The common version is as good as any. There is a very weighty and important sense, in which God is the author of the existence and birth of every man; but much more was he the Father of the human nature of Christ, who by the miraculous power of the Holy Ghost was begotten in the womb of the virgin Mary. The argument is this: Thou didst great things for me in giving me existence and birth; how can I despair of help from thee now, as thou art righteous, and hast declared thyself well pleased in me? Yea, more, Thou didst make me hope when I was upon my mother's breasts. Margin: Thou didst keep me in safety. He who has often ordained strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, and who caused John Baptist before his birth to leap for joy in prospect of the birth of Christ, doubtless gave to Christ a wonderful infancy and childhood and remarkable religious exercises. Even at the breast, the infant Saviour was not without joyous expectations of the love and care of his heavenly Father. To the holy child, as well as to the man Christ Jesus the Father "gave not the Spirit by measure," John iii. 34; see Luke ii. 40. For valuable thoughts on the work of the Holy Spirit on the human nature of Christ, see John Owen's Works, Vol. II., p. 188. Clarke: "Thou hast made me; and hast guided and defended me from my earliest infancy."

10. I was cast upon thee from the womb. There is a sense, in which every pious man looks back with wonder at the helplessness of his early life, and at the mercies which attended it. But Jesus Christ was in infancy very poor and peculiarly hated. The wise men brought from a great distance gifts; gold and frankincense, and myrrh, which sustained Joseph and Mary and the child in the flight into Egypt. At his birth Herod was troubled and all Jerusalem with him. Never were such cruel plots laid against the life of any other child. Yet God frustrated them. Christ's whole life was spent in imminent peril from wicked conspirators. Yet God kept him safe. Edwards: Upon thee I have been thrown ever since I was born; Horsley: I was cast upon thy lap from the birth. There seems to be no good reason for the rendering of Dathe: To thee I have been committed from the womb. The figure of this clause seems to be borrowed from the act of receiving a child at birth, Ruth iv. 16. This clause is beautifully paraphrased by Hengstenberg: "Thou didst receive me, when I was helpless, under thy mild protection; I fell as it were into thy lap, which was stretched out to receive me at my birth; and from having been fostered and cared for by thee I retained my life; whereas, otherwise, I would most assuredly have been the prey of death." Thou art my God from my mother's belly. The plea of this clause is of a covenant relation existing from the earliest infancy. The doctrine of this clause and of the context is clearly taught in Isa. xlix. 1. Scott: "Christ was not only the peculiar care of Providence from his birth; but from his earliest infancy he exercised the most perfect faith, hope and love towards his God and Father."

11. Be not far from me. Septuagint: Stand not aloof from me; Vulgate and Doway: Depart not from me; Dathe: Desert me not; Horsley: Withdraw not thyself from me. The great mass of scholars do not essentially vary from our common version. Christ prayed that his Father might not stand aloof from him. The same form of the verb is found in v. 19, also in Ps. xxxv. 22; xxxviii. 21; lxxi. 12. The urgency of the prayer for God's presence is next stated: For trouble is near. The word rendered for should not be when as some have suggested. Its signification in this and the next clause is clearly because. So it is commonly rendered. Trouble, the same as in Ps. ix. 9; x. 1; xx. 1. Never was there such trouble on earth as that foreseen and endured by Christ, Luke xii. 50. A reason for urgency in desiring God's presence is: For there is none to help. The margin: For there is not a helper. The sympathy of Christ's disciples would have been most welcome to him. Yet they "all forsook him and fled." True, they could have given him no effectual help, but they might have wept and prayed with him. He trod the wine-press alone, and of the people none were found with him. Never was a soul so beset with troubles. It was "exceeding sorrowful even unto death." His troubles and enemies were terrific.

12. Many bulls have compassed me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset me around. Morison: "The bull is the fit image of strength, fierceness, pride and cruelty; and the bulls of Bashan, as inhabiting a rich and fertile country on the opposite side of Jordan, would be the appropriate emblems of these qualities in their highest degree. Bashan was a rich mountainous district, the very place to breed the wild ox to perfection, Deut. xxxii. 14. J. Brown of Haddington: "Wicked men, chiefly rulers or warriors, are called bulls, and bulls of Bashan, to denote their prosperity, strength, untractableness and mischievous violence and fierceness." See Ps. lxxviii. 30. The Chaldee: People like many bulls, the great bulls of Bashan surrounded me; Horsley: Huge bulls surround me: strong (bulls) of Bashan form a ring about me. The Saviour meek, unoffending, unresisting, was in the midst of foes of great strength, fierceness and fury. Like bulls they tossed him on their horns or trampled him down in their rage. The English word, bully, has its origin in the habits of fierce bulls. Christ's foes had the evil and alarming qualities not only of bulls, but also of lions.

13. They gaped upon me with their mouths, as a ravening and roaring lion. The lion chiefly roars when he is seeking his prey, or when he has it in his power and is about to devour it, Ps. civ. 21; Amos iii. 4. Scott: "A helpless infant, or a harmless lamb, surrounded by furious bulls and hungry lions, aptly represented the Saviour encompassed by his insulting and bloody persecutors." Christ's trouble was not merely or chiefly outward. "The sufferings of his soul were the soul of his sufferings." He says:

14. I am poured out like water, and all my bones are out of joint: my heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. Clarke: "The images of this verse are strongly descriptive of a person in the deepest distress; whose strength, courage, hope and expectation of succor and relief had entirely failed." Perhaps there never were words better chosen to describe a "soul sorrowful even unto death." The versions are remarkably agreed in rendering the first clause as we have it in English. Edwards: I am dissolved like water; Horsley: Like water I have lost my firmness; Fenwick: As water spilt, and poured out, I seem. Hengstenberg regards Ps. lviii. 8; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xiv. 14 as parallel passages. Enemies without and distress within, the rage of men and the wrath of God took away Christ's strength. For out of joint the margin has sundered. Boothroyd and Street, following the Arabic: All my bones are dissolved; Chaldee, Septuagint, Syriac, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: My bones are scattered; Calvin: All my bones are disjointed; Ainsworth: All my bones dispart themselves; Horsley: All my bones are starting asunder; Fry: All my bones are rent asunder; Hengstenberg: All my bones are separated; Alexander: All my bones are parted. The phrase denotes not only "complete powerlessness and exhaustion," but dreadful torment, as if one were on the rack. David's distress of mind is compared to broken bones, Ps. li. 8. Bones out of joint are often more painful. The next clauses teach the same thing: My heart is melted like wax; it is melted in the midst of my bowels. Luther: "Those, who have good hope and are cheerful, are said to have a fresh, strong, confident, stout, good heart, which stands immovable like a hard rock. And thus, also, on the other hand, those who are cast down and terrified, are said to have a soft and feeble heart, which dissolves and melts like wax." The melting of wax is a figure often found in Scripture and for various purposes, Ps. lxxviii. 2; xcvi. 5. None but he, who bore these dreadful sufferings, knew the full import of these dreadful words.

15. My strength is dried up like a potsherd. The word here rendered potsherd occurs sixteen times in the Hebrew Bible. The plural of it is once rendered stones; it is twice rendered sherd or sherds; it is five times rendered as here, potsherd; in all other cases it is connected with another word, as vessel, bottle or pitcher, and is rendered earthen or of earth. Earthen vessels were made thoroughly dry and burned in a kiln. The sense is that his strength was as effectually consumed as the moisture of an earthen vessel subjected to the process of drying and burning. Moisture is elsewhere used to express that state, which is connected with health and joyousness, Ps. xxxii. 4. And my tongue cleaveth to my jaws. One of the Latin poets describes the effect of mental agitation on the mouth and throat in words, which one might think borrowed from this place. Luther: "It is incredible how this inward anguish, and terror, and dismay withers and dries up completely and suddenly the whole moisture of all the parts of the body, and makes them weak and good for nothing, especially the moisture of the tongue, with which we chiefly feel this thirst and drought;" Calvin: "We know that excessive grief not only consumes the vital spirits, but also dries up almost all the moisture which is in our bodies." Hengstenberg for my jaws has the roof of my mouth. Quenchless thirst is often a forerunner of death, and so it is added: And thou hast brought me into the dust of death. Hengstenberg: "The dust of death is the dust which has reference to death, that is, the dust of the grave." The Hebrew verb is in the future, which is the form preferred by the church of England, Jebb and Alexander. Some also render it in the present, as Amesius, Fry and Hengstenberg. The majority of versions agree with the common English. The sense of the passage seems to be, "Thou hast already brought me to the brink of the grave."

16. For dogs have compassed me. Previously Christ's foes were likened to bulls and lions; now to dogs. In his Metaphors Keach gives six particulars in which wicked men are compared to bulls, eight in which they are like lions, and sixteen in which they resemble dogs. Wicked men are spoken of as dogs in the last chapter of the New Testament. The allusion to dogs would be more striking to any one who had travelled in Syria than to those who know the dog only as a domestic animal. We are at once told who the dogs are: The assembly of the wicked have inclosed me. The Chaldee: The wicked, who are like to many dogs, have surrounded me. Assembly in Ps. i. 5; vii. 7, and commonly rendered congregation. The reference seems to be to the show of a trial gotten up against Christ. Nor did his foes merely rave and make a noise like dogs: They pierced my hands and my feet. Concerning these words there is considerable difficulty. Those who wish to make a very extended examination will consult others. The difficulty has perhaps been needlessly exaggerated. For there is uncommon agreement in the ancient versions. The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Calvin, Amesius, church of England, Houbigant, the Complutensian Polyglot, Jebb, Fry, Tholuck and Alexander agree in the rendering of our common version. Nor is it necessary with Jebb to suppose a falsification of the text by the Jews, the text and the marginal reading of the Hebrew varying so very little that any transcriber might easily have made the mistake that has produced the difficulty. Edwards: They make deep wounds in my hands and my legs; Mudge: "The image is of a man encompassed by dogs, and extending his arms to keep them off, but they come about him and fix their teeth and claws in his arms and legs, as they could not reach his body." The word rendered feet is often found and in our version is never rendered legs except in 1 Sam. xvii. 6; Chaldee: They bite like a lion my hands and my feet. Though these words are never quoted in the New Testament as descriptive of the manner of Christ's death, yet they do well state the act of fastening him to the cross; and piercing is a form of representing his sufferings at the hand of man well known to the writers of both Testaments, Zech. xii. 10; John xix. 34; Rev. i. 7. Scott well says that there seems scarcely the shadow of a doubt that our version is correct. See John Owen on the "Integrity and Purity of the Hebrew and Greek Text," vol. iv. pp. 466-67.

17. I may tell all my bones: they look and stare upon me. Theodoret: "When he was extended, and his limbs distorted on the cross, it would be easy for a spectator to tell all his bones." For I may tell, some prefer, I will tell, I could tell, or I tell. Perhaps the last is the best, corresponding in tense with look and stare. Diodati: "They look, feeding their eyes and passions with my misery, as with a pleasant spectacle," Matt. xxvii. 36; Luke xxiii. 35. Edwards: They stare and feast their eyes upon me; Hengstenberg: They enjoy themselves in looking at one disfigured to a skeleton.

18. They part my garments among them and cast lots upon my vesture. Surely these words have their fulfilment nowhere but in the events recorded in the Gospels, Matt. xxvii. 35; Mark xv. 24; Luke xxiii. 34; John xix. 23, 24. Nothing like this ever happened to David or to any other worthy of Scripture. Luther: "I hold that the soldiers did not divide the clothes from need, or for gain, but in the way of jest, and for the purpose of enjoying a laugh, and as a sign that it was now all over with this Christ, that he was utterly ruined, destroyed, extirpated, and never more to be heard of." This may be so, but the impression seems to have been that the soldiers divided his raiment for gain. In the time of the reign of terror in France a small spot of ground by the guillotine was rented out for mountebanks to make their gains. Here at the foot of the cross a lottery is opened to dispose of the raiment of one not yet dead.

19. But be not thou far from me, O LORD. The sufferer on Calvary never forgot his covenant relation to God. To be far from one is to refuse aid. The petition is for assistance: O my strength, haste thee to help me. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Hengstenberg: "The expression make haste to help me, refers us back to the eleventh verse, there is none to help."

20. Deliver my soul from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog. The Chaldee: Set free my soul from those, who kill with the sword; the spirit of my body from the power of the dog; Septuagint: Rescue my soul from the sword; my only-begotten from the power of the dog; Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway: Deliver, O God, my soul from the sword; my only one from the hand of the dog; Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Waterland, Houbigant, Mudge, Jebb and others for darling read only one, and in a note Calvin explains it thus, "Namely, my life, which is alone;" Ainsworth: Rid my soul from the sword, my lonely soul from the hand of the dog; Street: Protect my life from the sword, my solitary state from the hand of dogs; Boothroyd: Deliver my life from the sword, my dear life from the power of the dog; Edwards: Rescue my life from the sword; my soul from the paws of the dog; Horsley: Deliver my soul from the sword, my UNITED ONE from the power of the dog. That the substance of the passage is a prayer for life is not doubtful. Luther: "He wishes to say my soul is alone and forsaken by every body, there is no one who inquires after it, cares for it, or comforts it." Calvin: "If it is asked how this can be applied to Christ, whom the Father did not deliver from death, I answer, in one word, that he was more mightily delivered than if God had prevented him from falling a victim to death, even as it is a much greater deliverance to rise again from the dead than to be healed of a grievous malady."

21. Save me from the lion's mouth. This prayer, like that of the preceding verse, is for deliverance and life. The figure of the lion is here continued from v. 13. For thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns. Two points in this clause claim notice. The first relates to the tense. The Hebrew is preterite. So is the rendering of the Chaldee, church of England, Venema, Ainsworth, Fry, Horsley and Alexander. But Calvin, Amesius, Edwards and Jebb read, Hear me; Hengstenberg, Thou hearest me. If the preterite is preferred, then he is so confident of final triumph that he speaks of it as already gained, or he is encouraging himself from his past experience, or he is announcing that his victory is already begun. Horsley takes the latter view and reads the whole verse: "Save me from the mouth of the lion, and from the horns of the unicorns. Thou hast answered me." It is generally admitted that the remaining verses of this Psalm contain the language of one, whose prayer has been heard. If the victory is not announced in the words, Thou hast heard me; they at least form the clause of transition from a depressed to an exultant state. The other point of difficulty is in the word rendered unicorns. There are two large creatures which have but one horn each. One is the monodon, a species of whale; the other is a land animal, the rhinoceros. So that the unicorn is not a fabulous animal. If to either of the foregoing reference is here had, it is doubtless to the latter. The Chaldee Septuagint and Vulgate read, unicorn. Edwards thinks the reference is to the one-horned cloven-footed wild-goat, called the Oryx. Venema, Hengstenberg and others think the bubalus, the buffalo, or wild ox is meant. Others think the reference is to a species of antelope. If the reader is curious in this matter, he can consult the Lexicons and Carpenter's "Scripture natural history." Neither the monodon, nor rhinoceros could have been known to the Hebrews except by report or by their travelling into distant lands. The same may be said of the one-horned deer of Africa. Roberts says that it is still a prayer in the East, Save me from the horns of the kandam. But this animal is unknown to those, who use the prayer. Unicorn, found nine times in the Hebrew Bible, and always rendered as here. See Nu. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8; Deut. xxxiii. 17; Job xxxix. 9, 10; Ps. xxix. 6; xcii. 10; Isa. xxxiv. 7. The old Psalter, quoted by Clarke says: "The unicorn es ane of the prudest best that es, so that he wil dye for dedeyn if he be haldyn agayne his wil." The passages of Scripture where the word occurs show the animals here spoken of to be very strong, wild, fierce and gregarious. The sufferer of this passage was as if surrounded by them and saved from their horns. Luther: "The rage of the furious devil is so great, that the prophet does not consider it enough to have represented it by a sharp sword, but introduces further, for the same purpose, the tearings of raging, furious dogs, the mouth of the greedy and hungry lion, which stands already open, and is ready to devour, and the dreadfully fierce wrath of the raging terrible unicorn."

22. I will declare thy name unto my brethren: in the midst of the congregation will I praise thee. Scott: "The whole Psalm is allowed to be highly poetical; but this transition is peculiarly beautiful. For here the scene at once changes and brightens. The Saviour turns his eyes from his sufferings to the glory which followed: and, anticipating the extensive and permanently blessed effects of his passion and exaltation, he breaks forth into exulting predictions and praises at the prospect." In this view many concur. Paul applies this whole verse to Christ in proof of his humanity, Heb. ii. 12. Soon after he rose from the dead, our Lord said: "Go to my brethren." Christ is so the brother of all men that he has human nature. But in the highest sense none except genuine believers are his brethren, Luke viii. 21. To declare God's name is to make it known, to publish abroad his mighty deeds which illustrate his perfections. And to praise him in the midst of the congregation is to show forth his glory in the most public and solemn manner. Congregation, not the same word as in Ps. i. 5; elsewhere multitude, assembly, company. It awakens painful surprise to find respectable commentators attempting to explain this verse without even an allusion to the inspired exposition given by Paul in Heb. ii. 12.

23. Ye that fear the Lord, praise him. Christ's brethren of the preceding verse are the Lord-fearers of this. Dathe, Lowth, Street, Boothroyd and others regard this verse and the next as containing the song promised in v. 22. But a pious declaration of intention to praise God is itself praise. This whole verse contains an earnest summons to others to unite in acts of devout gratitude and adoration. This also is praise to God. The designation of pious men as those that fear the LORD is very common. See on Ps. ii. 11. All ye the seed of Jacob, glorify him; and fear him, all ye the seed of Israel. Jacob and Israel are terms sufficiently comprehensive of those who are God's willing servants. The three verbs, praise, glorify and fear, well describe the nature and effects of living piety in the soul. Vital godliness will never turn away from such commands; particularly will it not be offended at any call to work out its salvation with fear and trembling.

24. For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted; neither hath he hid his face from him; but when he cried unto him, he heard. This is ground enough for all the righteous to praise the Lord, especially when we remember that the afflicted One here spoken of was the blessed Son of God. Every step in Christ's exaltation fills the hearts of the pious with joy and praise. His success is the pledge of their victory. His resurrection makes sure the redemption of their bodies. If God heard Christ when he was bearing the sin of the world, he will not deny his intercessions in heaven. And if when sin was imputed to his Son, God did so afflict him, let all men fear, lest sin be found charged to them in their last account.

25. My praise shall be of thee in the great congregation; I will pay my vows before them that fear him. Congregation, as in v. 22. The two places express the same idea. In this verse we first find in the Psalms the word vows, which has a uniform rendering. There is great beauty and completeness in the exposition of Hengstenberg: "It was customary, in circumstances of great distress, to make vows, which were wont to consist of a promise to offer a certain number of sacrifices. After deliverance had been obtained, it was customary to invite to the feast, connected therewith, the widow, the orphan and the poor, and to make them sharers of the joy. In such cases the enjoyment throughout was not merely of a sensual kind; the guests enjoyed at the same time the friendship of the master of the feast. The soul of the feast was admission into the community of thanks and praise. And hence, in the passage before us, when the gratitude of the delivered sufferer expresses itself under the emblem of paying a vow—the usual expression of gratitude—it is exceedingly natural that others should be invited to share in the blessing and thanksgiving, under the image of a great sacri-ficial feast given by him, in which all that fear God take part." This view is borne out by the next verse:

26. The meek shall eat and be satisfied. Meek, elsewhere rendered also poor, humble, lowly. See Ps. ix. 12, 18; x. 12, 17. The eating is at the feast where the vow was paid. It was to satisfaction. No guest was neglected. Each was filled or satisfied. The humble find the Gospel-feast sufficient to meet all their wants. Such are both joyful and grateful. They shall praise the LORD that seek him. On the words seek him, see on Ps. ix. 10. All who seek him shall praise him, because they find a satisfying blessing. To such it is said, Your heart shall live forever; shall live in peace and joy, in purity and love, in rest and confidence. Eternal life is begun on earth. This blessedness shall last and increase forever. To be spiritually-minded is life and peace. To be perfectly pure and perfectly redeemed will be heaven—the life above.

27. All the ends of the world shall remember and turn unto the LORD. The ends of the world, i. e., the remotest and least known of all the nations; in Ps. ii. 8, rendered the uttermost parts of the earth. All these belong to Christ. All shall yet own their Lord. This they shall do by remembering him, his commandments, wonders, judgments, word and righteousness, so evincing true piety, Num. xv. 39; Neh. iv. 14; ix. 17; Ps. lxxi. 16; cxix. 15; Josh. i. 13; Jon. ii. 7; Ecc. xii. 1. If men's characters are ever improved, it must be by divine grace disposing and enabling them rightly to use their faculties. Hengstenberg well says that the word here rendered remember "very frequently signifies to ponder, to lay to heart." The same is true of the English word remember. Fry has reflect. The turning unto the Lord implies a forsaking of all others. This is the more obvious as the nations here spoken of were for ages mad upon their false worship. And all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before thee. Edwards: And all the families of the heathen will worship before thee; Calvin: And all the tribes of the Gentiles shall prostrate themselves before his face; the Chaldee, Septuagint, Syriac, Vulgate and Ethiopic: And all the families of the Gentiles shall worship in his presence. To prostrate is literal. That was often the posture in eastern worship. The wide range of the effects of Christ's death has not yet been conceived. The certainty of the glorious results is complete. The reason is given.

28. For the kingdom is the LORD'S. Patrick: "The Lord is the Sovereign of the whole world." He has all authority. He can put down all rule. He is able to subdue all things to himself. He has mercy for the Gentiles. And he is the governor among the nations. Calvin renders the whole verse: For the kingdom is Jehovah's, that he may be the governor among the nations; Edwards: For Jehovah is supreme monarch of the world; and he reigneth over the heathen. The exaltation of Christ began in his resurrection and shall go on till the whole earth owns her king. The calling of the Gentiles began in mercy, and shall be completed in their fulness being brought in. All without exception must own him. So it is said:

29. All they that be fat upon earth shall eat and worship: all they that go down to the dust shall bow before him. The figure of a votive feast is here resumed. The blessings of the Gospel are often represented as the provisions of a feast. Isa. xxv. 6; Luke xiv. 16–24. This feast is for rich and poor. The fat and they that go down to the dust, are all invited and shall come. Hengstenberg: "It is a feast at which all earthly distinctions are removed, because here all guests are poor, and God is rich for all." If those that go down to the dust refers to v. 15, as some think, then it is parallel to the next clause, And none can keep alive his own soul. Then the meaning is that the feast was for the fat ones who yet were ready to perish, and "who could not deliver themselves from that death, into which they had fallen." They should all alike be welcome to the blessings of the great Deliverer.

30. A seed shall serve him. In Isa. liii. 10 we have the same word seed: He shall see his seed. Calvin: Their seed shall serve him; Edwards: Their descendants will serve him; Septuagint, Vulgate and Fry: My seed shall serve him; Hengstenberg and Alexander: Posterity shall serve him. Those, who read their seed, understand the seed of the Gentiles. Those, who read my seed, explain it by saying all believers are the sons of God. Those who understand the seed to be Christ's are sustained by Hebrews ii. 13. It is a blessed fact that Christ has a people from age to age. This seed shall not be disowned. It shall be accounted to the Lord for a generation. Both God and man shall repute and regard the seed of Christ in subsequent times as the true people of God, the generation of the upright. Diodati: "Others shall be enrolled to the Lord in all ages." Calvin: "As the name Jehovah, which is expressive of God's essence, is not here used as it is a little before, but the word Adonai [rendered Lord,] I do not disapprove of the opinion of those who think that Christ is here expressly invested with authority over the church that he may register all who shall give in their names as on the side of God his Father." Hengstenberg prefers another rendering: It shall be told of the Lord to the generation. That is the present generation shall tell it to the next. This is not good; for the next verse brings out that truth:

31. They shall come, and shall declare his righteousness unto a people that shall be born, that he hath done this. The ancient versions exceedingly vary in rendering this verse. But the modern translations are more agreed, and come nearer our common version. Calvin: They shall come and shall declare his righteousness to a people that shall be born, because he hath done it; Edwards: And they will declare to the people which shall be born the righteousness which he hath executed; Fry: They shall come, who shall declare his righteousness to a people that shall be born, whom he hath prepared; Boothroyd: To the next generation they shall declare his righteousness; to a people that shall be born, what he hath done; Horsley:

They shall come and declare his righteousness;
To a people that shall be born, what he hath done:

Hengstenberg: They shall come and make known his righteousness to the people which then have been born, that he has done it. The passage predicts that the knowledge of Christ and God's righteousness in and by him shall be made known to people as yet unborn. The phrase that he hath done this well conveys the force of the original, and refers to what he hath done as recorded in this Psalm, i. e., he has exalted Christ after all his sufferings and humiliation.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is right that the followers of an afflicted Saviour should know the fellowship of his sufferings and be made conformable unto his death. They all need instruction and discipline; and they are sure to get both. "God had on earth one Son without sin; but never a son without affliction." "All Christians have been taught in one school; all have known the power of affliction in some of its forms." Ponder Heb. xii. 3.

2. Of all the forms of affliction to the pious soul none is more dreadful than the hiding of God's countenance, v. 1. In the case of Christ "this desertion was a judicial act on the part of God towards sin." In the case of his people it is for their purification, or to make them bright patterns of suffering affliction. In all cases, "spiritual desertions are the saint's sorest afflictions." He can stand anything better than the loss of comfortable communion with God. A minister near death and in darkness said to a brother, "What is to be thought of one who has long preached Christ to others, and in death has not the comforting presence of God?" The other replied, "What think you of the dreadful darkness and desertion of a Saviour dying?" This remark brought peace.

3. Great perturbation may consist with eminent piety. Christ's soul was agitated until that dreadful distress indicated by roaring, was upon him, v. 1.

4. If sin, when imputed to a voluntary and innocent sufferer, may produce such unparalleled sorrow as is described in this Psalm, what will be the portion of the man, who dies in sin, and has neither conscious innocence, nor the assurance of speedy deliverance, nor the soul-cheering presence of God to support him? Luke xxiii. 31. "No man knows the exceeding sinfulness of sin, but he who learns it at the cross of Christ."

5. Sense and faith are very diverse. Sense may cry, Why hast thou forsaken me? while faith cries, My God, my God. It is "possible, that when deserted by the great God, man can still address him in the language of affiance."

6. There is but one method of satisfactorily explaining the awful scenes of the crucifixion. Stevenson: "That was the judgment-day of the Saviour of the world. At the tribunals of men he was condemned—under their sentence he was executed: and while his body hung in torture on the cross, he was arraigned in spirit before the bar of God, under the imputation of human guilt. The court of heaven, as it were, descended to Mount Calvary. . . . These awful words, 'Let the law take its course,' are uttered by the eternal Judge." This explanation alone is sufficient. With his stripes we are healed. By his chastisement we have peace. By his death we live. Otherwise we never can defend the character of God concerning the humiliation of Christ. He never permitted a holy angel to suffer even the slightest indignity.

7. When sore pressed, our resort must be to earnest prayer and strong crying to God, v. 2. Calvin: "The true rule of praying is this, that he who seems to have beaten the air to no purpose, or to have lost his labor in praying for a long time, should not, on that account, leave off, or desist from that duty."

8. Dickson: "Were temptations ever so black, faith will not hearken to an ill word spoken against God, but will justify God always," v. 3. This is much wiser than to plunge into reasonings too deep for us. Often is silence eminent wisdom. Trust is better than logic. Let us never charge God foolishly, as we shall surely do, if we attempt to solve all the mysteries of providence.

9. It is often well to look at the days of old and see God's former wonders, v. 4. This will cause us to encourage ourselves in the Lord our God.

10. Under the government of God there has never been a final or utter failure of a righteous cause, v. 5. Such a thing is impossible. God's whole nature, government, word and oath forbid it. All who have trusted were, in due time, in the best time, delivered.

11. The case of believers can never be worse in the eyes of men, than was that of Christ on the cross. He was regarded and treated as a worm, and no man, v. 6. Low as believers may sink, their Saviour sank lower.

12. If we are subjected to derision and scorn for righteousness' sake, the same befell our Saviour, v. 7. If we fare no worse than he, why should we complain? Morison: "How incomprehensible to mortals was that patience which the incarnate Messiah exercised towards those, who poured all the impotence of a creature's derision upon him! How infinitely worthy of the divine Being the proposed results of a dispensation which involved such ignominy and abasement to the spotless Redeemer!" Reproach broke the Saviour's heart, Ps. lxxix. 20.

13. Let us learn to roll our burdens on the Lord. He can sustain us, v. 8. The heavier the load, the greater our need of God's supporting hand. Stevenson: "Grievous indeed it is to have our words distorted to falsehood, converted into jest, retorted against ourselves, and blazed abroad to our discredit. Christ endured this fourfold contradiction." But God carried him through it all to glory ineffable.

14. He, who made us, can take care of us, v. 9. He, who gave us life, can support it. "Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" Matt. vi. 25. Every pious man may say to God: Thou gavest me my earthly existence, and, so long as it is for thy glory and my good, thou wilt maintain it.

15. Early piety is possible, v. 9. Had our first parents not sinned, all their posterity would have loved and served God from their earliest existence. It requires no more intellect to love God than to hate him, to please than to displease him, to obey than to disobey him. Is it not true that many seem rather to thank God that he has hid heavenly things from babes, and has revealed them unto the wise and prudent, than to unite with the Saviour in his joy over the opposing truth, Luke x. 21? Let us believingly pray that God would make our children hope in him; even when they are babes and sucklings.

16. In every one's early history is much that is interesting. One says that any man's biography well written would be to him one of the most interesting books. Were we not practical atheists, we should all adopt the language of v. 10. Many can put a peculiarly tender meaning on the saying, "I was cast upon thee from the womb." John Brown of Haddington: "I was left a poor orphan, and had nothing to depend on but the providence of God;—and I must say, that the Lord has been the Father of the fatherless, and the orphan's stay;" Calvin: "If it were not that ingratitude had blinded our eyes, every birth would fill us with amazement, and every preservation of a child in its tender infancy, exposed as it is, even at its very entrance into the world, to death in a hundred forms."

17. When God is with us all is well. His gracious presence is the sum of all needed good things, v. 11. Clarke: "A present God is a present blessing."

18. The less help and the less prospect of help from man, the more should we hope from God, v. 11.

19. We can never have fiercer, more cruel, or more brutal enemies than had our blessed Lord, vv. 12, 13. Stevenson: "Mockery accompanied the Saviour from the garden of Gethsemane till he expired on Calvary. Judas set the example with his insidious kiss. The men, that apprehended him, mocked him. The officers at the several courts mocked him. The chief priests, scribes and pharisees mocked him. The high-priest, Caiaphas, mocked him. The servants of his house and others surrounded the Saviour, and mocked him. They smote him with their staves, and with the palms of their hands—they did spit in his face—they plucked off the hair—they blindfolded him; then they did buffet him with their fists, saying, 'Prophecy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that smote thee?' Matt. xxvi. 68. Herod and his men of war mocked him, and set him at naught—arraying him in a gorgeous robe, they sent him away as a laughing-stock to the place whence he was brought. Pilate regarded him as a weak, inoffensive creature, and, jestingly asking him, 'What is truth?' brought him forth, saying, 'Behold the man,' and sent him to crucifixion with this mock title, 'The King of the Jews.' The Roman soldiers mocked him with a perfect mockery. They acted it to the very life. They procured a crown—it was of thorns: royal garments—they were a cast-off purple vest, and a scarlet robe: a sceptre—it was a reed. They paid him homage as a king—it was mock-kneeling, laughter and derision. They lavished their honors upon him. Their salutation was a scoff, 'Hail, king of the Jews!' Their gifts were not gold but strokes—not frankincense, but spitting—not myrrh, but mockery. . . Imagine this dreadful scene. Behold this motley multitude of rich and poor, of Jews and Gentiles. Some stand in groups and gaze. Some recline at ease and stare. Others move about in restless gratification at the event. There is a look of satisfaction on every countenance. None are silent. The velocity of speech seems tardy. The theme is far too great for one member to utter. Every lip, and head, and finger is now a tongue. The rough soldiers, too, are busied in their way. The work of blood is over. Refreshment has become necessary. Their usual beverage of vinegar and water is supplied to them. As they severally are satisfied, they approach the cross, hold some forth to the Saviour, and bid him drink as they withdraw it." O child of God! thy enemies can never be worse than were those of thy Saviour! Be still.

20. Christ's pains were of body and mind, and both dreadful, v. 14. Calvin: "Being a real man, he was truly subject to the infirmities of our flesh, only without the taint of sin. The perfect purity of his nature did not extinguish the human affections; it only regulated them, that they might not become sinful through excess." And although not a bone of him was broken, yet all his bones were out of joint. The theory of crucifixion was death by nervous distress.

21. Grief can waste us away and bring us to death, v. 15. There is such a thing as breaking the heart. What a mercy to be able to sing

Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ;
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy.

And if cheerfulness be denied us, it is a great blessing to be quiet and patient. Calvin: "In Christ these two things were wonderfully conjoined, namely, terror, proceeding from a sense of the curse of God; and patience, arising from faith, which tranquillized all the mental emotions, so that they continued in complete and willing subjection to the authority of God."

22. Wicked men are as base as the Scriptures represent them. They are dogs, v. 16. They are unfit for the society of heaven. "Without are dogs," Rev. xxii. 15. They will not always have it in their power to bark at and devour the saints.

23. Left to themselves, wicked men will stop at nothing. They murdered Jesus Christ, v. 16. Were he on earth attacking men's sins and vices as of old, he would, unless miraculously preserved, be put to death in less than three months. Unregenerate human nature is not a whit improved.

24. Can any fallen creature be worse than man? Were there ever perpetrated by devils in hell such horrible crimes as have been committed by men on earth? vv. 16, 17. If so, what? by whom? when?

25. There is not in all the range of history besides Christ another person in whom was fulfilled the prediction in v. 18. It alone might well settle the interpretation of this Psalm and the Messiahship of Jesus. Christ's seamless vesture was not left by him to any friend. His murderers got that. "Perhaps it was the cherished gift of some pious disciple. Tradition says it was his mother's present." But he gave it to no one. Papists have sometimes claimed to have it. This they cannot prove. If they have it they got it not from him, but from his murderers.

26. In our trials effectual help can come from God only. The sooner and more directly we go to him, the wiser we are, and the more closely do we follow the example of Christ, v. 19.

27. The humiliation of Christ was unspeakable. He was given to "the power of the dog," the basest of all wicked beings; and to the sword—the flaming, two-edged, glittering sword of eternal justice, v. 20; Zech. xiii. 7.

28. Let us wait God's time and method of relief. Dickson: "Christ was no less delivered from dogs, lions, unicorns, his persecuting enemies, by his resurrection after death, than if he had been taken out of their hands, when they came to apprehend him in the garden; yea, this delivery out of the grave was a far greater delivery than if he had not been slain at all; for then he had delivered himself only, and not us."

29. The believer can be in no circumstances too dark for prayer. His Saviour was once in greater darkness and sorrow, and he then set us the example of prayer, intending that we should follow it, vv. 19–21; 1 Pet. ii. 21. "He that will not be satisfied without the blessing shall be satisfied with it. Ask and you shall have. . . The simplest prayer is a sublime mystery. The feeble voice of a child influences God."

30. The proper use of deliverances already received is to awaken gratitude for the past, and give encouragement for the future, v. 21. When David was about to meet the giant of Gath he called to mind his victory over the lion and the bear.

Our Saviour's heart was encouraged by remembering what God had done for him in former times.

31. Wonderful is Christ's condescension to his people, even the humblest of them. He is not ashamed to call them brethren, v. 22. Oftentimes they are rude, ignorant, poor, and through life they labor under prejudices and errors, and have many faults and defects of character, yet the Saviour owns the weakest of them, even when they are disowned by their censorious brethren. If Christ calls us brethren, it is a small matter to be judged of man's judgment.

32. As Christ's humiliation was public, so is his exaltation, v. 22. Every step in his glorious progress is fitly open. He was seen of angels. He who wore the crown of thorns is worthy to be in the midst of the throne of God; he who had a reed put into his hand is fit to wield the sceptre of universal dominion; he who wore the robes of mock royalty is rightly owned to be God over all, blessed forever.

33. In his great sufferings the human nature of our Lord was sustained first, by his divine nature; else the stroke had been more than he could have borne; and secondly, by the blessed vision of success, "the joy that was set before him," the crown he should wear forever when in the midst of his redeemed he should celebrate his victories, v. 22. Morison: "It is impossible for finite minds to comprehend the extent of blessedness which he felt when atonement was made, when justice was satisfied, when Satan was vanquished, when the prophetic testimony concerning his death and resurrection was fulfilled."

34. In Christ's joy at the progress of his kingdom and glory all that fear the Lord participate and give thanks, v. 23.

35. True piety glorifies God, v. 23. This distinguishes it from all that is spurious.

36. True piety fears God, v. 23. "To fear the Lord is a lesson with which every disciple must be familiar. It is the first in the school of Christ. Every pupil must learn it. Happy is he who knows it by heart."

37. When will men learn the value and efficacy of prayer? v. 24. There has never in any age or nation been one case in which God has despised or abhorred the affliction of true believers, nor refused to hear them when they cried.

38. We have Christ's authority in favor of public praise, v. 25. Compare Ps. xl. 9, 10. Public mercies demand public acknowledgements. When secret worship is made a hindrance, and not a help to public devotions, it is sadly defective in some important respect.

39. Vows, as acts of solemn worship, are lawful, v. 25. The word of God gives us many instances from the days of Jacob down to apostolic times.

40. The provisions of the Gospel are ample, v. 26. They fully meet all the demands of the meek of the earth. To all others they are distasteful and so are rejected.

41. It is unspeakably to the honor of religion that every one who has with all the heart sought the Lord, has found abundant matter of joy and thanksgiving, v. 26.

42. The eternal consequences of true religion must be brought into the estimate, if we would decide aright the question of the wisdom of serving God and of the folly of a life of sin, v. 26.

43. The universal spread of the Gospel is clearly revealed, vv. 27-31. The thing is certain, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it. One clear prophecy on any point pledges the divine perfections to bring it to pass. But where much is said on a subject it shows that God regards the matter as of great importance, and would have us fully assured and often reminded of its accomplishment. Blessed be God: The Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached among all nations. The prayers of saints, the intercession of Christ, the reward secured to the Redeemer, God's promise and oath all require that the whole earth be converted unto God.

44. Wicked as this world is, God governs it. He has never resigned his authority over any people, v. 28. A blessed truth is this. He can at any time so display his power, justice and grace as to subdue the proudest people, fill the most self-righteous with alarm, and bring the most guilty to hope in his mercy. "Is he the God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles? yes, of the Gentiles also: seeing it is one God, which shall justify the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith." "For there is no difference between the Jew and the Greek: for the same Lord over all is rich unto all that call upon him. For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." "His kingdom ruleth over all." "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof."

45. Very glorious is the free, indiscriminate offer of the Gospel, v. 29.

While grace is offered to the prince,
The poor may take their share;
No mortal has a just pretence
To perish in despair.

Dickson: "Kings, rulers and magistrates shall have no cause of jealousy from Christ's kingdom, and his governing over nations; for so many of them as shall embrace Jesus Christ, not only may brook their places, honors, riches, and all lawful benefits, wherein their fatness and worldly welfare seem to consist; but also shall be made partakers of the Lord's house, which shall so satisfy their souls, as they shall count his gospel their choice cheer, and shall bless God for his consolations." No man is so fat as not to need the bread of heaven; none is so poor as not to be welcome to the feast of fat things provided in the Gospel.

46. The preservation of the church in all ages is truly wonderful. Christ has always had a seed to serve him, v. 30. His enemies often have things outwardly much their own way, but even then his "hidden ones" are not few. When Elijah thought he was the only true worshipper of God left in all Israel, Jehovah said that he had seven thousand men who had not bowed the knee to Baal. Calvin: "The perpetuity of the church is here abundantly proved, and in very clear terms: not that it always flourishes or continues in the same uniform course through successive ages, but because God, unwilling that his name should be extinguished in the world, will always raise up some sincerely to devote themselves to his service."

47. To the best interests of men for both worlds nothing is more important than the publication of God's righteousness. The weight of this matter increases continually as the earth is more and more filled with people and stirred by commerce, v. 31.

48. Utterly vain are all the hopes of the wicked. So this Psalm abundantly declares. If ever earth and hell united in a plot dark, cunning and malignant above all others, it was that of compassing the death of the Son of man; yet out of that very event arise the greatest good to men, the greatest reward to Christ, and the greatest glory to God. The triumph of the wicked is short.

49. We live in exciting times. While sad tidings often make our ears to tingle, yet the tide of redemption is rolling on. The kingdom of God is surely coming. "Does not every fresh messenger from the heathen world bear to our ears the tidings of some new victory of our all-conquering Redeemer? Is not nation after nation beginning to feel the reviving influence of the Gospel of peace?" During the present generation, whole tribes of people have been led to forsake idols, and turn to Jehovah as the only living and true God. If the changes for the better, which have been going on for thirty years, shall continue and be proportionably accelerated for a hundred years longer, the Gospel will be well nigh universally diffused.

50. In this Psalm and in many other portions of Scripture we have a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto we do well to take heed as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in our hearts.

PSALM XXIII.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 THE LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want.
- 2 He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.
- 3 He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.
- 4 Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.
- 5 Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.
- 6 Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever.

SCOTT dates this Psalm B. C. 1057; Clarke, after the captivity. He assigns no reason. As a composition this ode contains nothing to indicate such an origin. The general impression is doubtless correct, that the Psalm was written by David. The title says so. Many think this was one of the earliest compositions of David. The habits of his early life would furnish all the imagery of the first part of the Psalm. David was eminently fitted to write a devout pastoral. There is not a word in it that would indicate another authorship. On the title see on Ps. iii.

It is probable no six consecutive verses of Scripture are more frequently committed to memory than those of this Psalm. Morison: "It is impossible for language to express the extent and variety of spiritual consolation, which this incomparable ode has been the means of imparting. It has been felt to be the common property of that mystic flock that hear and know the voice of the Shepherd. In the depth of their sorrows, they have sung it, in the hope of deliverance; and when the candle of the Lord has shone round about them, they have been compelled to adopt it as the most natural expression of those sentiments of gratitude and praise which have struggled for suitable utterance. There is a sweet tenderness in all the allusions of the Psalm, which will ever endear it to hearts that have felt the softening touch of divine grace; and there is, moreover, a character of moral beauty and loveliness belonging to it, which must leave the compositions of uninspired men at an almost infinite distance." Lowth: "What can be conceived sweeter or finer than this representation of God as a Shepherd?"

It is of some importance to determine whether this Psalm is to be applied to God the Father, or to God the Son. From Ps. xxviii. 9; lxxvii. 20; lxxx. 1, some have argued that God the Father is held forth as a Shepherd, and that here he is specially to be regarded. To this it is answered that the same titles, as Saviour, Father and Redeemer, are given to both the first and the second persons of the Godhead; and nothing forbids that the title Shepherd should have a like application. That the Psalm has a special reference to the Lord Jesus Christ seems to be very clear. J. M. Mason: "There is no difficulty in ascertaining the person here intended; for the description agrees to no other than our Lord Jesus Christ, who is at once JEHOVAH and the SHEPHERD promised to the fathers. He has ever delighted in this character, which, from the beginning, has supported the faith of the church, and animated her worship. The testimony which Jacob, with his dying breath has left to the Shepherd of Israel, she has perpetuated and improved." The passages of Scripture commonly cited on this subject are Gen. xlix. 24; Isa. xl. 11; Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Zech. xiii. 7; John x. 11, 14; Heb. xiii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 25; v. 4. The preceding

Psalm told us how the "Good Shepherd laid down his life for the sheep." This tells us how he lives to care for his flock. Scott: "As Christ is 'the good,' 'the great,' 'the chief Shepherd,' we cannot doubt that he is JEHOVAH, and is specially intended." Morison: "That this Psalm contains in it a prophetic reference to Him, who is 'the chief Shepherd,' and who 'gave his life for the sheep,' can only be doubted by those who would deprive the composition of one of its essential charms." Stevenson: "Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah-Shepherd, the Jehovah-Shepherd."

The only name of God in this Psalm is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. The LORD is my shepherd. The Chaldee: "The Lord fed his people in the wilderness; Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic and Ainsworth: The Lord feeds me; Vulgate and Doway: The Lord ruleth me. But the Doway has a note, stating that "in Hebrew" the reading is "The Lord is my shepherd, viz., to feed, guide, and govern me." The word rendered shepherd is a participle of the verb rendered feed, keep, etc., often rendered shepherd. The great body of scholars agree with the common version. Hengstenberg: "Of all the figures that are applied to God in the Old Testament, that of a shepherd is the most beautiful." This was probably the general impression of all the servants of God in the East. Oriental nations commonly called their good rulers and kings Shepherds. Only "every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians," Gen. xvi. 34. Speaking of God as a Shepherd Luther says: "The other names sound somewhat too gloriously and majestically, and bring, as it were, an awe and fear with them, when we hear them uttered. This is the case when the Scriptures call God our Lord, King, Creator. This, however, is not the case with the sweet word shepherd. It brings to the godly, when they read it or hear it, as it were a confidence, a consolation, or security like the word father." The ground of the confidence expressed by David was that the Lord was not only a shepherd, but he says he is my shepherd. I shall not want. The Chaldee paraphrases this to suit its rendering of the first clause: They lacked nothing; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: I shall want nothing; Syriac and Arabic: He will not suffer me to want anything; Ainsworth: I shall not lack; Amesius: I cannot be in want; Fry: I have no want; Hengstenberg: I want for nothing. But the rendering of our version in the future, shall not want, agrees with the original, is most commonly adopted, and includes the present also, q. d., I shall neither now, nor at any future time want. Luther: "I shall assuredly want nothing. I shall eat and drink, and have abundance of clothes, food, protection, peace, and necessities of every kind, which contribute to the support of life." Alexander: "Spiritual gifts are neither excluded, nor exclusively intended. No nice distinction between these and temporal advantages is here made for us and none need be made by us." The Scriptures sometimes catalogue the blessings of God's people, Matt. v. 3-12; 1 Cor. iii. 21-23; Gal. v. 22, 23. All these are secured to Christ's people. Other Scriptures say: "No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly;" "All things work together for good to them that love God;" "My grace is sufficient for thee," Ps. lxxxiv. 11; Rom. viii. 28; 2 Cor. xii. 9. How can the saints want? The Lord will give them every good thing, "every good cross, every good comfort," every needed chastisement, every needed supply, all timely lessons, all good deliverances.

2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. The Chaldee: In a dry place he makes me to rest in the pleasantness of grass; Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway: He hath set me in a place of pasture; Syriac: Upon the pastures of strength he shall make me to dwell; church of England: He shall feed me in a green pasture; Street: In pleasant places full of grass he maketh me repose; Fry: In green pastures he letteth me lie down; Jebb: In pastures of tender grass he shall make me lie down; Ainsworth: In folds of budding grass he maketh me lie down; Hengstenberg: He layeth me down on the green meadows; Alexander: In pastures of verdure he will make me lie down. The Hebrew is future, and includes the present. The reference is clearly to the custom of leading flocks to repose at noon. See Cant. i. 7; Ezek. xxxiv. 15. He leadeth me beside the still waters. Septuagint: He hath led me by the water of quietness; Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: He hath brought me up on the water of refreshment; church of England: He shall lead me forth beside the waters of comfort; Calvin: He leadeth me to gently flowing waters: Venema: He shall supply to me drink near the waters of reposings; Street: Unto waters inviting to rest he gently leadeth me; Boothroyd: By gently flowing streams he leadeth me; Fry: Unto the waters of resting places he gently conducteth me; Ainsworth: He easily leadeth me by the waters of rests; Jebb: By waters of quietness he shall lead me; Edwards: He leads me to soft-flowing streams; Hengstenberg: He tendeth me by the waters of rest; Alexander: By waters of rest he will lead me. The verb is in the future here also. Calvin, Pool, Gill and Edwards think the quietness refers to the waters themselves. But sheep are not afraid of cascades or swift currents. Street's rendering is literal—waters of rests—i. e., the waters near which the flock finds ample repose. There is here no parallelism to Isaiah viii. 6, "the waters of Shiloah that go softly." Hengstenberg: "The plural indicates that the rest imparted is of a manifold kind, and respects not one gift, but a whole train of gifts." There can be no more lovely imagery than that here presented. It would be so in any country; but when we remember that it refers to a land that had a thirsty soil and but two rainy seasons in the year, it is very pleasing. Both clauses of the verse relate to the same thing—repose, or rest, or peace. God's people have a three-fold peace—peace with God, peace with their own consciences, and peace in their own affections. They are not hateful and hating one another. For innocence they are doves. Their consciences do not condemn them, neither does God. The first verse of this Psalm contains the main proposition, of which the second, third and fourth verses are an elucidation. Very strikingly does the second verse "depict the condition of believers. The world around them is a land of deserts and of drought, which yields nothing to satisfy the longing soul. Sooner shall the body be nourished by whirlwinds and the dust, than the spirit with things of mere time and sense." But with Christ for a Shepherd we have rest far above that when Joshua enfeoffed Israel in Canaan. Nor is our Saviour's care confined to the more rugged and vigorous. While "he shall feed his flock like a shepherd: he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young," Isa. xl. 11. The more tender, helpless, or burdened any of the flock may be, the greater will be his compassion. He comforts the feeble-minded, and commands all his people to do the same, 1 Thess. v. 14. "He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength," Isa. xl. 29–31.

3. He restoreth my soul. This rendering is sustained by the Genevan translation, Calvin and Edwards. The Septuagint, Syriac, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: He hath converted my soul; church of England and Bishops' Bible: He shall convert my soul; Venema: He shall refresh my soul; Amesius: He maketh my soul quiet; Ainsworth: He returneth my soul; John Rogers' Translation: He quickeneth my soul; Pool: He bringeth back my soul; Waterland and Mudge: He refresheth my soul; Jebb: My soul he shall restore; Fry: He reneweth my strength; Hengstenberg: He revives my soul; Alexander: "To restore the soul here, as in Ps. xix. 7, is to vivify or quicken the exhausted spirit." Morison thinks that the form of the verb "denotes the act of animating or invigorating, in circumstances where life has been nearly extinct, or strength has been greatly exhausted. The idea of restoration to a forsaken path is, I think, here combined with that of recovered strength to walk in it." A careful examination will show that the word is used in the broadest sense of restoring. In Isa. lviii. 12 we have the participle rendered, The restorer of paths to dwell in. Often is the word rendered bring back, or bring again, when it cannot signify merely to recover from faintness or weariness. See Isa. xlix. 5; Jer. l. 19; Ezek. xxxix. 27. This is the more natural construction also as sheep are exceedingly inclined to wander off into dangerous places. Restoration from wandering seems to have been by far the most common idea attached to this clause. It is however a blessed truth that God has in his gospel cordials for the fainting and correctives for the straying. Mason: "Sheep are prone to wander; and the farther they proceed, the more are they bewildered, and the more unlikely to return. Alas! the resemblance is too exact. . . Christians, although renewed in the spirit of their mind, carry about with them in the remnant of corruption a principle of departure from the living God. Take away, or suspend the influence of his grace, and the work is done: the most enlightened and tried believer goes astray the next moment. . . How far the regenerated may go it is not for us to conjecture, and it would be madness to try. That they shall not finally perish is one of the plainest promises of the Bible. But between the circumspection of grace and the damnation of hell there is ample room for sinning and for chastisement. . . Lost attainment, forfeited joy, withering graces, barrenness, leanness, lameness, and a long train of kindred miseries follow the steps of disobedience." In restoring his people Christ chooses his own time and method. But the process includes these things, a conviction of sin and folly in departing from God, Pr. xiv. 4; deep and heartfelt self-reproach and sorrow; a longing for renewed communion with God, Job xxiii. 3, 4; occasional fears of final desertion, Jer. xv. 18; and great distress of soul from a sense of sin, Jer. ii. 17-19. The pangs of restoration to God often exceed those of a first conversion. The penitent humbles himself under God's mighty hand, and is as a weaned child. At length help comes and hope revives. Jesus becomes a horn of salvation in the house of his servant David; that we should be saved from our enemies and from the hand of all that hate us; "that we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him all the days of our life." Thus he gives "knowledge of salvation unto his people, by the remission of their sins, through the tender mercy of our God; whereby the day-spring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet into the way of peace." Thus "the good Shepherd restores peace to his mourners. For he leads them, by faith, to a renewed application of his blood for pardon: and he pardons most freely. I am pacified, saith he, I am pacified towards thee for all that thou hast done. This, O this melts the heart. Such patience! such compassion! such forgiveness! All the springs of contrition are opened at once; Rivers of waters run down their eyes; they throw away with disgust the idols which they had laid in their bosom, and turning their feet unto the divine testimonies, say, Behold, we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God. They now regain the fellowship of their Saviour's death, and crucify the flesh with the affections and lusts." To a soul thus exercised Christ in all his offices is precious. This restoration is often so marvellous to him, who is the subject of it, that he takes it for a first conversion. It is followed by the happiest effects: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake. The Chaldee, John Rogers' and Genevan translations, Calvin, Amesius, Dathe, Ainsworth, Edwards and Fry prefer the present tense, leadeth. Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway prefer the past, hath led; church of England, Bishops' Bible, Venema, Jebb and Alexander prefer will lead. In Ps. lxxiii. 24; Isa. lvii. 18, the same form of this verb is given—shalt guide, will lead. But elsewhere our version often renders it in the past or present. Divine guidance to believers is essential. Walford and some others, instead of "paths of righteousness" prefer "straight paths"—"such as are direct and easy." The reason assigned is that our version presents "an incongruous mixture of physical and moral figures." But is not this a mistake? Are not the physical and moral beautifully united in the preceding clause and indeed in the whole Psalm? As to sheep in Judea or any other hill country finding the "direct" to be the "easy" way, it was frequently just the reverse. The shepherd often led them about in a winding way that was to them safe and convenient. As the shepherd guides his flock in ways that he thinks best, so God guides his chosen in ways that he approves. Hengstenberg is confident that the word rendered righteousness "never stands in a physical sense for straightness: it always means righteousness. And this signification could only be considered as unsuitable from assuming the false position, that the Psalmist everywhere must use expressions that are borrowed from the relations connected with the figure which he is, for the time, employing in illustration of spiritual matters." The word does never in Scripture actually mean physical straightness. See all the passages where it occurs. To be led in the paths of righteousness may denote: 1, Guidance in ways of uprightness or justice towards men; 2, Guidance in the ways of righteousness or holiness towards God; 3, Guidance in those ways of providence which God's rectitude would lead him to select for his servant. God's righteousness makes him faithful to his saints. Montanus reads tracks of righteousness, or well marked ways of righteousness; Morison: Jesus "leadeth the sheep of his pasture into the right way; he causes them to choose the paths of holiness which they had forsaken; he strengthens them against the power of sin; he draws them to himself with the cords of love; he makes the most self-denying duties pleasurable; and enables them to derive lessons of humility, and caution, and watchfulness, and self-denial, and prayer, from their past failures."

This divine conduct to the people of God is not for their sakes, but for his name's sake. Our names are worthless. Our merits are naught. God is self-moved. "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins," Isa. xliii. 25. Compare Isa. xlviii. 9, 11; Ezek. xxxii. 22. That which moves God to save his people is found in him, not in them. This should be known and remembered first, because it is true; secondly, because it is greatly to the glory of divine grace to select undeserving objects; and thirdly, because if God found in himself cause for beginning our salvation, and if he never changes, then shall he find in himself cause for crowning with glory the work of salvation begun in us. If he loved and pitied us when enemies, much more he will love and save us when friends. Steir: "Not for any merit of mine, but out of free grace;" Pool: "Not for any worth in me, but merely for the demonstration and glory of his justice, and faithfulness, and goodness;" Diodati: "Without having regard to any merit of mine, nor to my faults and unworthiness, but to make use of his goodness, and fulfil the truth of his promises;" Calvin: "Certainly his choosing us to be his sheep, and his performing towards us all the offices of a Shepherd, is a blessing which proceeds entirely from his free and sovereign goodness." Unmerited grace will finish what it began.

4. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. What are we to understand by the valley of the shadow of death? Bunyan has used this phrase, not as pointing to death, but to a time of great sadness, darkness and trial. His acquaintance with Scripture imagery and his almost inimitable use of it are generally confessed. He is sustained by many. Owen: "As death is the worst of evils, and comprehensive of them all, so the shadow of death is the most dismal and dark representation of those evils to the soul, and the valley of that shadow the most dreadful bottom and depth of that representation." J. M. Mason says the valley of the shadow of death

"does not signify dying: for it is not the valley of death, but of the shadow of death; and the shadow of an object cannot be the same thing with the object itself. The psalmist speaks of walking through this valley: which is a Scriptural term for a habit of action, or a course of suffering. But death is neither the one nor the other; but is a single event. . . The valley of the shadow of death is a scene of great and uncommon distress—of such trials as overpower the soul; throw it into amazement; break its purposes; fill it with alarm and horror like that which invades trembling nature at the approach of the 'king of terrors.'" Calvin, Venema, Patrick, Dodd, Dickson and Tholuck favor the same view. Ainsworth says this phrase "denoteth imminent danger, Jer. ii. 6; sore affliction, Ps. xlv. 19; cvii. 10–14; fear and terror, Job xxiv. 17; and dreadful darkness, Job x. 21, 22." Diodati paraphrases it: "Though I were in the terrors and dangers of present death;" Alexander: "Death-shade is a strong poetical expression for the profoundest darkness." Edwards speaks of "a vale overspread with a deadly shade." Yet many pious writers of good judgment suppose death itself is intended. Thus Scott: "Between that part of the flock which is on earth, and that which is gone to heaven, death lies, like a deep valley, that must be passed in going from the one to the other." Henry inclines to the same view. So also do Gill, Horne and Fry. It must be confessed that this latter is the popular view. How often is this verse repeated by dying saints. The writer has long noticed that many eminent ministers in the pulpit and in their devotional writings use the phrase in this sense.

But why may we not unite these views? Pains, which long continued would produce death; are called the pains of death. Paul says he was in deaths oft, because he suffered things which commonly lead to death. The phrase, ways of death, includes the misery of a wicked life here and hereafter, Prov. xiv. 12; xvi. 25. The darkness in our way through life is often a fit emblem of the gloom of a dying hour. It is probable that by shadow of death we are several times to understand all that is dark in life and in death. Once it seems clearly to point to death itself, being used interchangeably with that word, Job xxxviii. 17. Stevenson: "The 'valley of the shadow of death' is a remarkable phrase. It is peculiar to the Holy Scriptures, and to oriental literature. It is used to represent those horrible trials, those extreme difficulties and dangers, which darken the lot of humanity. Its import in this Psalm is not however to be limited to the troubles and sufferings of active life. The Psalmist neither excludes nor overlooks these; but he rises above and beyond them all. He reaches a climax of asseveration—'Yea, though I walk'—which comprehends every conceivable trial, and especially the last and severest to which our nature is exposed. Death is the principal object in the Psalmist's view. He has now reached the last point in his beautiful similitude; and the introduction of this comprehensive sentiment imparts a finish and completeness to the whole picture which he has so graphically delineated."

When walking refers to a man's behaviour, it indicates the course of his life. But when the subject is of a different nature, it has not necessarily any such import. We have the verb here rendered walk in these verses: David went to Jerusalem; Solomon went to the high place; Rehoboam went to Shechem, 1 Chron. xi. 4; 2 Chron. i. 3; x. 1. In Ps. xxxix. 13 we have the same verb in reference to death itself—"before I go [walk] hence, and be no more." One walks through the valley. The saints often pass through it in a short time. If walking be here taken to indicate the course of life, then David says that though much of his life should be spent in a darkness so dreadful as to remind him of the near approach of death, he would not be alarmed: I will fear no evil. Calvin: "As a sheep, when it wanders up and down through a dark valley, is preserved safe from the attacks of wild beasts and from harm in other ways, by the presence of the shepherd alone, so David now declares that as often as he shall be exposed to any danger, he will have sufficient defence and protection in being under the pastoral care of God. . . Now, since God, in the person of his only begotten Son, has exhibited himself to us as our Shepherd, much more clearly than he did in old time to the fathers who lived under the law, we do not render sufficient honor to his protecting care if we do not lift up our eyes to behold it, and keeping them fixed upon it, tread all fears and terrors under our feet." Our Shepherd walked through this valley in the days of his flesh. He entered the grave itself. He knows how necessary to our support is the divine presence, in our trials and in our dying agonies. If his people can look up and say to him, Thou art with me, they cannot yield to fear. Hengstenberg: I dare fear no evil. Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me. The rod was for guidance and defence, and the staff, for support. It was a crook and was put under the body of the sheep to stay it in slippery or miry places. Daniel Webster in his last hours, found no words more fit to express the support needed by a dying man than "thy rod and thy staff." Here as in previous clauses the verb is in the future, will comfort.

With the fourth verse the figure of a shepherd is dropped. Then that of a kind and rich host, exercising a large hospitality, is introduced. The imagery is drawn from the customs of oriental nations.

5. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies. Boothroyd and Street would attach the words, in the presence of mine enemies, to the next clause. For this change there is no good reason, nor is it favored by many. For preparest Calvin, Jebb and Alexander prefer the future, shalt prepare. For enemies Calvin reads persecutors; Ainsworth, distressors; church of England, them that trouble me; Septuagint, those that afflict me; Alexander, adversaries. To prepare a table was to make ready a feast. It was to do more than to give a loaf of bread to a weary pilgrim. It was to detain one as a guest and set before him the best of everything that could under the circumstances be had. The object was to give excellent food, solid refreshment. Stevenson is quite confident that the imagery of this verse is drawn from David's entertainment at the court of Saul; "David had experienced a remarkable and sudden elevation. The youthful shepherd had become a valiant warrior—and the attendant of a fold had now become an inhabitant of a court! His splendid victory over Goliath, his wide-spread fame as the deliverer of his country, his exalted honors as the favorite of the king, excited the envy and hatred of many. He knew that some of Saul's servants regarded him as their rival, and entertained towards him no friendly sentiments. The king himself, however, was still his friend; nor had his mind as yet experienced any unfavorable change." It seems a pity to spoil so beautiful an exposition. But whoever will read the history of David after slaying the giant of Gath will see that in some strange unaccountable way this excellent author has fallen into a total mistake. The eighteenth chapter of 1 Samuel is itself perfectly conclusive against his view. Saul's servants and subjects were David's warm friends, when the king himself was seeking the life of the champion of Israel. At Saul's house David was never a favorite of the king. It is surprising that even Tholuck says: "The first portion of David's stay at the court of Saul seems the most likely."

Some of the good things, with which the Saviour entertains and blesses his saints have been mentioned on verse 1. Others are stated in many Scriptures. He, who gives his life for our ransom, his body for our meat, and his blood for our drink, will surely give us all we need, Rom. viii. 32: John vi. 55. This feast was to be given in the presence of mine enemies, that is, in spite of them and with their knowledge. Alexander: "They are forced to witness my enjoyment without being able to disturb it." In this world the saints are never out of sight of foes, who would kill them if they could. Every sinner is at heart like Cain, though mercifully most of them are under restraint from education, law, conscience, or the common operations of God's Spirit. Wicked as the world is, there is a just and general impression, that in the last day, a little genuine piety, approved of God, will amount to more than all worldly power, wealth, honors and pleasures. And in this life the most wicked sometimes make singular acknowledgments of the value of true religion, Num. xxiii. 10; Esther vi. 13.

Not only is the feast in all the largeness of eastern hospitality; but the usual sign of welcome, of gladness and of honor is also given: Thou anointest my head with oil. There is nothing to warrant the reading of the Chaldee: Thou hast anointed with the anointing oil the head of my priests. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Jebb, Fry and Alexander follow the original and use the past tense—hast anointed; Calvin has it, wilt anoint. Many agree with the common version—anointest. The verb rendered anointest is another form of the verb rendered accept in Ps. xx. 3. It is found only in these two places in the Psalms. Ainsworth gives the usual rendering of the word in other places and reads: Thou makest fat my head with oil. See Prov. xi. 25; xiii. 4; xxviii. 25; Isa. xxxiv. 6, 7. When men were sad they covered themselves with dust and ashes. When joyous they washed and anointed themselves, Job ii. 12; xlii. 6; 2 Sam. xii. 20. Men never anointed themselves in token of grief, Ps. xlv. 7. The anointing of guests was also to show them honor, and to declare their welcome. Capt. J. Wilson: "I once had this ceremony performed on myself in the house of a great and rich Indian, in the presence of a large company. The gentleman of the house poured upon my head, my hands and arms, a delightful odoriferous perfume. He then put a golden cup into my hands, and poured wine into it till it ran over; assuring me at the same time, that it was a great pleasure to him to receive me, and that I should find a rich supply in his house." The clause probably means: "Thou treatest me like a well-accepted guest at the table which thou hast prepared for me." The oils at feasts were aromatic, and diffused sweet odors. The custom of anointing the head was common, Ps. xcii. 10; Am. vi. 6; Matt. vi. 17; Luke vii. 38, 46. It created joy, Ps. civ. 15; Eccle. ix. 8; Isa. lxi. 3. Hengstenberg: "The oil, which is the symbolical expression of joy, is one of the necessary accompaniments of a festive and joyful entertainment." But viands and anointing oil were not alone, and so he adds: My cup runneth over. There is no good reason for the rendering of several versions followed by the Doway: My chalice which inebriateth me, how goodly is it. The church of England and Fry have it: My cup shall be full; Calvin, Edwards and Hengstenberg: My cup overflows; Jebb: My cup shall overflow; Alexander: My cup is overflowing. The cup handed at feasts was designed to cheer the guests. The Lord can give gladness in the darkest hour. We are not straitened in him.

6. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life. The verbs of this verse are best rendered in the future. The weight of authority is in that direction, though a few prefer the present tense. It is a great attainment when God's people are persuaded of his "admirable freeness and readiness to do good to his people." Several versions made in the last three centuries read: Only for surely. But though authorized by the lexicons, and giving a good sense, they are not generally followed. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway erroneously omit goodness. Morison suggests that goodness may relate to providential or temporal blessings; and mercy may more immediately express those spiritual blessings which essentially involve the act of showing mercy to persons as guilty. But this distinction is not uniformly preserved in the English version. Goodness, as in Ps. xvi. 2; lxxviii. 10. Mercy, commonly a richer word than goodness often rendered mercy, as in each verse of Ps. cxxxvi.; loving-kindness in Ps. li. 1. For goodness the church of England reads loving-kindness; Hammond, bounty. For mercy Fry has tenderness; Edwards, favor; Hammond, superabundant mercy; Hengstenberg, love. David's persuasion was that goodness and mercy should follow him. His enemies had followed him, perhaps were now following him, and might follow him again with relentless enmity; but these things did not move him, while he knew that goodness and mercy should follow him. The ground of this agreeable persuasion was the promise of God, his experience of the love and care of his Shepherd, and the condescension and bountifulness of Him, who had spread the feast and made the son of Jesse a welcome, though undeserving guest. His bright hopes embraced, says he, all the days of my life. This rendering is literal and is generally adopted. So blessed an experience, so comforting persuasions could not naturally stop here. They must arouse the soul to other thoughts: And I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever. To the true Israel the house of God was from early times an emblem of the house not made with hands. Jesus said, "In my Father's house are many mansions." Those, who heard him, doubtless understood him as speaking of heaven. So that the last clause of this verse points not only to great blessings arising from communion with God on earth; but to the still higher, richer enjoyments of those, who worship in the sanctuary above. Diodati: "I shall dwell in his church in this world, and in the everlasting kingdom of heaven afterwards." Scott: "It is the desire, expectation, and determination [of his people] to seek their happiness in the service of God here; and they hope to enjoy his love, without enemy or interruption, for length of days, even forever in heaven hereafter. For ever, literally unto length of days. So the margin, the ancient versions, Calvin and Alexander. Jebb has end of days; Horsley and Fry, unto eternity, church of England, Edwards and Hengstenberg, for ever; in Ps. xciii. 5, for ever."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God is most loving. In condescension to our weakness he calls himself a Shepherd, that he may persuade us of his care and pity, v. 1. None but he, who dwells with the humble and contrite ones, would allow such titles to be given him.

2. This Psalm celebrates a time of prosperity. Then may we be sure that God's bounties of every kind are real blessings when they incline us to devout and thankful acknowledgments; and when they strengthen our purposes of holy obedience; otherwise they carry a curse with them. Blessed is he who "knows how to abound." He shall know "how to be abased," "to be hungry," and "to suffer need."

3. The Bible was not written to teach logic, yet finer specimens of strong reasoning can nowhere be found than in the sacred volume. Verse one is a specimen: "The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want." There are many like it: "Fear not, for I have redeemed thee;" "Because I live, ye shall live also;" "If God be for us, who can be against us?" "If children, then heirs;" "If, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son; much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life;" "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?"

4. If you would be happy, set your hope in God alone, v. 1. David did not say, Because I am renowned, have lands of my own and a royal revenue beside, and also because "the LORD is my Shepherd; I shall not want." The last was enough. It was all that was worth mentioning. We need nothing but what we find in God. We but weaken our faith by relying on appearances and creatures.

5. This Psalm, like most others celebrating personal experience, teaches the excellence of an appropriating faith, which can say, My Shepherd, v. 1. If divine promises are to help us, we must embrace them. The faith which can truly say, My Shepherd! My Lord! My God! My Rock! turns prophecies into history, promises into deliverances, sorrows into joys, prisons into palaces, perils into victories, death into life. Nothing else can do so much.

6. As we need much in this life and more in the next, that which can keep us from want is precisely what ought to be the object of our quest, v. 1. He who has not the LORD for his Shepherd, may seek and obtain everything catalogued by the wise of earth, and he is still a poor creature. Riches take wings and fly away. The greatest heroes often die unwept. The greatest favorites of the mighty are often the first to feel the weight of their displeasure. Nothing created or liable to change can do us permanent good.

7. The richest man in a city may be the poorest; for if he has not his Shepherd's favor and care he lacks the most necessary thing. And the poorest man in a city is often the richest; for first, he thinks he has enough, and so is content; secondly, his eternal life is in the hands of Christ; thirdly, he has the sympathy of his Shepherd, who knows by experience what poverty is. Stevenson: "Our blessed Saviour's life on earth has honored and adorned the poor man's lot. Jesus of Nazareth was always poor, yet he never wanted. He lived on the providence of his heavenly Father, and never, in a single instance, did he perform a miracle to relieve his hunger." Fourthly, the eternal interests of the pious poor man are all secured. "The world loves its own, and God loves his own." He will provide. Earthly parents may die at any time, but the Christian's Father never dies.

8. So that the believer must be happy, v. 1. It cannot be otherwise unless second causes can thwart the great First cause, unless weakness can hinder omnipotence, unless folly can subvert wisdom. God is the believer's portion. Christ is his elect Saviour. The Holy Spirit is his Comforter. The world is his. Heaven is his. Nothing rests on a surer basis than his permanent happiness.

9. Some pious souls are troubled because they cannot at all times, or often use in its joyous import the language of this Psalm. Such should remember that David, though he lived long, never wrote but one twenty-third Psalm. Some of his odes do indeed express as lively a faith as this, and faith can walk in darkness. But where else do we find a whole Psalm expressive of personal confidence, joy and triumph from beginning to end? God's people have their seasons of darkness and their times of rejoicing. Luther: "The prophet has not at all times been so happy; he has not been able at all times to sing as he does here."

10. The saints cannot but find refreshment in the word and ordinances of God. These constitute the green pastures of the flock, v. 2. If you would know why the words of God are so nourishing and excellent to the souls of his people, read Psalms xix. cxix. They "rejoice at his word, as one that findeth great spoil." In like manner God's worship in all its parts builds up believers in faith, comfort and holiness; so that generally they esteem one day in the courts of the Lord better than a thousand.

11. As it is the habit of sheep, reposing at noon after feeding on the green pastures, to ruminate their food, so many pious writers, from v. 2 take occasion to urge the duty of devout meditation.

12. Some suppose that in v. 2, where waters are spoken of, the Holy Spirit is referred to. Though many may doubt this, yet in other parts of Scripture that allusion is clearly made. Indeed in John vii. 37, it is formally stated. The quietness and refreshments which the souls of believers enjoy, come from that blessed source. When he speaks peace, who can give trouble?

13. The doctrine of restoring the soul, v. 3, or of converting it to God, should in a world like ours excite gratitude at the mercy of God, which makes such a blessing possible and actual. What is clearer than that the lost must be recovered or perish, that those who are rushing headlong to ruin must be stopped, and their course changed or they cannot see life? Conversion is an old doctrine. He, who practically rejects it, is undone.

14. But even after a first sound conversion to God, the soul may err like a lost sheep, and so need to be restored again. To Christians this is a mournful but a very practical subject. Solemn heart-searchings should be made in all the churches that every man may learn how his case stands with God. Am I a backslider in life or in heart? is never an idle question.

15. Everywhere in the Scriptures holiness is made essential to salvation, v. 3. He who dreams that he can enter heaven without purity of heart and righteousness of life, and dies in that delusion, will awake to shame and everlasting contempt.

16. One essential element of holiness is total self-renunciation, and an acknowledgement that we are nothing at all. God is everything, v. 3. What he does for us he does for his name's sake. Nothing can more oppose God than to cry with the Pharisee, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are;" or with Priestley, "Repentance and a good life are of themselves sufficient to recommend us to the divine favor;" or with Mrs. Barbauld, "When will Christians permit themselves to believe that the same conduct, which gains them the approbation of good men here, will secure the favor of heaven hereafter?" Will men never cease to make God to serve with their sins, and to weary him with their iniquities? Isa. xliii. 24.

17. Seasons of great joy should be made sober by remembering the days of darkness, which will come. When we ride upon our high places we should not forget the valley of the shadow of death, v. 4. "From troubles of some kind there is no exemption in the present state." Commonly the longer we live the sorer are our trials. At all times of distress, let us trust God and fear no evil, never be afraid with any amazement, never anticipate evils which may not come upon us, never magnify the trials we endure, never rely with confidence on human devices for deliverance, never deplore what is unavoidable, never hew out cisterns which can hold no water, always put the best construction on God's procedure, always expect that more light will remove much of our perplexity, always remember that if God should cease to be a mysterious being, he would cease to be God; and that a government without acts inexplicable to mortals, cannot be divine.

18. Solemn and even awful as is the subject of death, the fear of it can be quite overcome, v. 4. Compare Heb. ii. 15. Christ can conquer every foe, and drive away every fear, and cause his people to shout and sing of victory even in the agonies of dissolution. Henry: "Here is one word which sounds terrible; it is death, . . . but there are four words which lessen the terror. 1. It is but the shadow of death, there is no substantial evil in it; the shadow of a serpent will not sting, nor the shadow of a sword kill. 2. It is the valley of the shadow, deep indeed, and dark, and dirty; but the valleys are fruitful, and so is death itself fruitful of comforts to God's people. 3. It is but a walk in this valley, a gentle pleasant walk: the wicked are chased out of the world, and their souls are required; but the saints take a walk to another world as cheerfully as they take their leave of this. 4. It is a walk through it; they shall not be lost in it, but get safe to the mountain of spices on the other side of it."

19. Christ must be a wonderful person that his presence should produce so amazing effects. His birth troubled Herod and all Jerusalem with him, because they were wicked; but it gave joy in heaven. His presence greatly troubled the Gadarenes; but it calmed the troubled sea. His grasp is death; his frown is hell; his grace is salvation; his smile is heaven. "The Lamb is the light thereof." Truly this is the Son of God.

20. The blessings which Jesus pours on his people are rich and varied, v. 5. He is the Master of the house of God. He alone is fit to rule there. His kindness is unbounded. His condescension is amazing. His resources are infinite. O blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ. He makes us a feast of fat things. So costly provisions were never heard of before. He invites the maimed, the halt and the blind; but he cures all their maladies. He calls the poor and the outcast; but he clothes them with the garments of salvation. All the choice spirits of the universe shall be at the marriage supper of the Lamb. He loves his saints. He often shows them a token for good. He anoints their heads with oil. Their cup runneth over.

21. The anointing of v. 5, clearly points to the effusion of the Holy Ghost. When he is poured out, the whole character is changed. Every grace of the Christian is savory like the oil, compounded after the art of the apothecary, and poured upon the head of Aaron, when he became high priest, Ps. cxxxiii. 1, 2.

22. The cup that runneth over, v. 5, has special reference to divine consolations. Wine cheers the heart of man. Much more does the gracious presence of God's Spirit enliven and animate the soul of the believer. It makes him hope against hope. It lifts him up above the world. It takes away the bitterness of death. It gives boldness in the greatest perils. The day of judgment shall not terrify the saints, 1 John iv. 17.

23. Past experience of God's favor has its due effect upon us, when it leads us humbly and firmly to rely on his goodness and mercy for days to come, v. 6. The wicked often have a vain confidence for the future. It is not set in God. But the righteous know whom they have believed. They have tried him, and found him unfailing.

24. Love to God's house, accompanied by a desire and purpose to maintain with it a permanent connection, belongs to true piety, v. 6. It was not peculiar to David to say, "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord and to inquire in his temple," Ps. xxvii. 4. The reason is given in Ps. xxxvi. 8-10; lxxxiv. 4-11.

25. Christian worship gains an important end when by it we are made heavenly-minded, and our contemplations and affections are lifted to glorious things at God's right hand, v. 6. The attractions of that world are great, and always increasing. Why think we so little of our eternal home?

26. The want of faith renders nugatory even the most precious portions of Scripture. This Psalm is often admired as a poetic composition by men to whom its divine teachings have no more saving power than the ode of a heathen poet.

27. The distinction between saints and sinners is not idle, or modal, or formal. It is true, real, necessary. It is made by God himself. There is a difference between him, who is led by the good Shepherd, and him, who is led captive by the devil at his will; between him, who feeds in the green pastures, and him, who feeds on vanity. Oh that men saw this difference as they ought. Oh that in all preaching it were more carefully observed and made prominent.

28. Sinner! Will you be saved? You are wandering on the dark mountains. Will you not take the Lord as your Shepherd? Your wants are many and are constantly increasing. Will you not turn? Oh that you would. You are lost, lost, LOST! Your state is dismal but not hopeless, forlorn but not desperate. Hear the voice of Jesus: "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." "I am the door: by me if any man enter in, he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture," John x. 9, 11. You are lost, but Christ's errand into this world was to seek and to save that which is lost. The door is now open, but it will soon be shut. Mercy is now offered; but mercy slighted will inconceivably enhance your damnation.

29. What a Saviour is Jesus! He is matchless. Lavington: "Blessed Jesus! how infinitely hast thou outdone the best shepherd that ever existed! Many have been remarkable for looking diligently to the state of their flocks, providing for them suitable pasture, taking care that none of them go astray, and defending them against the beasts of prey to which they were exposed; but when did any one lay down his life for his sheep? Yet this has been done by our compassionate Shepherd." He deserves all our love.

Had I ten thousand thousand tongues,
Not one should silent be;
Had I ten thousand thousand hearts,
I'd give them all to thee.

PSALM XXIV.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 The earth is the LORD's, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.
- 2 For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods.
- 3 Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? or who shall stand in his holy place?
- 4 He that hath clean hands, and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity, nor sworn deceitfully.
- 5 He shall receive the blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the God of his salvation.
- 6 This is the generation of them that seek him, that seek thy face, O Jacob. Selah.
- 7 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.
- 8 Who is this King of glory? The LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.
- 9 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.
- 10 Who is this King of glory? The LORD of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii.

It seems to be pretty well agreed that this ode was composed 1042 or 1043 B. C. The proof of the Davidic authorship is strong and is generally acknowledged. Cocceius, Amesius, Williams, Hammond, Horsley and Fry regard this Psalm as a dialogue. This opinion gives no advantage in interpreting it, and is justly rejected by a large majority of Commentators.

Many give it a historic origin, though there is no general agreement what that was. Diodati supposes it has special reference to the removal of the ark, as mentioned in 2 Sam. vi; 2 Chron. iii. See also 1 Chron. xv. xvi. This view is followed by Patrick, Delany and Bishop Lowth; strongly maintained by Hengstenberg, and favored by Alexander. The most serious objection to it is that in 1 Chron. xvi. 8-36, there is given us at length the Psalm sung on that occasion. It consists of twenty-eight verses; this, of but ten. It no more resembles this than any other joyful sacred ode of comprehensive adoration and gratitude. It may be said that Psalms xv. and xxiv. were also sung on that occasion. This can neither be proven nor disproven. Others think this Psalm was composed by David to be sung at the dedication of the temple, which he knew by prophecy should be built by Solomon. But in the account we have of the dedication of that wonderful house it is not hinted that this Psalm or any part of it was used. Mudge takes another view: "This seems to be a song of triumph; returning victorious from the war, they are supposed ascending up to the temple, as the Romans did to the capitol, and there replacing in it the ark with great pomp." Others are of the same mind. Against this Hengstenberg argues with spirit, though not conclusively. The Septuagint adds to the title these words "of the first day of the week," signifying that this Psalm was sung on the day succeeding the Sabbath. The Jewish doctors expressly say this was actually done, as Ainsworth has shown. Williams quotes from Bruce's travels an account of a ceremony observed in the reception of the king of Ethiopia, which he supposes may have had its origin in this Psalm, or in some Eastern custom, even more ancient than this sacred song. Could it be shown that ancient orientals had such a usage, it might give us a knowledge of the origin of some of the imagery of the Psalm; but it is hardly safe to follow such a conjecture.

This Psalm contains a blessed prophecy respecting Christ and the glory of his kingdom. Any language in it borrowed from the ascent of Mount Zion at any time, or from any Eastern usage, had but an allusion to things seen, which were types of things yet to come in the setting up of Christ's kingdom on earth, and in his glorious ascension to heaven, first, forty days after his own resurrection, and secondly, after he shall have gathered all his chosen to himself in the last day. There were no gates to the acropolis of Mount Zion; nor were there any everlasting doors to the tabernacle or to the temple. The former was made of curtains that perished, as did also the doors of the latter. And it is confidently said that the doors of the temple opened as do our doors, and not by being lifted up. That the Typical-Messianic view is not unwarranted has been the opinion of many. Cocceius says the theme of this Psalm is "the spiritual kingdom of God;" Henry: "This Psalm is concerning the kingdom of Jesus Christ;" Nicholson: "The subject of this Psalm is Christ, called the king of glory;" Scott: "This Psalm is supposed to have been written and sung, with some others, when David removed the ark to Jerusalem; and perhaps it might also be used when the ark was carried into Solomon's temple. But the ascension of Christ into heaven seems to have been sublimely prefigured under these typical events." Horsley: "Messiah is certainly the Jehovah of this Psalm;" Fry: "The ascension of our great High Priest into the courts of the Zion, which is above, is very evidently the subject of this Psalm." Hengstenberg: "The coming of the Lord of glory, the high demands upon his people proceeding from this, the absolute necessity to prepare worthily for his arrival form the subject matter of this Psalm." Alexander: "The sanctuary of the old economy, both in its permanent and temporary forms, was intended to symbolize the doctrine of God's special presence and residence among his people; and as this was realized in the advent of Christ, the Psalm before us has a permanent interest and use, and in a certain sense may be described as Messianic."

The reader will notice the resemblance between this and the fifteenth Psalm. Yet they are independent compositions, probably introduced into the temple service about the same time. Hengstenberg thinks this the older composition. Alexander thinks they were "composed for use on a similar if not the same occasion." Scott dates them the same year.

The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. The earth is the Lord's. This clause contains the truth on which the rest of the Psalm is founded. The message is to the inhabitants of earth, and the first thing said to them is, The very earth on which you walk is Jehovah's, not yours.

Here God has rights of ownership and rights of sovereignty, undeniable and inalienable. He is proprietor to the exclusion of all others. Satan is the God of this world in no other sense than as a usurper, supported by the wicked, who are his children. The gods of the heathen are vanities and lies. They can neither see, nor save, nor hear, nor help. They and the devil have no rights here. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. Chaldee: And the creatures thereof; Arabic: In its entirety; Amesius and Hengstenberg: And that which fills it; Edwards: And all that it contains; Fry: And all that is therein; church of England: And all that therein is; Ainsworth: And the plentie thereof; Horsley: And its whole furniture; Pool: "All the creatures, and especially the inhabitants wherewith it is replenished." Calvin: "Under the word fulness all the riches with which the earth is adorned are comprehended." 1 Cor. x. 26. If there was in the world one man, or one creature, or one atom, over which God was not sovereign, it would be impossible to foretell the evil and confusion that might follow. The world, and they that dwell therein, also belong to Jehovah. Morison: "The world is the poetic substitute for earth, and generally denotes the inhabited earth." Hengstenberg and Alexander regard it as denoting the productive or fruit-bearing portion of the earth. The same word is found in Ps. ix. 8; xviii. 15; xxxiii. 8; l. 12; lxxvii. 18; lxxxix. 11. Call the world by what name you will, the Lord is its sole and sovereign proprietor. This truth is next proven:

2. For he hath founded it upon the seas, and established it upon the floods. For established the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and church of England read prepared. Hengstenberg: For he has founded it above the seas, and made it fast above the floods. The language is popular, not philosophical. It speaks of things as they appear. Founded and established are words that point out the stability of the order of things witnessed on earth, marking the presence of an almighty, all-wise and unchangeable Jehovah. God's right to the earth is based on his having created it, and given it all its laws, products and blessings.

3. Who shall ascend into the hill of the LORD? Chaldee: Who shall ascend into the mountain of the house of the sanctuary of the Lord? Septuagint and kindred versions: Who shall ascend into the mountain of the Lord? Calvin: Who shall ascend unto the hill of Jehovah? Venema, Amesius, Edwards and Ainsworth: Who shall ascend into the mountain of Jehovah? Hengstenberg: Who shall ascend the hill of the Lord? Alexander: Who shall go up into the mountain of Jehovah? The hill or mountain was Zion where God's worship was so long, so splendidly and so edifyingly celebrated. Or who shall stand in his holy place? i. e., in Jehovah's holy place? The import of both questions in this verse is the same: Who shall truly and acceptably worship God in his earthly courts, and so at last be admitted to heaven itself? Alexander: "The verb in the last clause does not simply mean to stand, but to stand fast, to maintain one's ground," Ps. i. 5. Many enter the house of God and the church of God, and soon fall away. Others without any saving change of heart maintain their visible good standing for a long time, some even till life ends, but in eternity they awake to shame and everlasting contempt. God told them beforehand what sort of worshipper he would accept:

4. He that hath clean hands and a pure heart. Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and Venema: The innocent of hands and clean of heart; Ainsworth: The clean in hands, and pure in heart; Amesius: The innocent in hands and pure in mind; Street, Jebb, Fry and Alexander: The clean of hands, and pure of heart; Calvin: He who is clean of hands and pure of heart. In Scripture language he has clean hands who has not defiled them with blood, or violence, or bribery, or fraud, or unjust gain, or wrong doing of any kind towards God or man, the hands being the instruments of action,

But the hands are governed by the heart, so that must be pure. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he." None but the pure in heart shall see God, Matt. v. 8. Men judge of the heart by acts, but God judges acts by the heart, and the heart by itself. A pure heart shows itself chiefly in two ways: by hatred of guile, hypocrisy, vain thoughts, vile affections, sins of every kind; and by love to truth, purity, holiness, uprightness, God and all his excellence. He who meets the foregoing description is also one who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity. Vanity so rendered also in Ps. xii. 2; xli. 6; cxix. 37 and often. Though idols are vanities, yet a man may lift up his soul to vanity without open idolatry. Many things besides idols are a vanity, a lie, as the word is elsewhere rendered. All their lives some walk in a vain show. But the godly prefers truth to any form of delusion, seriousness and even sorrow to levity and trifling. Such a man can be trusted. Nor [hath he] sworn deceitfully. Our version is literal. Chaldee: Hath not sworn to a falsehood to the condemnation of his own soul. Other ancient versions generally agree with ours, some adding without cause, to his neighbor. Sworn deceitfully, Edwards renders: Sworn with deceitful intentions; Fry: Hath not sworn to a falsehood; Hengstenberg: Nor swears deceitfully; Alexander: Has not sworn to fraud; Street: Doth not swear with intention to deceive; Ainsworth: Doth not swear to deceit. One may swear deceitfully to his Maker as well as to his fellow-mortal. Vows to God are of the same solemn nature with oaths, Ps. cxix. 106. Some regard this clause as parallel to the last clause of Ps. xv. 4, and so it is to some extent; but this covers more ground than that. Perhaps no verse of holy Scripture in so few words more clearly delineates the character of a real saint. Such a man shall be saved; for,

5. He shall receive the blessing from the LORD, and righteousness from the God of his salvation. The blessing is better than a blessing, or blessing. For righteousness the Septuagint and kindred versions have mercy. The word occurs more than thirty times in the Psalms, and is uniformly rendered righteousness. Elsewhere it is sometimes rendered justice, right, but never mercy. For righteousness Edwards reads a gracious reward. Pool favors this sense "as the work is often put for the reward of it," Job vii. 2; Ps. cxix. 20. But this is a limitation of an idea intended to be far more comprehensive. The good man shall receive the blessing, i. e., every good and perfect gift, temporal and spiritual, pleasing and disciplinary—the blessing which maketh rich and addeth no sorrow, including grace and glory, all of earth that is worth having, and all of heaven that his capacities can embrace. He shall in the end have justice done to his motives, his character, his heavenly aims. He shall receive such an elevation of personal character as shall make him equal to the angels, and in his measure like unto God himself. Jehovah shall evince his perfect approval of his character by many infallible signs. Yea, the Lord shall make him an eternal partaker of that perfect and spotless righteousness which was wrought out by Christ, which is the sole ground of our acceptance with God, and gives a right to the tree of life, Rev. xxii. 14. We have the best authority for saying that righteousness had this last meaning at least as early as the days of Abraham, Gen. xv. 6; Rom. iv. 22, 23; Gal. iii. 6. Why are men so averse to finding in God's word the doctrine of a gratuitous salvation by imputed righteousness? The phrase—the God of his salvation—points to something far beyond mere justice, as that term is commonly understood. There is always a race of such justified and upright men on earth, and so it is added,

6. This is the generation of them that seek him. Calvin: "By the demonstrative pronoun this, the Psalmist erases from the catalogue of the servants of God, all counterfeit Israelites, who, trusting only to their circumcision and the sacrifices of beasts, have no concern about offering themselves to God; and yet, at the same time, they rashly thrust themselves into the church." Generation, the same as in Ps. xiv. 5;

xxii. 30. To seek Jehovah is to be truly and habitually devoted to his fear and service. The phrase comprehends the whole of religion. See on Ps. ix. 10. This is the race that seek Jehovah, that seek thy face, O Jacob. This clause has perplexed many. The leading views are these. Some read, That seek thy face in Jacob. That is, they seek out the true church and desire by faith a union with her, because God is with her. There is little to support this, although it gives not a bad sense. Others suppose there is an unusual ellipsis here, and for O Jacob read O God of Jacob. The reasons for this rendering are these: 1. In two of Kennicott's Manuscripts this is the reading of the Hebrew text. 2. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Doway, Horne and others all have it God of Jacob. 3. This gives a good sense. The change of person from the third to the second is quite common in Hebrew poetry. The great objection to reading God of Jacob is that the Hebrew text of collated MSS. does not sufficiently authorize it. Others read, That seek thy face as Jacob, i. e., very earnestly, and importunately as Jacob, so as to prevail. This is not much urged. Nor can much be said in its favor. Hengstenberg renders it: This is the generation which reverences him, who seek thy face, are Jacob. This is not very intelligible. But in his exposition he regards it as asserting, "that only those who are earnest in their pursuit after holiness, according to the good pleasure of God, are the true posterity of Jacob, and form the people of the covenant, who are under grace. The others, notwithstanding their descent from Jacob, belong not to Jacob, but are heathen, and thus children of wrath." Alexander's translation is lucid: This is the generation seeking him: the seekers of thy face (are) Jacob, i. e., the true Jacob, the true Israel. Perhaps the best rendering is that of Ainsworth: This is the generation of them that inquire for him, of them that seek thy face, of Jacob. Thus of Jacob has the same import as the two preceding phrases. This translation is every way allowable, and avoids the necessity of supposing any ellipse. The parallelism is thus fully preserved. The sense then is, This is the generation, the true progeny of Jacob, the body of true Israelites, the congregation of worshippers who shall be accepted in the holy hill, John i. 47; Rom. ix. 6. The distinction between true and false Israelites is maintained in all the Scriptures. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

7. Lift up your heads, O ye gates. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway: Lift up your gates, O ye princes; John Rogers: Open your gates, O ye princes. The objections to this rendering are serious. They need not be given in detail. The grammatical difficulty is insurmountable. With the English version substantially agree the Syriac, Calvin, church of England, Bishops' Bible, Genevan Translation, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others. Chaldee: Ye gates of the house of the sanctuary, lift up your heads. The common version is correct. And be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors. The renderings of this verse are quite uniform. At least the variations are unimportant. The object of opening the gates and doors is to this end: And the King of glory shall come in. It seems almost impossible to give to this verse an interpretation that should confine its import to any scene ever enacted in Judea. Hengstenberg: "The gates of the newly built temple could not possibly be called everlasting gates." If so, they could hardly be so called when not in existence, and when they lasted so short a time, Isa. lxiii. 18. We are compelled to seek a higher sense than any that should confine it to the removal of the ark. The language of the prophet rises far above the solemn scenes witnessed on earth, and at once passes to the things shadowed forth by the ark, the tabernacle and temple, all of which were figures of Christ and of heaven. The removal of the ark to Mount Zion was a faint shadow of the ascension of Christ, the King of glory, to receive whom the heavens opened their everlasting gates. Scott: "This may represent the Saviour at his ascension, demanding by his attendant angels admission into heaven, as Man and Mediator; yet at the same time as 'the King of glory,' and the LORD strong and mighty;" Morison: "And what was the bright cloud which shone resplendently from off the mercy-seat, from between the cherubim of glory, but an anticipated exhibition of that 'mystery of godliness, God manifest in the flesh?' He emphatically is 'the King and Lord of glory,' whose triumphant ascension to the portals of the celestial sanctuary was hailed by the shout of myriads of angelic bands, who gladly threw open 'the everlasting doors' to the glorified human nature of the Son of God, and saw him with rapture sit down, in everlasting majesty, 'on the right hand of power;'" Fry: "King, or Lord of Glory, is an undoubted title of Messiah."

8. Who is this King of glory? If the gates of the celestial city are to be opened to him, if the everlasting doors of the temple not made with hands are to be lifted up, that one, who has never in his present form reigned there before, may enter in triumph, it is natural to inquire, For whom are claimed such exalted honors? The answer is, The LORD [Jehovah] strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle. The honors here ascribed to Christ are no greater than those given him in Isa. vi. 1-5; ix. 6, 7, and in many other places. He is Jehovah. He is mighty. He is almighty. He is the Lord of lords and the King of kings, Rev. i. 8; xix. 16. He is mighty in battle. He is the Captain of our salvation. He is invincible. Who ever hardened himself against Christ and prospered?

9. Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. The language varies very slightly from that of v. 7. The repetition of it expresses fixedness of purpose, and the consciousness of possessing authority to require the thing to be done.

10. Who is this King of glory? This is not a vain repetition of the question in v. 8. It is as if the psalmist had said, I have said something of him. Would any know more of him? Does any ask further of his glory? I will declare it. I have already said that on earth his power is resistless. I will further state that he is The LORD of hosts, he is the King of glory. He is the Jehovah of armies. He has authority over all the heavenly hosts. So the Scriptures assert, Matt. xxviii. 18; Eph. i. 21; iii. 10; Col. i. 16; ii. 10. The Lord of Sabaoth is a glorious title. It is retained in two cases in the New Testament, Rom. ix. 29; James v. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God is sole Creator of the universe and its inhabitants, v. 1. This pillar of truth must stand unshaken or all our religion becomes heathenish, Acts xvii. 24-26.

2. The Lord made all things, not for the glory and honor of any race of creatures, much less of any particular tribe, or order of men, but for himself, v. 1. "Of him, and to him, and through him, are all things; to whom be glory for ever. Amen." Rom. xi. 36.

3. The scope of the opening of the Psalm seems to be the same as that of Deut. x. 14-16. "Behold the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the LORD's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is. Only the LORD had a delight of thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your hearts, and be no more stiff-necked." Peculiar distinctions and privileges, whether national or personal, impose peculiar obligations. God's sovereignty is a precious and a profitable doctrine. It gladdens the pious heart, Matt. xi. 25, 26. It humbles the soul. God chose not the Jewish nation because they were descended from a race of pious ancestors, Josh. xxiv. 2. Of this he often reminds them. Christians are by nature as vile as others.

4. If God is universal Creator and Preserver, his worship ought to be universal. And it would be, if men were not wicked. His tender mercies are over all his works. Towards him all hearts should be tender and obedient.

5. Instead of its being a very surprising thing that the world was once deluged with water, the wonder rather is that it is not always so. Instead of this it is firmly founded upon the seas and established upon the floods, v. 2. Yet the water is far lighter than the dry land. The only reason why the earth is not deluged all the time is given by God to the man of Uz, Job xxxviii. 8-11.

6. Cobbin: "The pious mind views all things in God, and God in all things," vv. 1, 2. This is right. If men were not without God in the world, they would all do so. Devout thoughts of the Creator are as elevating as they are just.

7. While there is nothing in natural science to convert the soul, yet when men's hearts are renewed by the Holy Ghost, they do find much food for devout adoration in all God's works, vv. 1, 2. Cobbin: "Those who duly contemplate the works of God will worship him." Such men as Sir Isaac Newton and Linnæus could not be infidels; the one saw his God in the splendor of the heavens; the other, even in the thorny heath, decked with its yellow flowers: he saw, and adored."

8. God's proprietary title is perfect; being built on his creative and providential control of all things, vv. 1, 2. Consequently sin is an attempt to take away God's rights. It is fraud, theft, robbery, impudence, rebellion against God. Sin is the worst thing that God or man ever contemplated, Isa. i. 2; Jer. ii. 12.

9. Truth has vast bearings and logical connections. From the words of verse 1, The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, Paul infers first, It is in itself lawful to eat any wholesome food; secondly, We ought not by eating anything to tempt our neighbor to do wrong, for we can eat other things as well; thirdly, Whether we eat or drink or whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of God, for he owns all, 1 Cor. x. 25-31.

10. Men, who make their philosophy a fountain of atheism, are as much out of the way in their science as in their religion. We all may properly speak of the laws of nature; but if by them we mean more than the fixed principles on which God governs nature, or the uniform methods of the divine procedure, we are atheists; for Jehovah has founded and established and maintains the whole course of nature. From him it has all its stability, v. 2. Providence as loudly proclaims a presiding, as creation does an originating Deity.

11. Often do the Scriptures present the question of the nature of true religion, v. 3. No weightier matter can claim human attention. J. Edwards: "There is no question of greater importance to mankind, and that it more concerns every individual person to be well resolved in, than this: What are the distinguishing qualifications of those that are in favor with God, and entitled to his eternal rewards? Or, which comes to the same thing, What is the nature of true religion, and wherein lie the distinguishing notes of that virtue which is acceptable in the sight of God?" It is a great mercy that God's word speaks so frequently and so clearly on the subject.

12. There always has been, there now is, and till time shall end there always shall be a church on earth, v. 3. Wherever God has recorded his name, has heard prayer, has been worshipped in spirit and in truth, there he has had a holy place, whether on a hill, or in the valley. It has always been true that where two or three were met in God's name, they have had his blessing. Yea, one man of fervent prayer has found a barren spot in a desert to be none other than the house of God and the gate of heaven.

13. Outward membership in the visible church is not itself saving, nor is it an infallible sign of one's being in a saving state, v. 3. It is always pertinent and proper to note the difference in the two classes that compose the church, some having the form of godliness but denying its power, others cleaving to the Lord with purpose of heart, and perhaps caring but little for the ceremonies of religion.

14. One of the master-pieces of Satanic craft has been to effect a divorce between morality and religion, while God's plan is to join them inseparably together, vv. 3, 4. Nor does our great enemy seem to have any marked preference for religion without morality over morality without religion. Why should he? Morality without religion is but a smooth way of descending to hell. Religion without morality is monstrous. Williams: "Neither painted hypocrites, nor self-righteous Pharisees, nor mere formal professors; but the true worshippers only of the true God will Jehovah admit to reside with him." A wicked life destroys all hope of salvation arising from any boasted experience, or the most flaming profession. Judgment, mercy and faith are weighty matters of the law, Matt. xxiii. 23. If professed piety makes men no better, what is it worth? Clean hands and a pure heart must accompany any valid profession of religion. Spotless outward behaviour without real sanctity of internal character proves no man to be on his way to glory.

15. Our English word vanity as used by our best classics points to a foolish desire to be esteemed above one's real merits. It also signifies an idle display, a vain ostentation, a petty pride. Sometimes it describes a tripping levity contrary to reasonable sobriety of mind. Again it points to falsehood, deceit. In all these senses of the word, vanity is sinful—is condemned in Scripture. Each kind shows a great lack of understanding, leads to self-deception, is unfriendly to truth, is without holidays, makes men sooner or later appear foolish, is very common, is very difficult of cure; and is always odious to right-minded people. Indeed none seem to dislike vanity in others more than the vain themselves. An accepted worshipper must not lift up his soul unto vanity of any kind, v. 4.

16. The Scriptures throw a sacredness around promises, contracts, covenants, vows and oaths, v. 4. To society this is a great mercy. When truth is fallen in the streets, iniquity riots. Perhaps no one thing adds so much to the personal happiness of men as truth-telling, and nothing adds more to the sum of human misery than lying. It is a misery to him who speaks it, to him who hears it, and to him of whom it is spoken. It destroys all self-respect and subverts all confidence. It is especially painful to witness the laxity of men's moral sentiments respecting oaths—oaths in the halls of justice, in bills in chancery, in custom-houses, and oaths of office. He, who swears deceitfully, will find no admission to the assembly of the spirits of just men made perfect.

17. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord, vv. 4, 5. Where purity is lacking, all else is useless. Heaven is not a harbor for rogues, nor a hive for drones, nor a dormitory for sluggards, nor a kennel for dogs.

18. No higher praise can be given to any than this: "Behold an Israelite indeed in whom is no guile." Nor can a fouler blot be put on any character than by a just charge of deceit, treachery, unfaithfulness. God abhors the latter as much as he approves the former. He cares not for our attendance on ordinances, if the heart is not in the matter. Luther: "It is not he who sings so well or so many Psalms, nor he who fasts and watches so many days, nor he who divides his own among the poor, nor he who preaches to others, nor he who lives quietly, kindly and friendly; nor, in fine, is it he who knows all sciences and languages, nor he who works all virtuous and all good works that ever any man spoke or read of, but it is he alone, who is pure within and without."

19. The blessed man is he whom the Lord blesses, and no other, v. 5.

20. When in his holiness God secures to his persecuted ones justice, to his faithful ones a rich reward, to his chosen ones an abundance of the gift of righteousness, how can they suffer want? v. 5.

21. All men are not utterly base and unprincipled; there is a generation that seek God, v. 6. Those, who say there is no genuine piety in the world, are as wide of the mark as those, who say that all professors have true godliness. Wheat is not tares; nor are tares wheat. Sheep are not goats, even if goats mingle with them. In the divine mind the line that separates saints and sinners, genuine and spurious professors, is as broad as the earth.

22. And as God knows who are his, so by his blessing he will in due time make them known to others, saying that they are Jacob, the true Israel, v. 6. "The good works of some are manifest beforehand: and they that are otherwise cannot be hid." 1 Tim. v. 25.

23. There are great events and great sights before all the saints, vv. 7, 9. There is no danger that after this life the just will lack a divine entertainment. The removal of the ark to mount Zion was a dull affair compared with Christ's ascension to heaven; and his ascension to heaven as seen from earth was as nothing, compared with his second coming, although this shall be in like manner. Nor shall the final judgment present the last grand spectacle that shall be witnessed by the redeemed. It will be but the beginning of unceasing wonders.

24. Christ Jesus is in the midst of worshipping assemblies. The king of glory comes in, vv. 7, 9. In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee, Ex. xx. 24. Compare Matt. xviii. 20. From age to age Christ is gracious to the penitent, who tremble at his word, and call on his name.

25. Christ must be received, v. 7. This is indispensable. Not to welcome him is to reject him. Not to open the heart to him is to bar it against him. Dickson: "The way to make men true converts, true believers, true saints and inheritors of heaven, is to receive Christ heartily, and honorably to cast up doors in hearty consent of faith and love, like triumphant arches, for welcoming so glorious a conqueror to be their guest." We must with full consent receive Christ, Rev. iii. 20.

26. Hitherto men have known Christ chiefly in a lowly condition, but he is the King of glory, vv. 7-10. He was so even in his humiliation. At times his glory shined forth illustriously as in his miracles, John ii. 1-11; in his transfiguration, Matt. xvii. 1-7; in his resurrection, Acts ii. 24; and in his ascension to glory, Acts i. 9-11. He offered no more blessed petition for his chosen than that they should be with him and behold his glory, John xvii. 24. That vision will be heaven, Rev. xiv. 1.

27. So glorious a person is fit to be a King, yea, King of kings and Lord of lords. He is Lord of all, God over all, blessed forever, vv. 7-10. Let us own him. Let us rejoice and be glad in him. His human nature has its exaltation by reason of its union with his divine nature. He is Jehovah of hosts, v. 10. Because he is God, it is no marvel that "by him were all things created, that are in heaven, and that are in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones or dominions, or principalities or powers: all things were created by him, and for him: and he is before all things, and by him all things consist," Col. i. 16, 17.

28. Great comfort and joy have all the saints in the glorious scheme of redemption! Barker: "The strength of our salvation consists in this, that our Redeemer and Intercessor is the Lord of Hosts. Every other work shall be destroyed, but the work of redemption is for ever." "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look upon the earth beneath; for the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, and the earth shall wax old like a garment, and they that dwell therein shall die in like manner; but my salvation shall be for ever, and my righteousness shall not be abolished," Isa. li. 6.

PSALM XXV.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 UNTO thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul.
- 2 O my God, I trust in thee: let me not be ashamed, let not mine enemies triumph over me.
- 3 Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgress without cause.
- 4 Shew me thy ways, O LORD; teach me thy paths.
- 5 Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day.
- 6 Remember, O LORD, thy tender mercies and thy loving-kindnesses; for they have been ever of old.
- 7 Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy mercy remember thou me for thy goodness' sake, O LORD.
- 8 Good and upright is the LORD: therefore will he teach sinners in the way.
- 9 The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach his way.
- 10 All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies.
- 11 For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great.
- 12 What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose.
- 13 His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth.
- 14 The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant.
- 15 Mine eyes are ever toward the LORD; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.
- 16 Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted.
- 17 The troubles of my heart are enlarged: oh bring thou me out of my distresses.
- 18 Look upon mine affliction and my pain; and forgive all my sins.
- 19 Consider mine enemies; for they are many; and they hate me with cruel hatred.
- 20 Oh keep my soul, and deliver me: let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee.
- 21 Let integrity and uprightness preserve me; for I wait on thee.
- 22 Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

FOR remarks on the title see on title of Psalm xi. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1021; Clarke, 443 years later. Of course the latter denies the Davidic authorship of this ode. But his error on this point is probably owing to his mistaken and extreme disregard of titles. The great mass of sober writers for good cause admit that David is the author. Among these may be named Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Calmet, Edwards, Pool, Patrick, Gill, Henry, Scott, Williams, Morison, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Bouchier.

Patrick, Gill, Scott, Morison and others suppose this Psalm was written upon occasion of Absalom's rebellion. Tholuck refers it to the latter part of Saul's reign. Neither of these opinions can be proven or disproven. We gain nothing by assigning a given occasion to each Psalm. Clarke refers this "to the case of the captives of Babylon, who complain of oppression from their enemies." This learned man is as much inclined to find the occasion of the Psalms in that captivity, as Patrick, in the rebellion of Absalom.

This is an alphabetical Psalm. See Introduction, § 13. The other six alphabetical Psalms are the xxxiv. xxxvii. cxi. cxii. cxix. cxlv. This has twenty-two stanzas, corresponding to the number of Hebrew letters. But the alphabetic arrangement is not perfect. Irregularities are found in vv. 2, 5, 18, 22. It is not necessary with Clarke to impute such variations to the carelessness of transcribers. We should rather expect them to be guided by their alphabet to rectify an error. It is not peculiar to this Psalm to have the regular order of the alphabet broken. Why the alphabetical arrangement was ever adopted we know not. Kimchi admits the Jews knew not the reason. Some moderns have spoken lightly of this as a poetic conceit; but there is nothing to justify such a remark. It is not so difficult or so artistic as rhyme, and yet when well used that is not despicable. The opinions which have been set forth respecting the design of the alphabetical form of composition, are these: Some say it was to enable one the easier to remember the Psalm in its order, if committed to memory. Others think it an index to matter specially weighty. Alexander thinks the "arrangement is peculiar to those Psalms, in which a single theme or idea is repeated under various forms, and, as it were, in a series of aphorisms." Whether any of these views will be found satisfactory to the reader or not, it must be admitted that they have not antiquity to sustain them. The fact is that the alphabetic arrangement is simply the bestowment of an extraordinary degree of art, which is lawful and in itself is pleasing to the reader.

The names of the Almighty found in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. Unto thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul. Chaldee: Before thee, Lord, will I lift up my soul in prayer. The church of England, Venema, Amesius and Alexander also prefer the future, will lift. But the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate and Doway employ the past tense, have lifted. Edwards, Jebb and others prefer the present, I lift. Fry: On thee, Jehovah, my God, I fix my heart; Hengstenberg: To thee, O Lord, I draw my soul. Either of the tenses gives the sense according to the true principles of Hebrew Grammar. The Hebrew is future, will lift. Calvin: "By the future tense David denotes a continued act." See Introduction, § 6. The words draw and fix are not better than lift. In the ancient Hebrew worship the posture was that of standing, lifting up the hands and the eyes and the voice towards heaven, Ps. lxiii. 4; cxxi. 1; Isa. xxiv. 14; Lam. iii. 41. In all these cases the same form of the same verb is used as in the clause under consideration. Compare Luke xviii. 13. From this posture is probably derived the form of expression here; q. d., I will not merely lift up my hands and my eyes; I will also lift up my soul, my heart to thee; I will address my sincere prayers and make known my hearty desires, expecting an answer in peace. Alexander: "All agree that the essential idea is that of confident desire."

2. O my God, I trust in thee. Trust, elsewhere hope, put confidence, in the future, will trust. He had formerly relied on God, he did so still, and he was fully purposed to continue to do so. Thus in hope he prays, Let me not be ashamed. For ashamed the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, church of England and Fry have confounded. In the common version it is often so rendered. Jebb: I shall not be ashamed. The common version is better and is generally approved. To be ashamed is to be stunned, confounded, overwhelmed, like men surprised by finding themselves completely in the power of their enemies, or covered with disgrace. He begs for deliverance from so great a calamity, basing his prayer on the dreadful nature of the evil which threatened him, viz.: the scorn and cruelty of the wicked. And so he adds, Let not mine enemies triumph over me. The scorn and triumph of the wicked are to the righteous as cruel and tempting as to God they are dishonoring.

3. Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed. Wait; the same word found in vv. 5, 21. It signifies waiting with expectation. Ainsworth: Earnestly expect. It is often rendered look, Job xxx. 26; Isa. viii. 17; Jer. xiii. 16. It implies hope as well as patience. Scott: "The term wait implies a simple, dependent, expecting, attentive state of heart, which leads to frequency and perseverance in the use of proper means, notwithstanding delays and discouragements, with a determined rejection of all other confidences, and all inconsistent measures." Several ancient versions, Calvin, Jebb, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others put the last verb in the future. But the rendering of the common version is no less pertinent to the matter in hand. The sense is so far the same that both renderings alike declare it is a principle in God's government that his confiding ones shall not be disappointed, though others may. Let them be ashamed which transgress without cause. Chaldee: Robbers and vain persons shall be ashamed; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: Let them be confounded that act unjust things without cause; Arabic: Let those who are wicked in their vanity be confounded; Syriac: They that are wicked in their vanity shall be confounded; Calvin: They shall be ashamed that deal falsely without cause: Venema: The perfidious in their emptiness shall be confounded with shame; Amesius: Let those who deal falsely without a cause be ashamed; Ainsworth: They shall be abashed that unfaithfully transgress in vain; Waterland: Let them be ashamed who deal perfidiously in vain; church of England: Such as transgress without a cause shall be put to confusion; Edwards: Let those be ashamed that act basely towards me without reason; Jebb: They shall be ashamed who transgress without cause; Horsley: Let the revolvers to vanity be brought to shame; Fry: Let the vain apostates be confounded; Hengstenberg: Those shall be put to shame who act perfidiously without cause; Alexander: Ashamed shall be the traitors without cause; Tholuck: Let them be ashamed that wickedly despise thee. Hammond says the word rendered without cause "signifies any falseness, perfidiousness, violation of oath or league; and not simply any kind of transgression, but those of lying or falseness." Without cause means without justifying cause. Diodati: "By mere and wilful malice, no way merited nor provoked through any offence of mine." The wickedness complained of was wanton. Sin and uprightness shall not be treated alike under God's government.

4. Shew me thy ways, O LORD. The ancient versions substantially agree with this. Calvin: O Jehovah, make me to know thy ways; Venema: O Jehovah, make thy ways known to me; Amesius: Cause that I may walk by thy truth. God's ways are either the orderings of his providence, or the paths of obedience pointed out by him. It is right for us to commit our whole way to God, to beg him to do all for us, and to enable us to live to him. We are not fit to govern ourselves. We are not able to find the right ways of God in which we should walk. The prayer is renewed: Teach me thy paths; q. d., Teach me to understand what I may know of thy providential dealings and instruct me in "the straight ways in which thy pious and faithful servant should walk." Hengstenberg admits that by "the ways and paths of the Lord" expositors generally understand "that manner of life which is well pleasing to him," but thinks that in this case "the ways of God are the ways of deliverance which he makes known to his own, that they may walk in them." The terms used and the context allow us to include both senses.

5. Lead me in thy truth, and teach me. The Chaldee: Lead me in thy righteousness and teach me; Arabic: Direct me to thy justice, and teach me; Syriac: Rule me in thy truth and teach me; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: Direct me in thy truth, and teach me. Some think the sense is, Lead me to see thy veracity, cause me to experience thy faithfulness. Others think it is, Lead me to understand and embrace thy truth. No state of mind is more friendly to the success of our tempters than that of mental confusion, in which we see not distinctly the boundaries between truth and error, right and wrong. It is therefore a great matter to be preserved in God's truth, and to receive instruction from heaven. Our necessities urge us to cry for divine guidance; and our relation to God and his covenant engagements with us authorize us so to plead. Accordingly David gives this reason for his prayer: For thou art the God of my salvation. As God alone is the author of salvation, to whom should we go for any effectual aid but unto him? And as he undertakes the case of all the poor and needy who look to him, so we may plead his promise with the strongest confidence. This is specially true when we find that we do not habitually or allowedly depart from him, but can say: On thee do I wait all the day. The original is in the preterite. This is followed by the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin, Venema and Alexander. But Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb and Hengstenberg agree with the common version. In each case the doctrine is the same. If we use the past tense, it denotes a habit well established; if the present, it shows the existing state of mind resulting from previous devout exercises. These things seem fairly implied in waiting; expectation of good, confidence in the divine character, and a readiness to obey the divine will. The more prominent idea is that of indulging strong hope in God. The verb is of the same root as the word wait in v. 3. All the day means continually. The Arabic reads, I have served thee all my days.

6. Remember, O Lord, thy tender mercies and thy loving-kindnesses; for they have been ever of old. There is no better rendering of this verse. Our translators seem to have been remarkably happy in the selection of English words and phrases to represent the divine benevolence towards man. The word rendered tender mercies is elsewhere, pity, mercy, bowels, compassions. That rendered loving-kindnesses elsewhere mercy, kindness, goodness, pity, favor. The verse contains a petition and an argument. The petition is that God would call to mind those glorious attributes of his nature, pity, love, compassion, mercy, and not allow wickedness longer even to seem to triumph over innocence. The reason urged is that an opposite course would be out of character with God. Of old he had been known as loving and tender. God cannot deny himself. He cannot be merciful to the righteous to-day, and show the same regard to their foes to-morrow. Alexander: "Ever of old is less exact and expressive than the literal translation from eternity, to which there is less objection here, as the words relate not merely to God's acts but to his attributes."

7. Remember not the sins of my youth nor my transgressions. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: The sins of my youth and my ignorances do not remember; Arabic: Remember not the sins of my youth and of my folly; Syriac: The follies of my youth remember not against me; church of England: O remember not the sins and offences of my youth. The first noun is in our version almost invariably rendered sin, or sin-offering, and precisely corresponds to the Greek word so translated. The second is commonly rendered as here, sometimes trespass, a few times sin. Though there is folly in all sin, yet neither of these words is in the English version ever so rendered. Undoubtedly the clause contains a confession of sin and a petition for forgiveness. This confession is of the right kind. It is particular. It mentions not only all transgressions, but it specifies the sins of youth, thus going back to the beginning of life, and confessing that not merely of late but of a long time God had just cause for sending on him all his present sore calamities, and would have been righteous had he sent even worse. The remark of Luther on this place, though quoted with approbation by Hengstenberg, is certainly harsh and unwarranted: "Youth is not fit for virtue, or for anything that is good, because the blood is still too young and fresh, it cannot govern itself, or think of anything that is useful or good." He speaks more correctly when he says: "If any one will allow a youth to grow up, and do as he likes, he will become quite a devil before one is aware of what he is doing." Youthful lusts have a fearful power. But the grace of God is stronger. Nor are we ever in greater straits than when God makes us to possess the iniquities of our youth, Job xiii. 26. The forgiveness of sins is not to be sought or expected otherwise than through God's boundless grace. David adds: According to thy mercy remember thou me for thy goodness' sake, O Lord. Mercy, same as loving-kindness, pity, favor, etc. See tender mercies, v. 6. On the word goodness see on Ps. iv. 6; xvi. 2. God's mercy is rich, free, infinite, unchanging. This is the very kind of favor needed by sinners in all their straits. This mercy must not only have its rise in God, but the cause of its exercise must be not in any goodness in us, but only in God. With him goodness is an unfailing attribute. If God ever exercises an act of perfect sovereignty, it is when of his mere good pleasure he receives into his favor a sinner of Adam's race, and thus covenants to care for him through life and forever.

8. Good and upright is the LORD. There is no good reason for rendering good by sweet, as the Vulgate and others do. The attributes of God are the foundation of all true religion. They are sufficient to that great end. The pious soul resorts continually to them. Its reasoning is, If God is good and I am in covenant with him, nothing truly evil can come upon me; and if he is upright, his rectitude will in like manner be my shield. Indeed his perfections direct all his goings forth. Therefore will he teach sinners in the way. All the conversions in the world proceed from the glorious perfections and purposes of God. And the guidance of poor souls converted, yet but partially sanctified, shows the amazing love and goodness of our adorable Lord. Calvin: "To attribute to God an uprightness which he may exercise only towards the worthy and the meritorious is a cold view of his character, and of little advantage to sinners, and yet the world commonly apprehends that God is good in no other sense." No mortal has so high and adoring views of the boundless benevolence and beneficence of Jehovah as his glorious nature would justify. On the other hand we cannot too carefully guard against the conception that God can ever act contrary to his holiness and infinite purity. His mercy is not indifference to the moral qualities of men or of their actions. It is always so manifested as to show that he is essentially just and pure, and abhors iniquity.

9. The meek will he guide in judgment. The meek, elsewhere called the poor, the afflicted, the humble, the lowly. See Ps. ix. 12, 18. All God's servants are poor in spirit, afflicted by some means, or in some way, especially by their sins, humble on account of past transgressions and present infirmities, lowly in mind and heart. Such are in a temper to be guided. And God will guide them in judgment, in their decisions of important affairs, especially those which relate to the soul; and in the exercise and practice of all justice or righteousness of life. Or the language may apply to God, and then the sense is that God will in righteousness guide the feet, the life, the important decisions of his people. These senses do not destroy but establish each other. They are all good. And the doctrine is weighty. It is repeated: And the meek will he teach his way. Meek, the same word so rendered in the beginning of this verse. The sense is, God will teach the lowly the way that it pleases him for us to walk in, or he will teach us the way, which his wise providence and government have marked out for us. There seems to be no good reason for putting the verbs of this verse in the present tense as some do.

10. All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies. The paths of Jehovah are those, which he approves for us to walk in, Isa. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2; or they are those in which he walks himself, Ps. cxliii. 3; Prov. ii. 20. There is no objection to either interpretation. If the former is preferred, then the meaning is that every rule which God approves for his people to walk by, is in the end found to be mercy, conducive to their best good; and truth, free from those falsehoods, which delude and deceive the wicked. If the latter interpretation is chosen, then the meaning is that in the end no good man will question either the love or the faithfulness of God, as he reviews the paths in which providence has led him. God's true people keep his covenant. The same verb is in verse 21, rendered preserve. It is the word commonly rendered keep, Ps. cxix. 22, 33, 34, 56, 69, 100, 115, 129, 145. To keep God's covenant is to be faithful to our engagements to be the Lord's. To keep his testimonies is to walk honestly and holily in the commandments and ordinances of Jehovah. This service must be sincere and hearty. If it is so, God will accept it. Hengstenberg: "Sins of infirmity cannot deprive a man of interest in the promises of the covenant."

11. For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity; for it is great. Whatever good is done to sinners must proceed from some procuring cause outside of themselves. There is nothing in them to merit esteem. See on Ps. xxiii. 3. The tense of the verb here is variously given. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Hengstenberg and Alexander follow the Hebrew, and give the future. But the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, church of England, Calvin, Edwards and Jebb render as in the common version. Calvin: "The letter, which is equivalent to and, has often the force of changing the tense in the Hebrew verbs, so that the future tense is often taken in the sense of the optative." The word rendered pardon is of special significance. Ainsworth gives it mercifully pardon. It is first used by Moses in a case of great offence, Ex. xxxiv. 9. It signifies to pardon upon pacification, or of grace and mercy. Paul interprets it as being merciful, propitious or appeased, Heb. viii. 12. The same verb is found but once more in the Psalms, where in another form it is rendered forgiveth, Ps. ciii. 3. God is therefore asked graciously and to the end of complete pacification to blot out the sin, not because it is small or trivial, but because it is great. Diodati: "The expiation of that iniquity must be a work of thine infinite mercy, whereunto thou art chiefest moved, when thou seest the greatest misery and necessity, and the offender grieving most for it." Great sins demand great displays of grace, and great displays of grace are wondrously to the glory of God. David therefore says that his is a case calling for just such mercy as can be found in God only, and such as will forever illustrate the glory of the divine attributes. Great, often rendered many, sometimes much, mighty, a multitude, and manifold. The last word every way accords with the original and with the English idiom. It weakens the force of the passage to read as some, although it is great. Neither does the Hebrew easily bear such a rendering. Such a gloss would probably not have been offered, "except either out of dislike to the doctrine implied in our version, or a fear of its being perverted." But God can defend his own honor better than we. Let him be heard. Hengstenberg: "His iniquity is so great that he must be irremediably lost, if God were to deal with him according to his works."

12. What man is he that feareth the LORD? The sense is the same as if he had said, Show me a man that fears Jehovah; or, Wherever a man is found that fears Jehovah; or, Find a God-fearing man wherever you can. The idiom of the Hebrew hardly seems to bear the construction of some that the interrogative form implies that the fear of God is very rare. For the import of fearing the Lord, see Ps. ii. 11; xv. 4; xix. 9. Of the man who thus piously fears Jehovah, whatever his rank or condition, the following things are true. First of all: Him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose. Some make God to choose the way. No doubt God appoints the paths of his people. But the sense probably is that God guides the just in his choice. He shall guide him in judgment, and teach him his duty and privileges, and show him how wise and good and perfect are the acts of providence respecting him; and how seasonable and gracious is God's way of delivering him, even when escape seemed almost hopeless. Yet in all these leadings of Jehovah there shall be no violence done to the will, nor is any miracle necessary. But the good man shall exercise his own entire freedom of will, and at each successive stage of his progress choose the very way, in which God would have him walk. Sinners saved by grace are drawn but not dragged; they are made willing, not borne reluctantly along. They are made to choose and glory in things and ways, to which they once had the strongest repugnance. Courses of life and sufferings, which it once seemed impossible to contemplate without horror or dismay, are at length welcomed and chosen by the child of grace, 2 Cor. xii. 9, 10. This is the crowning glory of true religion. It overcomes the strongest national, personal and religious prejudices; it controls the mightiest passions and inclinations of men. Saul of Tarsus chose to blaspheme; but Paul chose to pray. Saul of Tarsus chose to persecute; but Paul the apostle chose to be persecuted. John Calvin and John Knox, even after conversion, both had an extreme unwillingness to preach the gospel; yet to no men was the pulpit for a long time more like a throne. There they reigned as kings. There they loved to herald forth mercy. Nor is this all the mercy made sure to the man who fears Jehovah.

13. His soul shall dwell at ease. The English phrase to dwell at ease, or be at ease, has a good or bad sense according to the connection. Here it is taken in a good sense. In Amos vi. 1 it is in a bad sense. But the word rendered ease is not here the same as there. Here it is the word rendered good in Ps. iv. 6; xiv. 1, 3; and goodness in Ps. xvi. 2; xxi. 3; xxiii. 6. To dwell is to lodge. The margin: His soul shall lodge in goodness. The connection of the God-fearer with goodness and all blessings is not like that of a man strolling along by goodly habitations; but of one who is at home in them. The goodness is not his personal quality, but his rich portion. The Septuagint well renders it good things. His soul, that is, he himself shall dwell at ease. Horsley: His soul shall rest in bliss; Street: He shall continue in prosperity. Nor is the blessing exhausted on him, for it is added, And his seed shall inherit the earth. Chaldee: And his children by a hereditary title shall enter into possession of the land. The Syriac is nearly as strong. The verb rendered inherit signifies to possess, but especially to possess by inheritance, as the Israelites did the promised land. As Canaan was the promised land, and as a holy life led to quiet and thrift, so to dwell in the land came to signify the possession of all good things, Ex. xx. 12; Matt. v. 5. The extent, to which under God we are indebted to a pious ancestry, is understood by few. Let men know that their conduct will have a vast bearing for good or evil on those who shall come after them. Land is perhaps a better rendering than earth, as the figure is probably not drawn from all the earth, but from the land of Israel. More than all this:

14. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him. The Septuagint and imitating versions have it: The Lord is a stay to them that fear him; Arabic: The Lord is the courage of them that fear him. For secret Calvin and Street prefer counsel; Hengstenberg and Alexander, friendship. But the church of England, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and many others have secret. In our English version the word is never rendered friendship, often secret, Gen. xlix. 6; Job. xv. 8; xxix. 4; Pr. iii. 32; Am. iii. 7; and several times counsel, Ps. lv. 14; Pr. xv. 22; Jer. xviii. 18, 23. Either gives a good sense. Both are true. If we read counsel, then the meaning is that God's plans and purposes are not against but for his people, not far from them, but with them; and so they must succeed; for the counsel of the Lord it shall stand. Street: "The counsel of Jehovah is in favor of them that fear him." If we read secret, then we have all God's people taught according to the revelation of the mystery, which was kept secret since the world began. So that they have a saving knowledge of the mystery of God and of Christ. Christ is revealed unto them. And a thousand things, which to the world are enigmas and paradoxes, are to them glorious truths, full of light and full of comfort. They have intimate communion with God. They trust and glory in him. Nor is their confidence misplaced, nor shall their love be unrequited, for it is added: And he will shew them his covenant. His covenant some say is his secret. No doubt the two agree. But covenant is the stronger word, as it contains the idea of compact, stipulation, promise and full provision for every exigency. God will show to his people the great amplitude, the excellent arrangement, and the absolute certainty of his covenant. They shall see these things both in the word and in the providence of God. There is no good reason for limiting the sense to the outward display of God's fidelity, mercy and power.

15. Mine eyes are ever toward the LORD. This clause seems to have very much the same import as that of waiting on the Lord, v. 3. There is great uniformity in the rendering of this verse. For ever Calvin, Ainsworth, Jebb and Fry have continually; Hengstenberg and Alexander, always. Edwards: My eyes are ever directed to Jehovah. In trouble, especially in that which is the immediate fruit of sin, the sooner we wholly despair of all help from any but God, the better. Nor shall any expectation directed to the Lord ever be disappointed. David had good reason for looking to God: For he shall pluck my feet out of the net. Edwards: For he it is that must bring my feet out of the net; Jebb: For it is he who shall pluck from the net my feet. Pluck out, in v. 17, bring out; in Ps. xxxi. 4, pull out. God's deliverances are opportune, surprising, irresistible. For an explanation of the use of nets, etc., see on Ps. ix. 15; x. 9. The cunning craftiness and the deadly enmity of the wicked are well expressed by the term net. Those who spread nets did it for destruction. They had no mercy. Horne: "An unfortunate dove, whose feet are taken in the snare of the fowler, is a fine emblem of the soul, entangled in the cares and pleasures of the world; from which she desires, through the power of grace, to fly away, and to be at rest, with her glorified Redeemer."

16. Turn thee unto me. The Chaldee and many versions: Look thou upon me. Calvin: Have respect unto me. In Lev. xxvi. 9; 1 Kings viii. 28; 2 Chr. vi. 19; the same word is rendered have respect. In Isa. xlv. 22; Ps. cxix. 132, and often it is rendered look. It is here used in a good sense. He adds: And have mercy upon me, i. e., Deal graciously with me, show me favor, have pity upon me. We have the same word in Job xix. 21; Ps. iv. 1; xxxi. 9; li. 1. David declares his solemn belief that his case calls for divine aid, and that none but God can help him. He adds: For I am desolate and afflicted. Desolate, literally one, lonely, only, solitary, then desolate. See Gen. xxii. 2; Zech. xii. 10. When feminine it is rendered my darling, Ps. xxii. 20; xxxv. 17. The Septuagint has it only begotten. But desolate is better. Afflicted, poor, humble, lowly, needy. See Ps. ix. 12, 18; Pr. iii. 34; xxxi. 20. David represents his case as one of the very class that God delighted to undertake; one, in which it would greatly honor God to give relief; one quite beyond the aid of any and of all others.

17. The troubles of my heart are enlarged. No affliction comes alone. Whoever has one distress has others. In this case things past, present and future, sins, former friends and old enemies were all against him. Troubles, as in Ps. ix. 9; x. 1; xx. 1; xxii. 11. For enlarged some read multiplied, which is no improvement. David says his case is urgent, the waters have risen high, and help must be sought from Jehovah. He adds: Oh bring thou me out of my distresses. Saving the sinful and the sorrowful, who look to him, is the very work of God. He delights in it. He does it easily and effectually. To bring out is in v. 15, to pluck out. Distresses always so rendered in our version in the plural; in the singular sometimes anguish. Lowth reads the verse thus:

Set at large the sorrowful contractions of my heart,
And bring me out of my difficulties.

18. Look upon mine affliction and my pain. Look upon, see, behold, perceive, regard, consider. Affliction, always so rendered in our version except in three cases. See Ps. ix. 13, where it is trouble. Pain, elsewhere sorrow, trouble, labor, travail, grievance, mischief, misery, a few times perverseness, wickedness, iniquity. Nu. xxiii. 21; Job iv. 8; Hab. i. 13. It is evidently not to be taken here in the sense of moral evil. He would desire God to avert his face from all his transgressions. The next words are: And forgive all my sins. No solid foundation can ever be laid for settled peace, so long as sin remains unpardoned. In one unforgiven transgression there is a sting so keen, so envenomed as to destroy all abiding happiness. Contrite souls know this, and so never give over crying for mercy, till they are assured of God's love. Sin pardoned, our other troubles and our foes may yet be many and mighty, but they cannot bring on us eternal destruction. Yet they may be far too strong for us, and so we must look to God and cry:—

19. Consider mine enemies. Consider, in v. 18, look upon. To two things in his enemies David specially implored the divine inspection; 1, their number, for they are many; 2, their dreadful malice, they hate me with cruel [violent, unrighteous, implacable] hatred. Scott, who refers this Psalm to the occasion of Absalom's rebellion, says, David "was aware, that even his own son, and his bosom-counsellor, and a large part of the nation thirsted for his blood: and would decline no violence, treachery, or cruelty, to destroy him: so that his life could be preserved only by the same divine power and mercy in which he trusted for the salvation of his own soul." Dying in the peaceable possession of the throne seemed to be a necessary pledge of the fulfilment of the great promise made to David, 2 Sam. vii. Accordingly he desires safety for other causes beside the natural love of life.

20. Oh keep my soul, and deliver me. Keep; the same word in Ps. xvi. 1, and elsewhere is rendered preserve. See also Ps. xvii. 8. Some use a military term, guard. Our life and all our interests, our souls and all their vast affairs can in no way be preserved, but by the exercise of God's glorious perfections. Forsaken of him we shall be dismayed. So he prays: Let me not be ashamed. Ashamed, as in vv. 2, 3. In this life the righteous often blush for their sins and follies. But the issue will be well. Their shame will in eternity be all gone. Even here they may confidently plead to be saved from disaster and confusion, because God's honor is involved: For I put my trust in thee. When one cannot save those, who confide in him, he cannot be a God. And were it credible that God cared not for his friends, all true religion would soon perish from the earth.

21. Let integrity and uprightness preserve me. The Chaldee: Perfection and uprightness shall preserve me; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate, and Doway: The innocent and the upright have adhered to me; Arabic: The innocent and the upright have followed me; Venema: Integrity and uprightness shall preserve me; Hengstenberg: Blamelessness and uprightness shall preserve me; Alexander: Integrity and rectitude shall preserve me. But Calvin, Diodati, Amesius, Ainsworth, Pool, Edwards, Jebb and others have the optative, Let, etc. Some would make the Psalmist pray that the perfection and uprightness of God may preserve him. But he is rather asking that his own integrity and uprightness may keep him. There are two senses, in which this may occur. 1. "Let these virtues always keep me from doing evil, and never depart from me." This sense is admitted by Diodati and others. It is a wise prayer, based on self-knowledge. 2. The more common exposition is, Let my cause be tried and rest on its righteousness, and on my fairness and uprightness in this whole business: Calvin: "David prays that he may be preserved from all mischief, on the ground that he had conducted himself inoffensively towards others, and had abstained from all deceit and violence." Scott: "In the sight of God, David pleaded guilty of great and many sins, but he had acted an upright part towards his unnatural son, and treacherous subjects." Pool and others hold this view. It is perhaps the best every way. The reason given is: For I wait on thee; q. d., I am thy servant, I look to thee, I confide in thee as taking sides with the upright. Boothroyd: For in thee do I hope. Whoever has suffered all the trials of David and has a benevolent heart desires that God's church may escape from her enemies and find full deliverance. Therefore he prays:

22. Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles. Alexander: "This verse forms no part of the alphabetical series, but begins with the same letter as v. 16. Like the first verse it consists of a single clause, as if the two together were designed to constitute one sentence." There seems to be no good reason for supposing with Mudge that "this is a detached sentence, in which the author shows his zeal for his country, and that it was the usual close of many of their sacred songs;" nor with Rosenmuller that it was added at a later period. Nothing was more fitting than that David, who had prayed much for himself, should enlarge his petitions and ask God for blessings on his people: q. d., Save, not me only, but the whole nation, now rent, torn, distracted with feuds and civil war. Send peace, send prosperity. Settle our difficulties, for no power or sagacity of man can give effectual aid. Unless thou undertake for us our case is helpless. Calvin thinks this clause clearly shows that the allusion is to Saul and his associates who cruelly treated the church. But Israel has always had many troubles, and the prayer was always seasonable.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The teaching of Scripture respecting prayer is uniform. It must be to Jehovah; it must be sincere, v. 1. Slade: "In vain will our voices be lifted up in prayer, unless our souls be lifted up to God." Henry: "Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God; God must be eyed and the soul employed. Up with your hearts was anciently used as a call to devotion." Times of great peril should be times of great prayer. Nor can the mind of any be too steadfastly set on God alone.

2. The greater our trouble, the greater should be our trust, v. 2. Dangers should drive us to seek divine aid. Henry: "If we make our confidence in God our stay, it shall not be our shame; and if we triumph in him, our enemies shall not triumph over us, as they would, if we should now sink under our fears."

3. The principle of shame in our nature is not without its use. Sinners would often be more wicked, saints would often be less holy, but that a keen sense of shame restrains the former or arouses the latter. Nothing has more power to torment us, v. 2. In the wicked it will last forever, Dan. xii. 2. Nor is there in all Scripture any negative promise of more precious import than that God's people shall never come into contempt or be ashamed.

4. It is both a privilege and a duty to pray that the wicked may not triumph over the righteous, v. 2. Such a state of things would argue a total subversion of the divine government. The hope of the wicked shall surely perish. The throne of God's grace is against them. The universe is against them. All nature has groaned under the weight of them; and all nature shall fight against them.

5. To wait on God is a duty often insisted on in Scripture, vv. 3, 5. The frequency, with which it is mentioned, shows the high value set on it by God. Yet it is an unfashionable duty, mentioned far less frequently in private conversation and in pulpit discourses than in the word of God. Great promises are made to this duty; and great rewards shall follow it. "Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall: but they that wait upon the LORD shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint," Isa. xl. 30, 31.

6. It heightened the wickedness of David's foes that he had never wronged them, v. 3. So it is a fearful aggravation attending all sin against God that it is wanton, without cause, and therefore without excuse.

7. It is a great mercy to be allowed to understand God's will, both as revealed in Scripture, and as made known in providence. No less than four times does David beg to be enlightened on this subject, vv. 4, 5. One of the greatest trials is perplexity. Commonly Satan has a great advantage over us when he can make us seriously doubt respecting truth or duty. Clearness of mind is a great blessing. God alone can give it, v. 12.

8. A clear discovery of any of God's attributes, especially of his veracity, goodness, righteousness and mercy, is a high attainment, vv. 5, 6, 8, 10. He, who studies not and loves not the divine perfections, cannot plead with God, or be joyful in him, as does he, who delights himself in the Almighty. God's attributes are fountains of joy to pious souls. To love and embrace all revealed truth, and especially that which relates to the divine nature and will is of the essence of true piety.

9. If God should do for us all else, and not teach us his will and his ways, he would not be the God of our salvation, v. 5. We are blind and cannot see afar off. We know nothing as we ought to know it until we are taught from heaven. Blessed be the Lord, he is continually making good the promise: "I will bring the blind by a way that they knew not; I will lead them in paths that they have not known; I will make darkness light before them, and crooked things straight. These things will I do unto them, and not forsake them," Isa. xlii. 16.

10. It is not enough to begin a right course. We must continue in well-doing, v. 5. Perseverance in duty is the only infallible mark to ourselves and the world that we are born of God. Nothing can be a substitute for this.

11. From what God by his acts has shown himself to be we may well argue what he will do hereafter, v. 6. Nor should any appearances to the contrary make us waver respecting either the wisdom or the constancy of the divine compassion. Dickson: "Though the course of kindness and mercy seem to be interrupted by affliction and temporal desertion, and to be forgotten on God's part; yet faith must make use of experiences, and read them over unto God out of the register of a sanctified memory."

12. Arguments drawn from God's character in favor of our cause are far more likely to prevail than those drawn from our own character, v. 6. Calvin: "He who derives everything from the fountain of the divine mercy alone finds nothing in himself entitled to recompense in the sight of God."

13. Afflictions often possess remarkable power to remind us of our sins, vv. 7, 18. When Joseph's brethren were in the greatest straits then they cried, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother." When the son of the widow of Zarephath died she said to Elijah, "Art thou come unto me to call my sin to remembrance?" Dickson: "Sore troubles will waken up the conscience of sin afresh, and call to mind forgiven and buried sin." Nothing can meet these terrible memories of wickedness but a new application of the blood of Jesus and a sweet sense of God's mercy in Christ. A religious experience that has all joys and no pangs in it is good for nothing. We should rather seek to reprove ourselves for our old sins, yea, for all our sins, than to forget them. Anything is good for us, if it humbles us and leads us to the mercy-seat. In these respects nothing has a happier effect than a solemn review of our past deficiencies. Henry: "Our youthful faults and follies should be matter of our repentance and humiliation long after, because time does not wear out the guilt of sin."

Old people should mourn for the sinful mirth, and be in pain for the sinful pleasures of their youth." Blessed is the old man who has grace penitently to weep at the sins of his early days.

14. Sweet is the doctrine of forgiveness! In mercy God has clearly and abundantly revealed his forgiving love to all who have his word, vv. 7, 18. The doctrine of forgiveness is as weighty as it is clear. Calvin: "It is true, in general, that men pray in a wrong way and in vain, unless they begin by seeking the forgiveness of their sins. There is no hope of obtaining any favor from God unless he is reconciled to us." Let us plead with God for his name's sake, not for our own. We are sinners, and the tears and even the blood of a sinner can never wash away guilt.

15. David's youth seems to have been spent in more freedom from open transgression than is common, yet his view of his early life was just. No man can answer for one of a thousand of his offences during any year of his rational just accountability. One may soon become a monster, if God's grace be wanting.

16. It is an unspeakable mercy to be brought in our early years to love and serve God, and to keep his commandments. Many harrowing recollections and tormenting reflections are thus avoided, v. 7. Temptation is thus deprived of many of its most envenomed shafts. Surely as the latter day glory approaches, the young, even little children, will be found turning to the Lord, and imbued with his Holy Spirit.

17. But for these and all other blessings we are wholly dependent on the divine mercy, v. 7. This has always been the doctrine of God's real people. They know that they are sinners saved by grace. To deny that would be monstrous.

18. "Seasons of danger are seasons for meditation, v. 8. . . The humble soul shall find mercy. He that fears the Lord shall 'unravel those dispensations' which perplex others. His meditation shall be sweet, and inspire confidence in the interposition of his God. His meditations will give energy to his prayers, and urge their repetition." It is not amiss to reason and soliloquize in prayer, if we follow the Scriptural pattern, v. 8.

19. God is the sole author of conversion, pardon and salvation, vv. 8, 9. The old doctrine of preventing grace is as true as it is consolatory. God's grace must go before all acts of man in order to his salvation. The difference between saints and sinners is not natural, but supernatural; not by blood or birth, but by the adoption and grace of God.

20. The essence of the meekness required in God's word is found in that chastened state of the soul which results from the teaching of the Holy Ghost, v. 9. A view of personal ill-desert makes one humble. A sense of one's vileness deeply afflicts him. So that he is quiet, submissive, leaving all in the hands of God. True meekness not only tames the ferocity, but it checks the impetuosity of men. It is essential to true piety. It would not be a miracle, but a contradiction for God to guide the proud, the self-conceited into all truth. If any would learn he must be docile. The wayward err because they are wayward. To guide ourselves is impossible. Unless taught of God we must live and die in profound ignorance of the most necessary things.

21. To the righteous are pledged God's mercy and truth, v. 10. The former secures to them the pardon of sin and the loving favor of God in all things and at all times. The latter makes sure to them every doctrine, and every promise of God. It no less secures the overthrow of the wicked, without which the victory of the righteous would not be complete. And on whichever side are God's truth and mercy, on the same side are all his adorable attributes. Calvin: "We have no reason to believe that God will fail us if we persevere in his covenant." Dickson: "Whosoever hold fast the covenant of grace and make conscience of obeying God's word they may be sure that all their troubles and variety of exercise are nothing but God's way to make them partake of his promises."

22. But if we would know that God is with us we must be faithful to his covenant and keep his testimonies, v. 10. No ceremonies, professions, raptures or revelations did ever, can ever take the place of sincere, hearty, unquestioning obedience to all God's known will.

23. Self-righteous hopes are as delusive as they are preposterous, v. 11. Many texts show the same thing. No man has any Gospel to preach, any good news to herald forth in this world, unless on a divine warrant he can show that there is hope for the lost, mercy for the rebellious, and that the greatness of our sins does not debar us from humbly casting ourselves at the feet of God in the hope of salvation through a divine Redeemer.

24. There is a general and correct impression that when a subject is often introduced by the sacred penmen, it is in God's esteem of great and pressing moment. Judging by this rule the fear of the Lord is of the highest importance, vv. 12, 14.

25. Man needs no direction and guidance beyond what is clearly promised in the covenant, v. 12. The straits of the Christian are often great. He knows nothing. He can do nothing. He cannot of himself even pray aright. His will is naturally corrupt. But God can help him through all his trials, and give him the victory over all his enemies.

26. Glorious is the portion of the righteous, v. 13. Every fit form of expression is employed to give us some idea of it; and it far surpasses all that has ever been conceived of it.

27. Rich and precious are the benefits of a pious ancestry. If anything could turn our natural affection to account in the cause of virtue, it would seem to be such promises as the Bible contains concerning the seed of the righteous, v. 13. If you would be blessed, and have your children blessed also, fear God.

28. It is in vain to fight against God's counsel, v. 14. Nothing can change it. Nothing can defeat it. It is wiser and stronger than man.

29. If in v. 14 we understand secret, not counsel, then how vain is the pretence of the Romish church in withholding from the common people the word of God, when his secret is with them that fear him, and when he has expressly said that "things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever."

30. If men, who think themselves wise because they succeed in worldly schemes, knew as much as the plain, simple-hearted Christian, that is, if they were in the secret of the Lord, they would neither think, nor feel, nor speak, nor act as they now do, v. 14. They are deplorably ignorant of the main point of wisdom.

31. The state of the godly has in it all the stability which can be derived from a covenant, the covenant of God, ordered in all things and sure, v. 14.

32. None can look too steadfastly and confidingly to God, v. 15. We never honor him more, nor please him better than when in trouble and darkness we still trust him and believe that he will do all things well.

33. God, and none but God, can save us, v. 15. Our enemies are so crafty, their snares so cunningly spread, their malice so terrible, that we should soon perish but for God's seasonable and mighty aid.

34. However dark our prospects and strong our fears, let us continue in prayer, v. 16. It cannot hurt us. That is a great point made sure. It may be the means of a speedy and blessed deliverance. If not, it will in due time bring a still richer blessing.

35. The more lowly and lonely our state, the more earnestly should we commit it to God, for the more glorious will it be for him to interpose, v. 16.

36. Let no good man be surprised that his affliction is great, and to him of an unaccountable character. It has always been so with God's people, v. 17. The road to heaven is soaked with the tears and blood of the saints.

37. Blessed be God, we are not required to be silent before him, when trouble comes, vv. 17, 18. We may not complain of God, but we may complain to God. With submission to his holy will we may earnestly cry for help and deliverance.

38. It is a great matter to have God so far engaged on our side as that he will look on our affliction and consider our case, vv. 18, 19.

39. All our safety is in God alone, v. 20. In him we may rejoice and be exceeding glad always.

40. No cause is strong without justice and truth, and no cause is weak that has integrity and uprightness in it, v. 21. Sin is worse than misery. Prayers for a wicked cause are an offence to God. Dickson: "Integrity of life, or a good behaviour after prayer, is as needful as before it."

41. The church of God is always so much distressed, that we may well pray that she be delivered out of all her troubles, v. 22. She is in the wilderness. She has a great fight of afflictions. But her friends remember her at the throne of grace. In the end she shall have all the glory which the blood and righteousness and intercession of her head and husband can secure to her.

PSALM XXVI.

A Psalm of David.

1 Judge me, O LORD; for I have walked in mine integrity: I have trusted also in the LORD; therefore I shall not slide.

2 Examine me, O LORD, and prove me; try my reins and my heart.

3 For thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes: and I have walked in thy truth.

4 I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers.

5 I have hated the congregation of evil doers; and will not sit with the wicked.

6 I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, O LORD:

7 That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.

8 LORD, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth.

9 Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with bloody men:

10 In whose hands is mischief, and their right hand is full of bribes.

11 But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity: redeem me, and be merciful unto me.

12 My foot standeth in an even place: in the congregations will I bless the LORD.

THAT this Psalm was written by David is clear. The title ascribes it to him. There is not a phrase in it which he might not with evident propriety have employed. It certainly has a close affinity with other odes composed by him, especially with the twenty-fifth. Calvin: "This Psalm, for the most part, is similar to the preceding." Even Clarke admits that David may have written it, although with Calmet he is more disposed to refer it to the captivity. He dates it 578 years before Christ; Scott, 480 years earlier or B. C. 1058.

The opinions respecting the occasion of its composition are very variant and are mere conjectures, without evidence, though some of them are less improbable than others. Hengstenberg: "All attempts to find out an individual application for our Psalm, or to mark out any historical circumstances, with which it may be connected, have utterly failed." On Jehovah LORD (the only name of God used in it) see on Ps. i. 2.

On the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv.

1. Judge me, O LORD. In the rendering of this clause there is great uniformity. The sense is well given by Hengstenberg: "Interpose to give me justice, deliver me from a condition in which, if it were to be regarded as permanent, it would be unrighteous to suffer me to remain." The same prayer is found in Ps. vii. 8; xxxv. 24; xliii. 1. The word rendered judge is, in Ps. lxxxii. 3, rendered defend. The meaning is, Judge effectually, judge so as to defend me. Hammond has it, Plead for me, or defend me; Waterland: Plead for me; Green: Vindicate me; Castellio: Take my part; Pool: Plead my cause, or, Give sentence for me; Horsley: Give sentence for me; Fry: Pass sentence on me. None of these are improvements on the common rendering. The best of them is: Give sentence for me. The reasons of his prayer are next given. First, he urges his personal innocence of the crimes alleged against him and the uprightness of his conduct towards those who are his bitter foes: For I have walked in mine integrity. Integrity is from the same word so rendered in Ps. vii. 8; xxv. 21. It is sometimes rendered uprightness. The Chaldee, Perfection; Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Innocence; Arabic, Humility, simplicity, perfection. He declares that the whole tenor of his life [indicated by walked] towards them had been blameless. Secondly, he says: I have trusted also in the LORD. He asserts that he had kept a good conscience, and not made man, or any but Jehovah his hope or confidence. He had resorted to no wicked or doubtful expedient. He had made God his trust. Pool: "I have committed my cause and affairs to thee, as to a just Judge and merciful Father, and my hope and trust is fixed upon thee alone; therefore thou wilt not deceive my trust, but wilt uphold me against all mine enemies." Hengstenberg: "To walk in integrity has reference to the commandments of the second table, and to trust in the Lord to those of the first." He adds: Therefore I shall not slide. The word therefore is properly supplied by our translators. For slide the Septuagint has be unstable; Ethiopic and Syriac, be moved; Vulgate, be weak; Arabic, fear; church of England and Edwards, fall; Venema and Amesius, waver; Fry, be shaken; Ainsworth, stagger; Alexander, swerve; Hammond suggests also trip, totter, be inconstant. The Chaldee and Hengstenberg have slide. The sense may be, I shall not fall from my hope, I shall be found firm and stable in my course and in my adherence to the Lord. Calvin unites all the clauses: Because I have walked in mine integrity, and trusted in Jehovah, I shall not be moved. In his uprightness and reliance on God he is confident and so he begs the scrutiny of the Lord into his cause and character.

2. Examine me, O LORD, and prove me; try my reins and my heart. The verbs of this verse, examine, prove and try are by many used interchangeably. They all have the same import. Examine, in Ps. xi. 4, 5, rendered try; in Ps. xvii. 3, prove. Prove, commonly so rendered, also try, tempt. The last verb try is by some rendered cleanse, purify, melt, burn, assay. It expresses the trial of metals by fire, Ps. xii. 6; xvii. 3. On reins or kidneys, see above on Ps. vii. 9; xvi. 7. David desired that the Lord would search him through and through. Knowing his innocence in the matters charged, he asked that God would prove it and manifest it.

3. For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes. The rendering of this clause is quite uniform, only that some have love, mercy or pity for lovingkindness. The meaning is that he remembers God's kindness in the past, he dwells on it in his present thoughts, and he hopes in it for days to come. The foundation of his piety was laid in just views of God's character; and as in the divine dispensations towards his people generally and towards David in particular there was a delightful superabounding of pity, mercy, loving-kindness, so in all his thoughts David dwells much on that aspect of the character of God. The effect was most happy: And I have walked in thy truth. Alexander: "The verb translated walked is an intensive form of that used in verse 1." Diodati thus paraphrases the whole verse: "Mine eye of faith hath been always upon thy favor, and I have sincerely obeyed the truth of thy word, which I have taken for a light and rule of my conscience, which otherwise may err and deceive me." There does not seem to be good cause for connecting this verse in the same sentence with the next. In so doing the sense is good, but the third verse is complete in itself.

4. I have not sat with vain persons. For vain persons the Vulgate has council of vanity; Syriac, malignant; Edwards, men of falsehood; Ainsworth, mortal men of false vanity; Horsley, wretched sons of vanity; Hengstenberg and Alexander, men of falsehood. The language points to men who build their hopes on falsehood. Every untruth is a vanity. The verb is in the preterite. The wicked may be before us, Ps. xxxix. 1. We may in a sense be compelled to mingle with evil men, or else leave the world, 1 Cor. v. 10. But no good man will choose such as his associates. The companion of fools shall be destroyed. David had not willingly mingled with such. He had not sought bad company. This course of purity had commended itself to him. It had given him courage and comfort. Since he had tried it, he was more than ever purposed to adhere to it; and so he says: Neither will I go in with dissemblers. As has been my practice, so shall be my future life. For dissemblers some read wicked, workers of iniquity, ungodly, infamous; but a better sense is given by deceitful, hypocrites, those that hide themselves, those who seek concealment. The Chaldee: I will not go in with those that hide themselves to do evil. Wickedness is uncandid, and loves concealment, while truth and righteousness are open and seek scrutiny, Job xxiv. 13-17; John iii. 20, 21. None will deny that the candid man has far fewer troubles with his own conduct than the tortuous and deceitful. The righteous shun the wicked both for the sin and for the misery that are in their ways.

5. I have hated the congregation of evil doers. Congregation, body or assembly. For evil doers some read malignant, wicked, transgressors, villanous men. Morison says the original "denotes individuals of malignant, discontented and revengeful minds." And [I] will not sit with the wicked. That is, he would not sit to advise and consult with men of this character. Their principles and his were wholly opposed. Hengstenberg: "The import is, 'I take no part in the assemblies for the ruin of others;'" Alexander: "The change of tense is anything rather than unmeaning. 'I have not sat with them in time past, and I will not go with them in time to come.' The form of expression is borrowed from Gen. xlix. 6." All nations agree that men are known by the company they choose.

6. I will wash my hands in innocency. Of these words the renderings are various, though they substantially agree. The rendering cannot be improved. Washing was one of the rites of purification to the priesthood, Ex. xxix. 4; xxx. 19-21; xl. 12; Lev. xvi. 4, 24; xvii. 15, 16; xxii. 6. It was also a becoming preparation for solemn worship. It was an act symbolical of purity. As religion was corrupted, men began to lay the greatest stress on the mere act. In the Yad Tephillah we are told: "The hands are to be washed before prayers." And Aristeas says: "It is the custom for all the Jews to wash their hands as often as they pray to God." It was a saying among them: "Whosoever despiseth the washing of hands is worthy to be excommunicated; he comes to poverty, and will be extirpated out of the world." Another was this: "Whosoever has his seat in the land of Israel, and eats his common food in cleanness, and speaks the holy language, and recites his phylacteries morning and evening, let him be confident that he shall obtain the life of the world to come." The Jews tell us that one of their number, R. Aquiba, being in prison, and not having water enough to drink and to wash his hands also, chose to do the latter, saying, "It is better to die of thirst than transgress the tradition of the elders." Maimonides says: "Of old the religious did eat their common food in cleanness, and took care to avoid all uncleanness all their days, and they were called Pharisees." All this was the invention of men and not the commandment of God. Cleanliness is one of the decencies of divine worship, but it is itself no part of true devotion. Yet that which is symbolized by it, viz., personal holiness, is a grand requisite in all acceptable worship. "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." "When ye make many prayers, I will not hear; your hands are full of blood; wash you, make you clean," Ps. lxvi. 18; Isa. i. 15, 16. The sense therefore is that David would worship God in rectitude and moral purity. Some, however, think that the washing in innocency has reference to the custom of protesting one's innocence by washing the hands with water. This was practised by Pilate, Matt. xxvii. 24. The usage seems to have been well understood. Indeed it is found in the law of Moses as an ordinance, Deut. xxi. 1-9. And it must be confessed that this view gives a good sense, and well agrees with the scope and context. Perhaps the two interpretations may be united so as to teach that David would, not hypocritically, but sincerely, as in the sight of God, truly and successfully protest his innocence. There is some contrariety in the renderings as to the tense of the verb wash. The Hebrew is future. That indeed does not itself show that the common version is the best. See Introduction, § 6. The verbs of the two verses next preceding are in the preterite; but that does not determine that this shall be so. Indeed there is a fitness in the change of tense just at this point. The rendering of the English Bible is the best. There seems to be no reason for using the present tense. David was resolved to maintain a blameless character, and in his uprightness to worship God. So will I compass thine altar, O LORD. To compass may signify to lay hold of, or to march around in procession, or to unite with others in standing around. Perhaps the last is best. The second gives also a good sense. For although usually none but the priests went in procession around the altar, yet on the seventh day of the feast of tabernacles, the people solemnly marched seven times around the altar as a memorial of the fall of Jericho. The verb here rendered compass, in the same form is found in Ps. vii. 7. In Gen. xxxvii. 7, in another form it is rendered stood round about. The meaning of the Psalmist in the whole verse seems to be: I will solemnly and truly profess my uprightness, and I will render thee the sincere and holy worship prescribed in thy word. Such a character and such conduct eminently become all who approach the great King, and are the best foundation for solid usefulness:

7. That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works. God is honored when the righteous praise, and thank him and speak forth his marvellous deeds. The Hebrew does not sustain the rendering of some of the old versions, That I may hear the voice of thy praise; though it might warrant this, That I may cause to be heard the voice of thanksgiving. The same verb in the same form is found in 2 Chron. v. 13; Isa. lviii. 4. But to make to be heard is the same as to publish. Fry well renders it, To cause the sound of thy praise to be heard; Hengstenberg, That I may cause the voice of praise to be heard. The clause, says Alexander, "admits of several constructions: 1. To publish thanksgivings with the voice. 2. To publish with a thankful voice, without expressing what. 3. To publish and recount all thy wondrous works with a voice of thanksgiving." As the pious never want wondrous things in God's character and providence to celebrate, so God ought never to want friends and followers to utter his praise. Thanksgiving, in the English version almost uniformly rendered thanks, thank offering, thanksgiving, or praise. Twice only is it rendered confession, Josh. vii. 19; Ezra x. 11. But in these cases it is probable that a part of worship is put for the whole. Wondrous works, literally things done wonderfully.

8. LORD, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth. Chaldee: I have loved the habitation of the house of thy holiness, and the place of the tabernacle of thy glory; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: I have loved the beauty of thy house, and the place of the tabernacle of thy glory; Syriac: I have loved the service of thy house, and the place of the habitation of thy glory. Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Green and Ainsworth put the verb in the present tense, I love; but the majority of translators properly follow the original, I have loved, an act continued to this time. The verb expresses the affection of Abraham to Isaac, Gen. xxii. 2. In Ps. xi. 7 it expresses God's love of holiness. Surely the author of such a sentiment was spiritually-minded and loved communion with God. The pious soul delights in God however manifested, whether in works of creation or providence, in word or ordinances, in the tabernacle, or in the temple, or under the simpler worship of the Gospel dispensation.

9. Gather not my soul with sinners. The Chaldee gives the same rendering. The Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Destroy not with the ungodly my soul; church of England: O shut not up my soul with the sinners; Edwards and Alexander: Take not away my soul with sinners. Diodati's paraphrase is: "Do not enfold me in the same ruin and curse" with sinners; Patrick's: "I hope thou wilt not let me suffer with those from whose society I have always separated myself." In many places the word rendered gather signifies assemble. In Ps. lxxxv. 3; Isa. iv. 1; Jer. xvi. 5, it is translated take away. For this reason it is used for death. In 1 Sam. xv. 6, it is destroy; in Isa. lvii. 1, taken away; in Ezek. xxxiv. 29, be consumed. The clause is a petition against being left to the companionship and doom of wicked men. Nor [gather] my life with bloody men. The prayer is of the same import as that in the preceding clause. David desired that no portion of his existence, neither the general course of his temporal life, nor its solemn close, nor his existence beyond the grave might be in common with the wicked. The reasons for such a prayer are found in all the differences of the characters, pursuits, preferences, habits, aims, ends and destinies of saints and sinners. They do not think alike, feel alike, speak alike, act alike, live alike, die alike, or fare alike. David wished to be remembered, cared for, and gathered, but not with sinners. For the sense of the phrase bloody men, or men of bloods, see on Ps. v. 6. In the next verse we have a further account of these bloody men.

10. In whose hands is mischief. For mischief the Chaldee has the counsel of wickedness; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, iniquities; Arabic, wrongs; Syriac, fraud; Calvin, maliciousness; Venema and Amesius, wickedness; Edwards, plotted mischief; Fry, an evil design; Hengstenberg and Alexander, crime. Men of blood are always criminals, who deserve severe punishment from human law and from the divine judge. To live with them is torment to a pious soul. To spend an eternity with them is damnation. And their right hand is full of bribes. The word rendered bribes is in the singular, but is properly rendered plural from its connection with full, thus conforming to the English idiom. Literally it would be a gift. It is rendered gifts by the church of England; gifts of corruption by Amesius and Piscator; bribery by Fry and Hengstenberg; a bribe by Alexander. In our common version it is rendered a gift, reward, present, bribery and bribes, Ex. xxiii. 8; Deut. x. 17; 1 Kings xv. 19; Job xv. 34; 1 Sam. viii. 3. The sense of the word is well given in Ps. xv. 5; as "taking a reward against the innocent." Nothing more effectually blinds the eyes, perverts the judgment, and vitiates the character than bribery. It poisons the very fountain of justice and is practised only by unprincipled men. The Scripture rule on this subject is correct. It forbids persons who are to act as judges, jurors, umpires or arbitrators even to receive a present. From bloody and deceitful men, who practised bloodshed and bribery, David desired to be separated both in this life and the next. His inclinations led him in a different direction.

11. But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity. Integrity, elsewhere simplicity, perfection. See Ps. vii. 8; xxv. 21. In other versions it is rendered innocence, gentleness, perfectness, perfection. It seems to embrace the idea of entireness of virtuous behaviour, thus securing symmetry of character and universality of obedience. It cannot therefore be better rendered than it is in the English text. This sense is made clearer and stronger by the verb will walk, indicating the course of the life, the uniform habit of the man. Such a life David was resolved to lead. He says, I will. The words, But as for me, exhibit his purpose in contrast to the wicked mentioned in the two verses next preceding. See Josh. xxiv. 15. One, thus honest with man and faithful with God, may confidently pray: Redeem me, and be merciful unto me. Redeem, elsewhere sometimes deliver, rescue, but most commonly as here. The same verb in the same form is found in Ps. xxv. 22. Redemption was commonly by a price, or at great risk. God saves the soul by a great sacrifice, but he is so strong, so wise and so good that he runs no risk. He saves with a mighty hand and abundant mercy. In the case of all sinners any deliverance is a mercy. The greater the deliverance, the greater the undeserved kindness. The prophet does not say, Redeem me and be just unto me. His plea is all of mercy. Be merciful unto me; i. e., be gracious to me, be favorable unto me, have mercy upon me, have pity upon me. See Ex. xxxiii. 19; Jud. xxi. 22; Ps. iv. 1; li. 1; Pr. xix. 17. If David justified himself against the malicious slanders of his enemies, he did not plead that he was beyond the need of Jehovah's mercy and grace.

12. My foot standeth in an even place. He, that walketh uprightly, walketh surely. Sooner or later the Lord sends deliverance. It is not unusual to close the saddest Psalms with an expression of lively confidence that all will be right: yea, so firmly is this pious hope settled that even before relief actually comes, it is spoken of as past or present. The verb in this clause is put in the preterite by the Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Arabic, Syriac, Doway and Calvin, who follow the Hebrew. But the majority of scholars prefer the present, standeth. See Introduction, § 6. Alexander reads "stands, or has (at last) stood." By an even place the oldest versions generally understand rectitude; the Vulgate and Doway, direct way; Calvin, uprightness; church of England, right; Ainsworth, in righteousness; Waterland, the court. Some think the reference is to those words in v. 1, I shall not slide. When he said these words in v. 1, he expressed a hope or a prayer. Now he is assured that he stands firm. Diodati: "By faith I do already hold myself victorious over mine enemies, freed from all dangers and difficulties, and settled in secure happiness." Such a state of mind is fitly followed by the declaration: In the congregations will I bless the LORD. Chaldee: In the congregation of the just will I bless the Lord; Septuagint and Venema: In the assemblies will I bless the Lord; Vulgate and Doway: In the churches I will bless thee, O Lord; Ainsworth: In the churches I will bless Jehovah; Hengstenberg: In the assemblies will I praise the Lord. The verb rendered will bless is found in Ps. v. 12; xvi. 7. Even private benefits often call for public thanksgiving. But public mercies, wherein God delivers our lives and souls from deadly enemies and great perils, always summon us to bless him in the congregations.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. To be misjudged and calumniated is the lot of all good men, v. 1. Neither

David, nor our Saviour escaped this trial. Sometimes these slanders are so many, so terrible, so distressing, that with all our energies we can do no more than patiently bear our sorrows, and quietly look to God for defence.

2. In many cases the wronged and persecuted have no more precious privilege than to refer their whole case to him, who is Judge of all, v. 1. When they can do this with a conscience void of offence towards God and man, they need not be afraid with any amazement. Cobbin: "A good cause, a good conscience, and a good deportment are good grounds of appeal to God. They are not meritorious grounds, but they are evidential grounds."

3. It is always wise to be more afraid of sin than of temporal evil, of doing wrong than of suffering wrong. Nothing hurts us till our souls are hurt. If we do right, we may boldly defy the universe of malignant creatures to do us real harm, v. 1. He, who renders evil for evil, withdraws his case from the chancery of heaven, and provokes the God of peace to rise up against him. Any comfortable appeal to God is entirely destroyed and any successful appeal to God is effectually hindered by our wilful wrong-doing.

4. It is instructive to see how often in Scripture our duties to man are appealed to as the test of sincerity, v. 1. Mere morality is not saving; but religion without morality is an abomination to God and to good men. When we walk in integrity, then we may hope that our trust in God is not a sheer pretence. No zeal, no devotion, no orthodoxy, no professions can prove him a servant of God, whose observance of the last six commandments is lax, or doubtful.

5. It is not wrong for good men, when slandered, to protest their innocence and defend their character, v. 1. This should be done humbly and mildly; but it may be done firmly and confidently. Job: "Till I die I will not remove my integrity from me." It is no mark of a virtuous character to be indifferent to reproach. And yet in many cases silence is best, Matt. xxvii. 12, 14; Mark xiv. 61; xv. 3, 5; Luke xxiii. 9. There is a time to be silent. There is also a time to speak.

6. If we would have the comforts of religion we must maintain habits of piety, v. 1. When David says, I have trusted also in the Lord, he does not refer to some occasional act, but to the tenor of his life. Fits of pious emotions save no man.

7. Although the duties of the second table of the law are often and justly insisted on as evidences of piety, yet when not accompanied by those of the first, they give no encouragement to hope for God's favor. He, who properly regards man, must also fear God. He, who is uncorrupt in morals, must also trust in the Lord, v. 1. Hengstenberg: "Trust in God is the fountain of integrity. Whoever places his hope in God need not seek to advance his worldly interests by violating his duty towards his neighbor: he waits for everything from above, and is, at the same time, always determined that he will not be deprived of the favor of his heavenly Father through violating his commandments."

8. Stability of morals is looked for in vain, where piety is wanting; and piety is vain and hypocritical, where uprightness of life is wanting, v. 1. Justification and sanctification are never separated, Ps. xxxii. 1, 2; Rom. viii. 1. To be just to man and to rob God as clearly establishes a bad character as to be pious towards God, and dishonest towards men.

9. The difference between saints and sinners extends not only to their views respecting Christ and the Holy Ghost, the law and the gospel, but also to the foundations of religious truth. Not only the moral but the natural attributes of God, which are by the wicked contemplated with aversion, are, to the righteous objects of love and joy, v. 2. By the wicked even the omniscience of God is hated. The Osage Indian spoke the sentiments of the carnal heart: "I do not like this God of the white people. I hate him; for he is always looking at me. I would shoot him, if I could see him." This was not the feeling of the renewed heart of David. God's omniscience was his comfort. He appealed to it humbly but gladly for the scrutiny of his character. One of the most marked conversions the author ever witnessed was that of a lady, who in the evening felt a dreadful opposition to God's knowing all that was in her heart, and in the morning was rejoicing in that very truth, Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.

10. It would be better for us, if we should think more of God's loving-kindness, and more frequently celebrate it. It should ever be before our eyes as a theme of contemplation, and on our lips as a theme of praise, v. 3. The heart is best won to God by the mild aspects of the divine character. "It is the pitifulness of the divine bosom, which awakens confidence in the afflicted and sorrowing heart." Nothing more revives our faith. Nothing more animates our zeal and our obedience.

11. Not isolated acts, but the course of one's life must determine character. Unless we walk in God's truth, we are not his servants, v. 3. Henry: "Those only may expect the benefit of God's loving-kindness, that live up to his truths, and his laws that are grounded upon them. Some understand it of his conforming himself to God's example in truth and faithfulness, as well as in goodness and loving-kindness. Those certainly walk well, that are followers of God as dear children."

12. One of the greatest mysteries in human nature is the slowness of men to learn that no good is likely to come to those who love and frequent evil company; while blessings of the greatest value seem naturally to fall on those, who shun the society of the vicious and love that of the godly, v. 4. Morison: "In the present state of society we cannot always avoid civil intercourse with some of the worst of men; but he who sits with the wicked, and finds delight in their unholy conversation, proves himself to be an enemy of God, and a destroyer of his own soul."

13. Guile and dissembling belong to evil courses, v. 4. David's example teaches that "though innocency may seem to make the godly a prey to their enemy, yet it will promote their cause more before God, and give greater contentment to the conscience than witty wicked plotting against witty and wicked enemies."

14. The sagacity of God's people is truly wonderful. That kind of instinct, which preserves them from associations with the crafty and the wicked, can only proceed from a spiritual discernment. Calvin: "Their prudence is altogether different from that of the flesh. Under the guidance and government of the Holy Spirit, they take every necessary precaution against snares, but in such a manner as not to practise any craftiness." The friendship of the world is enmity with God.

15. A good purpose is a good thing, vv. 6, 11, 12. He, who has it not, never accomplishes great and desirable ends. "Without a purpose life is vain and vague." If you would take heaven by storm, you must resolve to do it.

16. There is hope of a man and of a cause so long as God gives a heart to compass his altar and love the habitation of his house, vv. 6, 8. A heart to pray and praise, to adore God and confess sin is never given in vain. God's glory and our weakness, his nature and our sorrows, his mercy and the gratitude due him demand our highest and holiest worship. If pious prophets, apostles, judges, lawgivers and kings felt the worship of God to be so important, what vanity it is in us to decline it, or be indifferent to it!

17. There was never a dispensation of God to men that did not distinguish between true and false worship, between humble worshippers and vain hypocrites. Insincerity was as offensive to God before as since the coming of Christ. The example of David, as here set forth, deserves both to be studied and copied. There was probably never more Antinomianism in the world than in this very age. It is indigenous to the human heart. It is not expelled by all the checks given it. It perverts every truth. He, who lives wickedly cannot worship acceptably. Morison: "It is a fearful thing to approach God's ordinances with a heart cherishing its own evil desires. The inveterate love of one sin will render abortive every attempt to serve a God of spotless purity."

18. It is a great mistake of some that they confine their praises to occasions of prosperity and joyfulness. This is not God's arrangement. This was not David's plan, vv. 7, 12. Paul and Silas prayed and sang praises in the prison at Philippi. Let us bless and praise the Lord at all times, because at all times we have cause for so doing.

19. Marvels worthy of celebration are never wanting to the grateful believer, v. 7. At the time referred to in this Psalm David's circumstances were very trying, yet in the history and prospects of himself and of God's people he found abundant cause for telling the wondrous works of the Lord.

20. Dickson: "The Lord hath a harvest and a gleaning time set, for cutting down and binding together, in the fellowship of judgments, God's enemies, who have followed the same course of sinning; for here we are given to understand that God will gather their souls, and so will let none escape," v. 9.

21. The farther the wicked progress in their career towards the final judgment, the more manifest will it be that saints and sinners are wholly diverse. In tastes, in principles, in habits, in desires, in aims, in prospects, in destiny there can be no greater diversity. Heaven and hell are not more unlike. The gathering time will make this clear. So that among all the profane and daring rebels, who during their earthly life have defied and blasphemed God, there will not be one, whose soul will not be filled with horror at the thought of receiving the portion of the wicked. No marvel then that the righteous, who by faith sees what is coming, and who abhors iniquity, desires never to be united with the congregation of evil doers. Scott: "Having loved the courts of the Lord, and every place and company, where his praises were displayed, and his glorious truth discoursed on; he would dread above all things the final doom of wicked men. A few hours with the covetous, malicious and deceitful are very painful: eternity in such company would be hell to him. This antipathy gives just confidence that his soul shall never be gathered with them, and animates him still to walk in his integrity, and to cry for mercy and complete redemption."

22. Prayers against being gathered with the wicked are not out of place in the case of the best men on earth. If God should deal with the most pious according to their personal deserts, who could stand? No man could account for one of a thousand of his offences. It is ever wise to cry, Enter not into judgment with thy servant.

23. The difference between the destinies of God's friends and foes will be no greater than that which their present characters call for. Clarke: "As I have never loved their company, nor followed their practice, let not my eternal lot be cast with them! I neither love them nor their ways:—may I never be doomed to spend an eternity with them."

24. There must be something dreadful in sin. The Bible exhausts the vocabulary to show its dreadful nature. At one time it is mischief, v. 10. At another it is sin, iniquity, transgression, rebellion, idolatry, harlotry, an evil and a bitter thing, a horrible thing. No man ever dreaded or hated sin excessively.

25. Whoever is engaged in administering justice should put and keep himself beyond the slightest suspicion of partiality, v. 10. In all matters, in this particularly, men should so behave that their good shall not be evil spoken of. The ermine of justice should be unstained. It is horrible to think of living in a country where this is not the case.

26. The whole plan of God respecting duty and salvation is to individualize our race. Religion is a personal matter. Men must learn to stand faithful among the faithless. Every one of us must give account of himself to God. So that every one must determine for himself. "As for me," v. 11, q. d., Let others do as they will, I will do right. To go with the multitude is one thing. To follow the Lord is another. Men are not saved in troops. One is taken and another is left.

27. Blessed is he who can truly say, I have walked in mine integrity; and from a blessed experience of the peace, wisdom and pleasure of such a course, is by God's grace enabled to say, I will walk in mine integrity, vv. 1, 11. Death is not an evil to be compared with the loss of integrity.

28. Whether we seek temporal or spiritual good things, redemption from earthly ills or from the wrath to come, we should never forget that nothing good is to be expected by us poor sinners, except from the mere grace, favor and mercy of God, v. 11.

29. All is well that ends well, v. 12. He who can conclude the review of any scene in his life as David closes this Psalm, may shout and give thanks for all that has happened to him. Morison: "It is a source of unspeakable enjoyment, even here, to unite in the congregations of the saints, and to give utterance to the grateful feelings of a redeemed heart; but what will it be to mingle in the raptures of the skies, to feel the gratitude 'of just men made perfect,' to swell the anthem of heavenly harmony, to lift up our voices with ten thousand times ten thousands, and thousands of thousands, all of whom have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb!" Nor is this all. It is a tribute due to God, and a service due to our tempted and suffering brethren "that every one should publicly celebrate his experience of the grace of God, as an example to others to confide in him."

30. From the strength of the protestations of integrity and innocence here found, some have thought that this Psalm must have its fulfilment in Christ alone, and could not be at all applied to David. Fry's first remark is that "a Psalm, commencing with a demand for justice at the tribunal of the Almighty, must necessarily belong to our righteous Advocate." Amyrald uses language nearly as strong. But Horne clears the matter sufficiently when he says that "we have here an appeal to God in behalf of injured innocence. . . A trial of this sort might be desired by David, and may be desired by men, like him, conscious of their integrity, as to the particular crimes charged upon them by the malice of their enemies. Christ alone could ask such a trial at large, as being equally free from every kind and degree of sin, and certain of receiving additional lustre from the increasing heat of the furnace." No doubt David, in his struggles for his crown and in the opposition of wicked men, was a type of Christ, and an example of all believers, who should come after him. But under the charges brought against him, he would not do otherwise, if he spoke at all, than maintain his innocence. "False humility is really a lie, and cannot be acceptable to a God of truth."

PSALM XXVII.

A Psalm of David.

1 The LORD is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the LORD is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?

2 When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.

3 Though a host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident.

4 One thing have I desired of the LORD, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the LORD, and to inquire in his temple.

5 For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me; he shall set me up upon a rock.

6 And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

7 Hear, O LORD, when I cry with my voice: have mercy also upon me, and answer me.

8 When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, LORD, will I seek.

9 Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger: thou hast been my help; leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation.

10 When my father and my mother forsake me, then the LORD will take me up.

11 Teach me thy way, O LORD, and lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies.

12 Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies: for false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as breathe out cruelty.

13 I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living.

14 Wait on the LORD: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the LORD.

EXCEPT as to the relation between Psalms xxv. xxvi. the remarks on the Davidic authorship of the Psalm next preceding apply with force to this.

Hengstenberg: "All attempts to find out any particular event in the life of David, to which the Psalm may more especially be referred, have failed." This remark is fully sustained by a consideration of the variety of opinions presented by judicious writers, and often by the same writer. Patrick mentions three opinions as entitled to respect: 1. That it relates to Saul's persecutions of David; 2. That it relates to the time when David had to fly from Absalom; 3. That it refers to the time, "when, in fight with the Philistines, he had engaged himself so far among the enemies that he was in danger of being killed by a giant, if Abishai had not seasonably stepped in and relieved him." On this last occasion David was old and infirm. He was as brave as ever, but had neither the agility nor strength of youth. The people were so concerned at nearly losing their king and captain that they came and swore to him, saying, Thou shalt go no more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel, 2 Sam. xxi. 17. Patrick admits that it is "not easy to resolve" the matter. Scott prefers the first of the foregoing opinions, but speaks with respect of those which refer it to later times. The terms of this ode are too general to enable us to fix on any one occasion of distress as causing it to be written.

Scott dates it B. C. 1059; Clarke, B. C. 578. If it was written during the urgency of distress it shows how strong was the prophet's faith to enable him to give thanks, as if the deliverance had been already wrought. Even if written after succor had reached him, it still embodies the sentiments which actuated him during his trial, although there may be more prominence given to his joyous sentiments in composing the ode than actually existed in his mind while the affliction lasted. It is not necessary to suppose with Calvin that the thanksgivings which David mingles with his desires and meditations, show that the Psalm was composed after his deliverance. Many a shout goes up from the field of battle.

On the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xi. There is neither reason nor authority for the addition made to the title by the Syriac: "On account of an infirmity which fell upon him;" nor of that of the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: "A Psalm of David before he was anointed." David was thrice anointed, 1 Sam. xvi. 13; 2 Sam. ii. 4; 2 Sam. v. 3; so that if the addition were allowed it would still leave the matter very vague, as it would not determine which anointing was referred to.

The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. On God of my salvation see on Ps. xviii. 46.

1. The Lord is my light. This Psalm relates to a season of darkness, when probably the faith and courage of some respecting David's success were much shaken by means of the fierceness, taunts and power of his enemies. The fears of his friends were probably not concealed from him. To silence them and to encourage himself he declares his resources to be in Jehovah: The Lord is my light. Light is the emblem of joy. The word is uniformly rendered. See on Ps. iv. 6. Light is sown for the righteous, Ps. cxvii. 11. Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness, Ps. cxii. 4. Jehovah is an unfailing source of joy. He has all resources. David says he is my light and my salvation. Salvation, thrice rendered safety, in all other cases salvation. It implies all needed deliverance. Jehovah, as he sees best, saves through trouble, out of trouble, or from trouble altogether. In the end he will do the last. Because he can and will so deliver, any one of his chosen may in the time of greatest trial say, Whom shall I fear? Neither spiritual nor military heroes do exploits through cowardice. Courage is a necessary virtue. In Jehovah is the best possible foundation for unflinching intrepidity. It is added: The LORD is the strength of my life. The word rendered strength has not before occurred in the Psalms. It is however in Ps. xxviii. 8, and frequently thereafter. It is variously rendered rock, fort, fortress, strong-hold, and more commonly strength. Once we read of the God of forces, the word being plural, Dan. xi. 38. So Jehovah was David's safe and impregnable refuge. So sure was he of this that he repeats the question: Of whom shall I be afraid? One Almighty is mightier than all mighties. Appearances may be quite against one, but if God be for him who can be against him? Calvin: "Weighing, as it were, in scales the whole power of earth and hell, David accounts it all lighter than a feather, and considers God alone as far outweighing it all." David has faith to appropriate all God's nature to his defence, and so he speaks of God as my light, my salvation, and the strength of my life. Hengstenberg: "If he only remain an inmate in the house of God, in possession of the favor of God, he is hid; for God protects his own."

2. When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell. Wicked, evil-doers in Ps. xxvi. 5; those who do hurt, Jer. xxv. 6; those who do harm, 1 Sam. xxvi. 21; those who afflict, Ps. xlii. 2; those who do mischief, Pr. iv. 16; those who vex others, Num. xx. 15. Enemies, commonly so rendered, or adversaries, those who give trouble, or those who give anguish. Foes, in Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10; and always rendered as here or enemies. The wicked will as certainly do wickedly as that they are the enemies of God and the foes of good men. They thought David would hardly be a meal for them. So they came upon him, or drew near to him, to eat up his flesh, to make a full end of him; but they found unexpected difficulties. They stumbled, elsewhere fell, fell down, fell backward, failed, were cast down, were overthrown. Stumbled is a good and common rendering. And they fell or died, Gen. xxv. 18; or perished, Ex. xix. 21. In Jud. v. 27 it occurs thrice and signifies died though rendered fell, or fell down. See Ps. x. 10; xx. 8. An assault on a God-protected man is fatal to the assailant. There is no good reason for rendering any of the verbs in this verse in the future, as Castellio: "If they invade me—they shall stumble and fall." Nor is there any more reason for rendering them in the present tense, as do Piscator, Amesius, Edwards, Green and Hengstenberg. In the original the verbs are in the preterite; and we get the best sense by allowing David in great apparent peril to call to mind what God had done on former occasions; or, after the peril is over, to celebrate the deliverance. Calvin prefers the former explanation. From this time the Psalmist sees no just cause for doubting that he should have the help of God in any extremity:

3. Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear. An host, a band, a company, a camp, an army in the field, a host numerous, actually armed for war, and trained to violence, is generally esteemed formidable. But though such an host should pitch their tents, encamp, array themselves against him, his heart should not fear. If not before, yet now came deliverance, which David joyfully celebrated: "By my God I have run through a troop." No combining and drilling of human forces ever prevails against the God of forces, Dan. xi. 38. Embattled legions are in God's esteem but as grasshoppers. Providence often fights against the strongest party, Eccle. ix. 11. He adds: Though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident. War refers to actual war, fighting. Battle would perhaps be a better rendering here. There is no reason for putting the last phrase, In this will I be confident, in connection with the next verse. It fairly belongs here: The sense of the clause is complete in itself: Though battle be arrayed against me, yet in this alarming and terrible state of things, I will be confident, sure, secure, Prov. xi. 15; Jud. xviii. 27. Although David was thus undaunted in the midst of perils, yet his heart was not in war. In the hairbreadth escapes of the fight he had no pleasure. Nor had he any delight in scenes of carnage, though he and his friends should be victors; "for every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood." To such scenes he greatly preferred the quiet of peace, when he could be about the tabernacle and the holy city.

4. One thing have I desired of the LORD, that will I seek after. The meaning is, "I have desired one thing preëminently, I have desired it so much that in comparison I have desired nothing else. And I have sought it religiously, devoutly, by prayer, of the Lord; and I will never cease to desire it." This one thing, which he so earnestly sought for himself is thus expressed: That I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life. Three principal interpretations are given to this clause, each of them having a good sense. One is that the priests lodged at or in the house of the Lord, and David is here speaking of the desirableness of their life beyond that of a king in war. On this interpretation the pious Henry says: "Disdainfully as some look upon God's ministers, one of the greatest and best kings, that ever was, would gladly have taken his lot, have taken his lodging among them." No doubt David highly esteemed the priest's office; but as the head of the nation under the theocracy, as a prophet, as the sweet singer of Israel and as a type of Christ, he occupied a place in the house of God higher than that of any of the ordinary priests. Besides, the priests did not actually dwell in the temple. This could hardly have been his meaning, certainly not the whole of it. The second supposes that David here expresses his desire to have the peace of the realm restored, that he, as had been his wont, might piously and daily frequent the house of God, and unite in its solemnities. This may have been all that was intended. It is as much as most commentators get from it. And pious souls have always greatly loved the house and public worship of God. But the phrase, house of the Lord, at least sometimes has a much wider scope than that of any visible structure on earth. See Ps. xxiii. 6. Therefore, a third exposition is given. This makes the dwelling in God's house to be spiritual; and to be equivalent to having Jehovah for light and salvation. In this way we get the best sense to the phrase, One thing have I desired. This certainly signifies more than the mere privilege of being a visible worshipper in the tabernacle, which David knew was soon to be followed by a glorious temple. But why may not these views be united, and we regard the Psalmist as desiring to live in that state of peace, which would allow him to frequent the house of God, there to worship in the beauty of holiness, and thus have a pledge of the protection, guidance, and blessing of Jehovah here and hereafter? Two chief objects he had in view in this desire. One was, To behold the beauty of the LORD. To behold is not only to perceive, but to enjoy. For behold some read contemplate, meditate upon.

But so to perceive as to enjoy is a better signification, and is often found in the Old Testament, and in the corresponding Greek verb in the New Testament. For the beauty of the Lord, others read the pleasure, the delight, the gracious countenance, the fair beauty, the loveliness, the desirableness, the pleasantness, the cheering countenance, the amiable and glorious majesty, the excellence and sweetness, the infinite and transcendant amiableness of the Lord. Venema: "The beauty of the Lord here denotes whatever in the Lord is sweet, pleasant and salutary to the sinner, and therefore his excellencies of goodness and grace together with all their signs and effects." So to see as to enjoy the whole of God's character as revealed in Scripture is given to none but regenerate souls. They only have spiritual discernment, 1 Cor. ii. 14. Yet though they see them supernaturally, they do it not miraculously. They enjoy these things by the Holy Spirit's blessing on the word and ordinances of God. The other object David had in view in dwelling in God's house is thus expressed, And to inquire in his temple. There seems to be no good reason for rendering the verb here contemplate, or visit, or meditate, as some have proposed. To search, to make inquiry, to seek early, i. e., diligently, is the real force of the original. In his temple, in his palace. See Ps. v. 7. Alexander: "Properly palace, the earthly residence of the great King, and therefore equally appropriate to the temple and the tabernacle." The word is rendered palace in 1 Kings xxi. 1; Ps. xlv. 8; and elsewhere.

5. For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion. Pavilion, also rendered in our common version, booth, tabernacle, tent, cottage, covert. The sense evidently is that as a booth is a place of shelter from the sun, or as a tent is a covert from inclement weather; so Jehovah shall effectually hide his people in his pavilion when trouble, mischief, harm, wickedness, adversity, affliction, any evil, natural or moral shall threaten them. In the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me. Often when all human solace and support failed him, David had found both in God as revealed in his tabernacle. He had thus learned to trust for days to come, and he felt assured of protection. Yea, his confidence was not that he should be barely hidden, but quite beyond the reach of his foes: He shall set me up upon a rock; i. e., upon one of those high and impregnable natural fortresses, which were found in Judea; see Ps. xviii. 2; xxxi. 4; xix. 14. In these elevations one man was equal to the task of repelling many. The swords, spears, arrows and slung stones of foes reached him not. In the Hebrew the verbs of this verse are in the future. The rendering of the common version should be retained, though Hengstenberg, following several ancient versions, employs the preterite. Yet even he admits the future to be best in the next verse.

6. And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about. God protects effectually. The more acquaintance the saints have with him, the more are they persuaded of his excellence as a hiding-place. A soul saved by him may look down in defiance at his haughtiest and mightiest foes. The cony in the rock is safe from the thousand hounds yelping at it. Round about, more commonly so rendered; frequently, on every side. There is no propriety in rendering the phrase, I have made a circuit, or I have gone round, as several ancient versions have done, thus connecting it with the next clause. The Syriac comes nearer the sense when it reads, And now my head is lifted up above my enemies, who surrounded me. Such deliverances would call for suitable acts of devotion: Therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy. Chaldee: And I will sacrifice in his tabernacle acceptable sacrifices; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway: I have offered up in his tabernacle a sacrifice of jubilation; Syriac: I will sacrifice in his tabernacle the sacrifices of praise; church of England: Therefore will I offer in his dwelling an oblation, with great gladness; Venema: And I will sacrifice in his tent the victims of a joyful outcry; Amesius:

That I may sacrifice in his tent the sacrifices with the sound of trumpets; Ainsworth: And I will sacrifice in his tent sacrifices of shouting; Edwards: And I shall offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of thanksgiving; Fry: And I sacrifice at his tabernacle sacrifices of triumph; Hengstenberg: And I will offer in his tabernacles offerings of joy; Alexander: And I will sacrifice in his tabernacle sacrifices of joyful noise. Joy, in Ps. xxxiii. 3, a loud noise; in Ps. xlvii. 5, a shout; in Ps. lxxxix. 15, the joyful sound. Hammond: "Sacrifices of jubilation are those of the solemn feasts, attended not only with the harmony and music of the Levites, but the hosannas and acclamations of the people. Hence Jeremy compares the military clamors of the victorious Chaldeans in the temple to those that were formerly made there in the day of a solemn feast, Lam. ii. 7. They have made a noise in the house of the Lord, as in a day of a solemn feast." The psalmist adds: I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD. The first verb is in our version almost uniformly rendered sing, as in Ps. xiii. 6; xxi. 13. The second is frequently rendered as here, Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2; also sing, sing praise, and once sing Psalms, 1 Chron. xvi. 9. Several ancient versions give recite a Psalm; others, make a Psalm. The prophet says that he will do all in his power to exalt God by speech and music.

7. Hear, O LORD, when I cry with my voice. The confident and exultant tone is here dropped, and the language of earnest desire and hearty prayer is adopted. Cry, so rendered in Ps. iii. 4; lxvi. 17; cxix. 145; cxxx. 1; often call, as in Ps. xiv. 4; xvii. 6; often proclaim, Is. lxi. 1, 2; Joel iii. 9. The phrase, with my voice, shows that the prayer was vocal and not merely in the heart. Have mercy also upon me, and answer me. Have mercy, as in Ps. iv. 1; xxvi. 11.

8. When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, LORD, will I seek. With this verse our translators have taken unusual, though not unwarrantable liberties. It is not possible to give the sense in English, unless something is supplied. This is proven by the attempt and failure of many. Castellio thus paraphrases it: "I thus think in my mind, that thou wouldst have thy face sought; thy face, Lord, I seek." With this substantially agrees Patrick's paraphrase. Indeed the best sense is fairly reached by our version, and those which in the main agree with it. To seek God's face is to come before him with requests and petitions, such as the following:

9. Hide not thy face far from me. The word far is unnecessarily supplied by our translators. To hide the face is to refuse as a judge to hear the cause, and give relief. The form of speech is borrowed from the preceding verse. Another request is, Put not thy servant away in anger. This translation is good. Calvin's is as good: Cast not away thy servant in thy wrath; so also is that of Edwards: Turn not off thy servant in anger. Horsley prefers that of the Septuagint and Vulgate: Turn not away in anger from thy servant. The reasoning of the Psalmist seems to be: My sins are many: God might in righteous indignation cast me off: But he is merciful and in him do I trust. And until he does put me away, I am under his guardianship and protection, and so I am safe. To pray thus he is emboldened by his past experience of God's love and mercy: Thou hast been my help: q. d., I remember the affair of the bear, the fight with the lion, and the death of Goliath, in all of which cases thou alone didst save me, and so I know whom I am addressing, and am bold to plead thy care and help again. He urges his plea in other like words: Leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation. For forsake Calvin reads forsake utterly; others suggest slight changes; but none of them give a better sense, nor are they more true to the original. Because of their connection with blessed promises, the English verbs here used have become very precious to the saints, Josh. i. 5; 1 Sam. xii. 22; 1 Kings viii. 57; Heb. xiii. 5. The last text is as wonderful a promise as the Bible contains. In our Psalm, the language is that of prayer. Every inspired prayer is a promise.

10. When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up. Forsake, the same as in the preceding verse, but here in the preterite. The second verb is in the future. The renderings of this verse are considerably diverse, yet the import of the passage is not doubtful. For take up the Chaldee and Ainsworth read gather; Edwards, take in. The Syriac, church of England and Hengstenberg have the last verb in the present tense; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Jebb, in the preterite; Chaldee, Calvin, Amesius and Alexander, in the future. Instead of When Ainsworth and Edwards have Though. In Ex. xiii. 17 it is although. Did David's father and mother ever forsake him? The last account we have of them, they still adhered to him and his cause, 1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4. To meet this difficulty several things have been said. 1, The verb rendered forsake as well describes the separation by death as by wilful desertion, Psalm xlix. 10; Jer. xlix. 11. 2, Some suppose the case to be merely supposititious. This requires the sentence to begin with although, and the verb to be rendered should forsake. 3, Some have supposed that David often and actually fell under the displeasure of his parents, as he did, at least on one occasion, under that of a brother, 1 Sam. xvii. 28. But there is no proof that David ever incurred the disapprobation of his parents. Sharp as were his trials, there is no evidence that they lacked confidence in his wisdom, integrity or ultimate success. It is remarkable that Hengstenberg, who favors the view suggested by the third remark, finds no trace of evidence in the history of Jesse or David, but rests the whole weight of the assertion on the proverb, "The unfortunate may lay their account with contempt;" on the experience of Job, when for his calamities friends and wife forsook him; on an expression used by another Psalmist, Ps. lxxxviii. 8; and on the general principles of human nature. But Jesse and his wife are in Scripture held up as models of piety. They are always mentioned with respect or with commendation. They doubtless believed God's hand was in all their troubles, and that their son was divinely called to these sore trials, perhaps as a preparation for reigning over a great nation. 4. Another explanation is that father and mother here represent near and dear friends, who often die, and who often voluntarily withdraw their confidence and esteem. This is admitted by Hengstenberg. This and the first remark fully meet the difficulty. 5. Calvin makes the forsaking yet future, but that is hardly justified by the original. The Lord will take me up. It is not without cause that Edwards prefers take in. Hengstenberg: "The Lord takes me up, like one who takes a weary wanderer or a fugitive, who has lost his way, into his house, and treats him kindly." The same verb is used in Josh. xx. 4; Judges xix. 15. The same idea is conveyed in v. 5. Our Saviour laid great stress on hospitality, Matt. xxv. 35, 43. So did his Apostles, Rom. xii. 13; 1 Tim. iii. 2; Tit. i. 8; 1 Pet. iv. 9.

11. Teach me thy way, O LORD. The Chaldee, Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius and many others quite agree with the common version. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: Set me, O Lord, a law in thy way; Fry: Instruct me, Jehovah, concerning thy way; Alexander: Guide me, Jehovah, (in) thy way. There are but two admissible senses. One is that David prays to be preserved from sin; the other is that he asks to be guided in the ways of God's choosing to a happy issue. There is no objection to uniting them both, and to understand him as asking to be kept from sin, and so guided to a full deliverance. And lead me in a plain path. For plain the ancient versions and many modern translations read right; Edwards and Hengstenberg, even; Alexander, level. Crooked ways are to be avoided because they are wicked; rough ways, because they are uncomfortable; and dark ways, because they are perilous. Praying against sinful ways so as to be guided in safe ways exhausts the meaning. For these petitions he gives an urgent reason: Because of mine enemies. As if he had said, Because my enemies are many, deceitful, malignant, watching for my halting, and seeking my life.

12. Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies. Enemies, by some tormentors, by some distressers, by others observers or spies. It is a dreadful thing to be, even for a season, in the power of bad men, especially when their passions are excited, and they are ready to deal out cruelties. The wicked do often make portions of this world very much like hell. Their temper and malice show that they are of their father the devil, and his works will they do. A special reason is given for urging the prayer: For false witnesses are risen up against me. Who can stand before false testimony? How it pierces the soul with anguish! It is the most intolerable species of murder. It kills by torture. When it extends to judicial oaths it shows the worst possible state of society. Where false witnesses are found there also are Such as breathe out cruelty. There is a doubt among scholars whether this clause should be read in the singular or plural. Our rendering is supported by some translations and able scholars; while a large majority would read, "He that breathes out cruelties." Without some knowledge of Hebrew the discussion could hardly be understood. Nor is the sense materially varied; for often does one of a class stand for many like himself. This clause reminds one of Saul of Tarsus, who breathed out threatenings and slaughter. Such language describes one whose thoughts and purposes are all bent in one direction, and who is eager upon his evil design. His breath stinks of blood.

13. I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living. I had fainted is supplied by our translators, and some think needlessly. None of the ancient versions have it. Yet it seems to have been commonly understood that something was to be here supplied, legibly or mentally. So Calvin (in the French version) supplies, I should have perished; church of England, I should utterly have fainted; Amesius, They would have borne me away by force; Edwards, I should sink under my trouble. Another very respectable class of scholars decline to supply anything, yet admit that the sense is imperfect without something understood. Thus Ainsworth: Except I had believed to see the goodness of Jehovah in the land of the living; Calvin (in his commentary), Jebb, Hammond, Clarke, Hengstenberg and Alexander virtually agree to this rendering. Hammond: "In the Hebrew there is an aposiopesis, a figure of elegance, purposely breaking off in the midst of the speech; yet so as every man can foresee what kind of conclusion should follow, if he did not purposely divert to the contrary." This figure of speech is common, and belongs to the language of promise or threatening, and specially suits subjects of an awful character. This virtually agrees with our version, because it admits that some such clause is to be supplied, at least in the mind of the reader. It leaves the Hebrew text unaltered, and it gives a good sense, and that with much beauty and force. The land of the living is a phrase that has caused some doubt. The Chaldee: The land of eternal life; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Syriac, Doway, church of England, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and others agree with the English version. The Arabic and Alexander read in the land of life. As David is speaking of temporal distresses and persecutions, it is perhaps best to read land of the living, meaning thereby the opposite of land of the dead.

14. Wait on the LORD. Some have thought David here turns from himself, and addresses others, calling on them to do their duty and leave results with God. But the words are most fitly addressed, not to others, but to himself. Horsley, however, regards this whole verse as containing the words of an oracular voice. But it is as well to regard the Psalmist as addressing himself, or his soul, as he often does. The exhortation of the whole verse is a seasonable check to the language of alarm, begun to be uttered in the preceding verse. Waiting on the Lord is not only being ready to serve him, but also patiently looking for him, and confidently expecting him. So far from supposing its trials over, it rather looks for new ones. The Chaldee: Confide in the Lord; Vulgate, Venema, Amesius and Fry: Expect the Lord; several versions: Hope in the Lord; church of England: O tarry thou the Lord's leisure; Alexander: Wait thou for Jehovah. This waiting was to be in cheerfulness, not in sullenness: Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart. The Chaldee: Be inflexible and strengthen thy heart; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Act manfully, and let thy heart be strengthened; church of England: Be strong, and he shall comfort thy heart. The great mass of translators agree in the main with the common version. Hengstenberg and Alexander read the latter clause, And may he strengthen thy heart. This form of the first verb is in our version most commonly rendered, Be strong, or Be of good courage; once or twice, Be sure, Be courageous. The second verb is well rendered strengthen, meaning the same as confirm, establish, fortify. Those who would be strong and courageous must exercise the strength and courage which they have, and not wickedly yield to despondency. Nor let any forget that a time of trial, so far from relaxing the bonds of obligation, does rather call for increased attention to our duties, and so the Psalmist again exhorts himself to stand in his lot, and hope for better days: Wait, I say, on the Lord. In the Hebrew as in the English we have the very same words as those found in the beginning of the verse: Wait on the Lord. There is nothing but the conjunction, which we commonly render, and, in the Hebrew, to correspond with the words, I say. Though the Hebrew may not be literally so rendered, yet the English idiom justifies our translation.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Jehovah is himself the infinite good, the portion of his saints, their all and in all, their light and joy, their safety and deliverance, their strength and refuge, v. 1. Were our faith as strong as it should be, nothing could fill us with dismay or terror. Because God changes not, the state of his people is never desperate.

2. One of the best ways to dispel doubts and fears is to summon to our aid the very strongest doctrines and highest truths of religion, v. 1. Weak doctrines will not be a match for powerful temptations.

3. No confidence is so well placed as confidence in God; no joy is like that which he gives; no deliverances are so manifestly glorious as those he works; life is never so sweet as when felt to be the renewed gift of God, v. 1.

4. Courage is both a duty of man, and a gift of God, v. 1. We should sharply reprove ourselves for all disheartening timidity. If we duly fear God, all tormenting fear is idle. There is no cause for it. There is no getting on without intrepidity. We must be heroic, or we must perish.

5. It is an unspeakable privilege to be in covenant with God, so as to be able to say of him, He is my light, my salvation, and the strength of my life, v. 1. An impersonal God is hardly more full of vagueness, than is a God to whom we sustain no personal or federal relations.

6. There was great wisdom in the prayer of John Wesley: "Lord, if I must contend, let it not be with thy people." When we have for foes and enemies those who hate good men, we have at least this consolation, that God is not on their side, and therefore it is essentially weak, v. 2.

7. The hatred of the wicked to the righteous is deadly. They would eat up their flesh, v. 2. It was so from the beginning. It has been so always. O how they have slaughtered the people of God!

8. The way the wicked fail is terrible. If they had any wisdom at all, the deluge, the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah, the overthrow of Pharaoh and his hosts, or any one of their great defeats would have fully satisfied them that their war on God, his truth, and his saints was hopeless folly. Since the world began, the end of every battle they have fought against God and his people has been this, they stumbled and fell, v. 2. "The temporary success of the wicked is only an introduction to their deeper disgrace and misery."

9. As it is easy to abuse, so it is possible rightly to use past experiences and deliverances. In this David sets us a good example, vv. 2, 9. He who has delivered can deliver. He who made the world can do anything. He who has been our help and light and safety and strength is everlasting and unfailing.

10. God can as easily defeat a world in arms against one of his chosen, as he can bring to naught the counsel and the rage of one man, v. 3. To him a host is as one man; and all nations are as grasshoppers. If we would have much comfort we must study God's attributes and acquaint ourselves with him. He, who hopes for no more, than appearances lead him to expect, will be a poor creature; while he, who hopes against hope, will be a pillar.

11. When the worst comes to the righteous, then things grow better. The host encamps, the battle rages, then comes the decision, and the result is that the righteous are calm and confident, and so victorious, v. 3.

12. Dickson: "It is a mean to strengthen faith, to resolve by the grace of God to put faith in act, in whatsoever difficulty, and in a manner to lay hands on ourselves, to hold up this shield against whatsoever fiery darts, albeit possibly when it cometh to push of pike, we be not found so strong as we are stout," v. 3.

13. Calvin: "Then does faith bring forth its fruit in due season, when we remain firm and fearless in the midst of dangers," v. 3.

14. It proves no man wrong to have war made against him, v. 3. The best causes and the best men often meet with the fiercest opposition.

15. God's visible worship ever has been and ever must be a source of continual joy to the right-minded, v. 4. There is no evidence that this will cease to be the case in a future world. We know it will not. See the book of Revelation. God's ordinances of worship are all edifying. Surely those, who hope to spend their eternity in the praises of God, ought to get their harps in tune to his service before they leave this world.

16. When we have a good thought or desire, we must not yield it up to temptation, but hold on to it and cherish it, v. 4. When some one admired Leighton's library, he said: "One devout thought is worth more than it all." He was right.

17. Sometimes men have spoken slightly of the love of gratitude to God, and sometimes of the love of complacency in God. The Bible does neither. As elsewhere it commends the former, Ps. cxvi. 1; so here it does the latter, v. 4. The great error of the wicked respecting Christ is that when they see him there is in their eyes no beauty that they should desire him. He, who cares not to behold the beauty of the Lord, is a poor blinded sinner.

18. A sense of ignorance lies at the foundation of all solid improvement in learning. Only those, who manifest a docile spirit are in any mood to learn, or to inquire in God's temple, v. 4.

19. The safety of God's people in this life does not consist in exemption from troubles and perils; but in the care and protection of him, who hides them in his pavilion, and in his tabernacle, and sets them upon a rock, v. 5.

20. While gravity and solemnity become the house of God, yet we should, even at the most trying times, conduct our worship in cheerfulness, yea, in joyfulness, v. 6.

Grimace and superstition are never pleasing to God nor to right-minded men. Henry: "Whatever is the matter of our joy ought to be matter of our praise. And when we attend upon God in holy ordinances, we ought to be much in joy and praises." "Thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph."

21. The saints shall not only be saved; they shall be saved manifestly and abundantly. Their heads shall be lifted up above all their enemies, v. 6. It shall be no secret that God's people are delivered. Even here God often brings them out with a strong arm and a mighty hand. And where for good cause he tries them long, he often removes from their own minds all doubt of their perfect victory. Dickson: "The Lord can give a believer assurance of what he would have, and make him so clear of the possession of the promise, as if it were in his hand." "Happy are they, whose faith and hope are as vigorous as the security is valid."

22. All mercies call for gratitude; and some, though personal, demand public and joyful acknowledgment, and even exultation, v. 6.

23. It is impossible to explain God's word according to any sound rules of interpretation, so as to condemn the use of joyful, solemn music in his public worship, v. 6. On this point the New Testament is as clear as the Old, 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16; James v. 13. God's worship should not be wholly silent and inaudible.

24. Prayer and praise are both duties. Worship is as much God's due as anything can be, vv. 6, 7. If he deserves not the highest acts of adoration, he deserves nothing.

25. He, who piously seeks God's face, obeys a very binding and a very gracious command, v. 8. He may rest assured that he shall lack neither mercy nor protection, nor instruction, nor redemption, nor salvation—eternal life. Of such inestimable price is God's favor that the righteous would gladly forego all blessings in comparison of it.

26. Divine desertion is fatal to any cause. The righteous know this, and so are very urgent in praying against so great a calamity, v. 9. Nothing worse can happen to any man than to be left to himself. To be wholly and finally and eternally forsaken of God is hell.

27. One of the best exercises of a devout mind is converting promises into prayers. God says "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." Let us continually pray, "Leave me not, neither forsake me." We may also rest assured that everything, for which we find warrant to pray, is to believers made sure in the oath of the covenant. God never stirs up a soul to cry, "Leave me not, neither forsake me," without saying, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." All that is promised is rightly prayed for; all that is rightly prayed for is surely promised, v. 9.

28. No desertion of friends, however dear, should make us despair, v. 10. At one time almost everybody was against David, yet he triumphed. Devils and wicked men were against Christ; one disciple betrayed him, another denied him, and all forsook him; even his Father drew against him the dreadful sword of inflexible justice, and buried it deep in his holy soul; yet none ever triumphed as he triumphed. From his resurrection to this day has been one unbroken series of victories. So it shall be till he hath put all things under him. "God is a surer and better Friend than our earthly parents are, or can be."

29. No man can too highly prize or too diligently seek or too closely follow divine guidance and conduct, v. 11.

30. We must see that we do right things in a right way, and that our good be not evil spoken of. Dickson: "There is danger of desertion, or of God's leaving us to the will of our enemies, if we carry not a good cause in a lawful, holy and tender way," v. 11.

31. If we have enemies, so had others before us, vv. 2, 11, 12. Some men seem to have a fondness for speaking much of their enemies. This may arise from a vanity which delights in the conspicuity thus obtained, or from a desire to secure sympathy, or from a heart full of distress at being beset by haters and opposers. Yet when our enemies are many and violent and cruel, it is often a relief to speak of them. It is not given to man to be great, or useful, or influential, without incurring the malice of the ignoble. There is a large class of men who suspect and often hate all who excel them. Which of the prophets or apostles lived without bitter enemies? Christ himself was hated without a cause. Let no good man be surprised at finding men hating him.

32. We should often and gratefully acknowledge the goodness of God, which keeps us out of the power of the wicked, v. 12. When men are not only wicked but when their wickedness takes the form of tyranny, then to be in their power makes an earthly existence to cease to be desirable. Cruelty and oppression are sometimes worse than strangling and death.

33. Those, who are disposed to apologize for the wicked as being but moderately vile, would do well to study the delineations of their characters as given in the Bible. There, their very breath is said to be cruel and murderous, v. 12.

34. A lively hope and strong faith are good things, v. 13. O it is good for a man that he both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of God. Morison: "What a light in darkness is confidence in God's paternal care!"

35. Those, who exercise the grace they have, shall have more grace, v. 14. To him that hath shall be given. Calvin: "As David was conscious of his weakness, and knew that his faith was the great means of preserving him safe, he seasonably strengthens himself for the future. Under the word waiting, too, he puts himself in mind of new trials, and sets before his eyes the cross which he must bear."

36. As we have opportunity we should to the comfort of the saints and the glory of God speak of our marvellous and narrow escapes, v. 13. It mightily emboldens the saints to hear one of their number just out of the furnace give such an exhortation as that in v. 14.

37. Dickson: "Albeit the Lord let the trouble lie on, and strong temptations to increase, and grief of heart to grow, yet must we still wait: for at the due time the outgate shall come," v. 14.

38. Be of good courage, all ye saints: Wait, I say, on the Lord.

PSALM XXVIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 Unto thee will I cry, O LORD my rock; be not silent to me: lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.

2 Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle.

3 Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity, which speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts.

4 Give them according to their deeds, and according to the wickedness of their endeavours: give them after the work of their hands; render to them their desert.

5 Because they regard not the works of the LORD, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up.

6 Blessed be the LORD, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications.

7 The LORD is my strength and my shield; my heart trusted in him, and I am helped: therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth; and with my song will I praise him.

8 The LORD is their strength, and he is the saving strength of his anointed.

9 Save thy people, and bless thine inheritance: feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

THERE is no good reason for doubting that David wrote this Psalm.

For an explanation of the title see on Psalms iii. xi. The Vulgate and Doway give the title: A Psalm for David himself; Chaldee: To David; Septuagint: Of David; Ethiopic: Of David himself; Arabic: A prayer and a prophecy; Syriac: Of David, a supplication and a prayer; also that we should implore help.

The occasion of the writing of this Psalm, if there was any, is not apparent. Calvin, after Theodoret: "It is probable that he speaks of his persecutions by Saul;" Morison: "It is highly probable that this Psalm was composed on the same occasion with the former;" Hengstenberg: "The contents throughout apply very well to David during the time of Absalom's rebellion;" Dodd: "This, as well as the foregoing, is supposed to have been written by David towards the latter end of his reign;" Gill: "It might be made by David when he was persecuted by Saul, or when delivered from him, or at least when he had faith and hope that he should be delivered;" Scott: "It is not agreed, whether it was written during David's persecutions from Saul, or at a later period;" Clarke: "It belongs most probably to the times of the captivity, though some have referred it to David in his persecutions." Edwards justly says: "The particular occasion is uncertain." Scott dates it B. C. 1059; Clarke, B. C. 578. Alexander: "The collocation of the Psalm is clearly not fortuitous, but founded on its close resemblance to the one before it." Hengstenberg, however, thinks that this Psalm and the twenty-ninth make up one pair. Here we have new proof of the great uncertainty in the doctrine of pairs.

The only name of God in this Psalm is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

One class of commentators make this ode exclusively Messianic. Fry: "These are still the supplications of our great High-Priest." Horne is no less decided in applying it to Christ alone and exclusively. Others seem to drop all idea of Christ from their interpretations. The truth probably is that the Psalm details the experience of the literal David, but also presents him as a type of the great Anointed, who was to come; and so we may regard it as Typical-Messianic. David is as certainly spoken of as anointed of God as was the great promised Deliverer. The mere occurrence of that word-determines nothing as to its application.

This Psalm is not in form dramatic.

1. Unto thee will I cry, O LORD my rock. Will cry, the same verb as in Ps. xxvii. 7. The Chaldee, Amesius, Ainsworth, Fabritius, Edwards, Fry and Hengstenberg use the present, cry; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Syriac the preterite, have cried; Venema, I am used to cry; Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin and Jebb follow the Hebrew as does our version, will cry; Alexander, will call. My rock. Some versions separate this word from the first clause, and make it the beginning of the second, but this is not best. The Hebrew for rock is the same as in Deut. xxxii. 4, 15, 18, 30; Ps. xviii. 31, 46. See on Ps. xviii. 2; xix. 14, where it is rendered strength. Be not silent to me. Arabic: Neglect me not; Calvin: Hold not thy peace from me; Edwards: Be not regardless of me; Boothroyd: Be not thou deaf to my prayer; Dathe: I am unwilling that thou shouldst be absent from me; Alexander: Be not silent from me. The same verb in the same form is elsewhere rendered, Hold not thy peace, Ps. xxxix. 12; lxxxiii. 1; cix. 1. The prayer is that God would no longer keep silence, but speak out to the joy of his servant and to the confusion of his enemies. Lest if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit; i. e., die and go into the grave. The prominent idea is that of utter helplessness and ruin unless prompt and sensible aid come from God. Calvin: "It is as if he had said, I am nothing if thou leavest me; if thou succorest me not I perish." One begins to be in a good way when, with a heart to pray, he learns that he is nothing.

2. Hear the voice of my supplications. The rendering of this clause could not well be different. For supplications the church of England has humble petitions. The word means earnest pleas for undeserved favor. When I cry unto thee. This verb is almost invariably rendered cry. It here denotes audible, earnest pleading with God. When I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle. Oracle, uniformly rendered. It occurs more than a dozen times. The ancient versions all give it temple; church of England, mercy-seat; Calvin, sanctuary; Venema and Amesius, most holy place. The reference is to Ex. xxv. 22: "I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubims, which are upon the ark of the testimony." See Num. vii. 89; 1 Kings vi. 19. The mercy-seat prefigured Christ, who is the Word of God, the revealer of God, and the propitiation, John i. 1; xiv. 9; Rom. iii. 25; 1 John ii. 2. As in prayer we now by faith look to Christ, so the pious of old with their natural eyes looked to the oracle, the mercy-seat. Lifting up the hands was a common gesture in prayer, Ps. xlv. 20; lxiii. 4; lxxxviii. 9; cxli. 2; cxliii. 6.

3. Draw me not away with the wicked. Arabic: Snatch not away my soul with sinners; Syriac: Number me not with the ungodly; Hammond: Seize not on me with the wicked. The English is supported by the Chaldee, Septuagint and Vulgate and by most modern translations. Fry thinks the allusion is to a shepherd selecting out a portion of his flock. The same verb is applied to that matter in Ex. xii. 21. But the word draw is applied to drawing a bow, drawing in a yoke, drawing into a net, etc. The meaning is, Let not my life and portion be with the wicked, described as the workers of iniquity, a class of men well known in sacred writings, as given over to wickedness. See Ps. v. 5; vi. 8; xiv. 4. These are men which speak peace to their neighbors, but mischief is in their hearts. Every one of them is a fox, a serpent, a deceiver, a dissembler, an impostor, a pretender. Where is the worker of iniquity, who does not use guile, fraud, cunning, trick, artifice, intrigue, feigned words, smooth speeches? Nothing is more offensive to a pure mind than double dealing.

4. Give them according to their deeds, and according to the wickedness of their endeavours: give them after the work of their hands; render to them their desert. The verbs are in the imperative. See Introduction, § 6. For endeavours some read inventions as in Ps. cvi. 39; in all other cases it is works, or doings. It is right men should reap what they have sowed, and not something else. God would not be adorable, nor his government amiable were it otherwise. It is just, certain and published abroad that the incorrigibly wicked shall be condignly and terribly punished. The wicked are in a doleful condition, for so long as they are bent on sinning, they have the prayers of good men against them perpetually.

5. Because they regard not the works of the LORD, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up. This is a foretelling that cannot fail. A God-inspired prayer is as sure of an answer as a God-inspired prediction is of fulfilment. It made the case of these men more dreadful, that they despised divine judgments. Providences, however benignant or terrible, did not affect them. They were far gone in sin, Jer. v. 3.

6. Blessed be the LORD, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications. Blessed, see on Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46. The meaning is, Let him be proclaimed blessed. Let blessings be pronounced on him. He does not say how much he would have the Lord blessed. He is not afraid of excess in that matter. The reader will observe the connection between this and the second verse. There something is sought in prayer. Here the same thing is said to have been secured; thus fulfilling the promise: "And it shall come to pass that . . . while they are speaking, I will hear," Isa. lxv. 24. When we offer spiritual and hearty prayer, we know that deliverance or something better is not far distant.

7. The LORD is my strength and my shield. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2; xxi. 1, 13. Some versions use helper. Shield, sometimes buckler, the same as in Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10; xviii. 2; xxx. 35. Some versions have protector. That is good paraphrase, My heart trusted in him and I am helped. As in the preceding verse, so here he tells how promptly the desired aid was given. Those mercies of God which seem most seasonable cause the greatest gladness. He adds: Therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and with my song will I praise him. Alexander: "My heart is twice used in this sentence to express the deep and cordial nature of the exercises, which he is describing. The same heart that trusted now rejoices."

8. The LORD is their strength. Strength, as in v. 7. But to what does the word their refer. Calvin says to David's armies. But he had said nothing of armies. Some ancient versions borrow the word people from the next verse, and read, The Lord is the strength of his people. This is better. This Psalm has throughout respect to David as the head of the nation. And he is the saving strength of his anointed. To him Jehovah is saving strength, literally strength of salvations, implying completeness and perfection of deliverance. David was God's anointed to the kingdom, yet he must make his way to the actual possession of it through great perils and troubles. When one is satisfied of the lawfulness of his calling, this may animate him to hold fast his best hopes even in the darkest hours.

9. Save thy people and bless thine inheritance: feed them also, and lift them up for ever. In all ages God's people are his inheritance. Four things are here sought for them; 1. Deliverance and safety in the amplest sense of these terms; 2. Benediction, which, when it comes from God, is effectual; 3. Government and nourishment, such as good shepherds give their sheep; 4. Elevation above all foes, fears and perils to the possession of the most excellent inheritance and glory. All these are eternal, forever. The blessings of a temporal character sought under these terms are small compared with the spiritual good things thus desired.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Luther: "We may use the Psalm against tyrants and fanatical spirits; for in this way are tyrants and persecutors of the word wont to pretend peace in word, yet secretly plan counsels of slaughter and murder all the while."

2. Jehovah alone is the proper object of prayer, v. 1. He alone can always hear, help, see and save.

3. To a distressed soul nothing is so suitable as prayer, v. 1. What is here taught by example is in the New Testament taught by precept, Jas. v. 13.

4. Dickson: "A soul in great straits is not able to suspend and wait comfort long; it must have some comfortable answer, because of what God is to it by covenant," vv. 1, 2.

5. Does it not clearly prove prayer efficacious, that the practice is kept up and commended by the pious of each successive generation? Would this be done, if they had not power with God? If he never answered, would they always call on him? The superstitious and pharisaical pray for other reasons, one to feed a blind, fanatical zeal, the other to be seen of men. But the intelligent and devout ask, that they may receive a divine blessing.

6. It is as needful to believe prayer to be efficacious as it is to pray, v. 1. Any philosophy, or dogma, teaching us to doubt the efficacy of prayer is as hurtful as it is untrue.

7. When we pray aright we will be concerned to get an answer in peace, v. 1. Whoever leaves his prayer, as the ostrich leaves her egg in the sand, and cares no more for it, does not pray at all. When Elijah prayed for rain, he sent his servant to "look toward the sea," to see if it was coming. Scott: "While others are troubling their fellow-creatures with unavailing complaints; believers should, under distresses, cry the more earnestly to 'the Rock of their salvation:' and they should not rest till they have received some satisfactory token that their prayers are heard; for if the Lord could refuse to answer them, their case would resemble that of those who have perished in their sins, to whose agonizing cries no gracious answer will be made forever." Men can be in no worse state than to be where prayer is not heard.

8. It is no hindrance, but a help to have a sense of utter personal helplessness, v. 1. Boasted ability does nothing, while humility, relying on infinite strength, does wonders.

9. Prayer must be earnest and vehement. Every sacrifice was offered with fire. We must cry to the Lord, v. 1. We must pray with groanings that cannot be uttered. Heartless petitions avail not. We must use the voice of supplications, v. 2. David "was so stricken with anxiety and fear, that he prayed not coldly, but with burning vehement desire, like those who, under the pressure of grief, vehemently cry out."

10. The Scriptures attach no importance to posture or gesture in prayer, v. 2. One lifts up his hands and eyes to heaven. Another does not so much as lift up his eyes to heaven. Hezekiah turns his face to the wall, and Isaac walks in the fields. It is not the attitude or gestures of the body that please God. In public prayer our postures should be reverent. We are at liberty to stand or kneel as may be most convenient. If one posture is found more favorable to devotion than another, that should be adopted.

11. As the ancient oracle was a type of Christ, to which devout worshippers looked, so must we look to our Saviour alone. Let it be our unceasing joy that Jesus has "gone, not into the earthly places made by hands, which were only the figures of the true; but into heaven itself, there to appear in the presence of God for us." Glorious Redeemer! Gracious Intercessor! Kind Saviour! We owe thee all.

12. In all ages the pious have been afraid of being numbered and punished with the wicked, v. 3. To them nothing is more alarming or repulsive. In Ps. xxvi. we had the prayer, Gather not my soul with sinners. Here we have it, Draw me not away with the wicked. To this state of mind many blessings are secured. One is well stated by Henry: "Those that are careful not to partake with sinners in their sins, have reason to hope that they shall not partake with them in their plagues," Rev. xviii. 4.

13. Candor is an essential quality in a good character. The want of it vitiates everything, and marks a man as belonging to the class of evil doers, v. 3. There is a good sense in which "an honest man is the noblest work of God" on earth—a man who does to others as he would have others do to him; a man who gives his Maker the praise, honor, service and homage which are his due; a man who would die before he would knowingly rob God or defraud man; a man who would rather be imposed on a thousand times than do one act of injustice. Such a man, in gold or in rags, in prison or in state, is the noblest specimen of all God's works on earth.

14. Many as are the infirmities of the righteous, they do not make a trade of sin; they are not workers of iniquity, v. 3. The Bible method of determining character is brief, but clear and decisive: "He that doeth righteousness is righteous; he that committeth sin is of the devil."

15. Truly the wicked are making sad work for themselves, v. 4. If there is not a speedy and powerful change in their characters, there is neither man nor angel who can adequately describe or conceive the misery and horror of their doom. As the sins of Korah, Absalom, Belshazzar, Judas and Herod naturally produced the dreadful ends of these men, so shall all unrepented sin, however secret or popular, infallibly bring its subjects to a doom frightful to contemplate, and the more frightful the more it is contemplated.

16. God is just. God is righteous, v. 4. "He practises the jus talionis according to his own righteousness. Justice reverberates: the unrighteous blow which I aim at another recoils, according to the moral government of the world, back upon myself."

17. Retribution shall be not only for what men shall have actually accomplished, but for what they shall have endeavored to effect, v. 4.

18. When neither favoring events of providence, nor God's terrible judgments duly affect men, damnation is at the door, v. 5. Let every honest man ask himself: Under providences do I behave as sinners behave?

19. If the wicked in a Gospel land are not converted from their sins to God, it will not be for want of many events suited to make them regard the operations of God's hands and the intimations of his will, especially as they are set forth in his blessed word, v. 5.

20. Every believer has abundant cause for blessing and praising God, vv. 6, 7. When he thinks of all God has been, is, and ever shall be to him, of all that God has done, is doing, and ever shall be doing for him, of the ills he has escaped, and the good things he is authorized to hope for, how can his laudings of the Almighty be excessive?

21. The life of every good man should abound in joy and rejoicing. In the past, in the present, in the future, in God, in his ways, in ten thousand things are proper and abundant themes of gladness. This should not show itself in the "frantic mirth" and wild revelry so agreeable to sinners; but in the holy gladness of chastened and trustful minds.

22. However sad the case and dark the mind of the genuine believer may at any time be, better days are coming; compare vv. 1, 2, 7, 8. The longest night has its morning dawn. Morison: "The scene of sorrow and persecution shall be exchanged for the bright shining of a day alike cloudless and serene. The wailings of penitence shall be succeeded by the sweet consciousness of forgiving mercy; the sorrowing of affliction shall usher in a long day of joy and prosperity; and the cry of oppressed innocence shall bring down upon some guilty head the ministers of divine wrath."

23. What God is to one saint he is to all saints, vv. 7, 8. This shall never cease to be so. This affords abundant cause of being glad whenever it goes well with others. Henry: "The saints rejoice in their friends' comforts as well as their own; for as we have not the less benefit from the light of the sun, so neither from the light of God's countenance, for others' sharing therein; for we are sure there is enough for all, and enough for each. This is our communion with all saints, that God is their strength and ours; Christ, their Lord and ours," 1 Cor. i. 2.

24. If men, who seem at a loss for language in prayer, would carefully study the Scriptures, and store their minds with the words of the Holy Ghost, they would soon have a delightful copiousness and comprehensiveness in their petitions, v. 9.

25. So great are the privileges and so abundant the blessings of God's saints that a complete schedule of them would contain no small part of the entire word of God, v. 9. Christian, as you can, make an inventory of your mercies and blessings, and so be prepared to give thanks.

26. Ought not all rulers to pray for their people? David prayed for his, v. 9.

27. In praying for his subjects David also prayed for Zion, v. 9. Let us imitate so good an example. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem."

28. Henry: "Those and those only, whom God feeds and rules, who are willing to be taught, and guided, and governed by him, shall be saved, and blessed, and lifted up forever."

29. As David, a type of Christ, was delivered and so was able to bless his friends, who had stuck to him in adversity; so Christ having overcome all his enemies, is able to bless forever his friends, who have followed him through good report and through evil report. Yea, as he overcame, so shall we. As he has sat down on his throne, so shall we. Here we may have howlings; in heaven, we shall have hallelujahs.

30. How diverse the tastes, fears, hopes and minds of saints and sinners. No wicked man allows his mind to dwell on the words for ever without pain; while to the Christian eternity never seems too long for him to speak his Maker's praise, enjoy his Saviour's love, and drink at the fountains of unfailing bliss.

PSALM XXIX.

A Psalm of David.

1 Give unto the LORD, O ye mighty, give unto the LORD glory and strength.

2 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name; worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness.

3 The voice of the LORD is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the LORD is upon many waters.

4 The voice of the LORD is powerful; the voice of the LORD is full of majesty.

5 The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars; yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

6 He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.

7 The voice of the LORD divideth the flames of fire.

8 The voice of the LORD shaketh the wilderness; the LORD shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.

9 The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests: and in his temple doth every one speak of his glory.

10 The LORD sitteth upon the flood; yea, the LORD sitteth King for ever.

11 The LORD will give strength unto his people; the LORD will bless his people with peace.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii.

The Vulgate and Doway add to the title these words: At the finishing of the tabernacle, meaning, no doubt, the new tabernacle, which David built for the ark and the other signs of God's presence, 2 Sam. vi. 17. This addition seems to have no higher authority than the conjecture of Jerome and Augustine. The Arabic reads: A prophecy concerning the incarnation, the ark and the tabernacle. There is nothing to support this, except that Kimchi refers this Psalm to the times of Messiah. Nor is there anything to support the reading of the Syriac: Concerning the oblation. The Septuagint and Ethiopic add to the common title these words: At the going out of the tabernacle, i. e., of the feast of tabernacles or booths. In Lev. xxiii. 36; Num. xxix. 35, the Septuagint renders the Hebrew word (which we translate assembly) a going out, an exit, or exodus. This was on the eighth day of the feast; and Maimonides says "that every day of the days of that feast they said a peculiar song for the addition of the day; and on the first of the working days of the solemn feast they said Psalm xxix." This addition to the title had therefore the usage of the Jews, but is of no other authority. It never was in the Hebrew text.

That David wrote this Psalm is asserted in the title and is generally admitted.

Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. 1019. David died 1014 years before Christ, so according to Clarke this Psalm was written but five years before his death; according to Scott, twenty-six. Expositors have spoken confidently, yet diversely as to the occasion of this Psalm. Clarke: "It was probably written to commemorate the abundant rain which fell in the days of David, after the heavens had been shut up for three years, 2 Sam. xxi. 1-10;" Patrick: "This Psalm seems to have been composed by David after some extraordinary great thunder, lightning and rain: (whereby it is probable) God had so discomfited his enemies, and put their forces into such disorder, that he easily got the victory over them." With him agrees Dodd, who cites attention to the history given in 2 Sam. viii. in illustration. Pool favors the same view; and Morison mentions it with respect. Mudge is decidedly of the same opinion.

After his return from Palestine McCheyne gave to Dr. James Hamilton of London an interpretation of this Psalm, drawn from the natural scenery and the course of storms in the mountains of that land. Dr. Hamilton has given it to the world. And in the Works of McCheyne, vol. I. pp. 260-264 we have McCheyne's own statement of the whole matter. He says that in this Psalm "the strength of Jehovah is celebrated; and the exemplification of it is evidently taken from a thunder-storm in Lebanon." Whatever may be thought of the correctness of this view, none can read either of these writers without being struck with the exceedingly great beauty of the illustrations offered, and of the exquisite taste displayed in the method of presenting it. It is accessible to all, and need not be here transcribed.

But Hengstenberg says: "There is no ground for the idea that the Psalm was occasioned by the sight of a thunder-storm. 'The freshness of the painting, the vigorous conceptions, and the rapid transition of the whole' will give rise to this view only when low ideas are entertained of the power of poetry;" Alexander: "The superficial notion that this Psalm is merely a description of a thunder-storm, or of Jehovah as the God of thunder, may be corrected by observing that the last verse gives the key-note to the whole composition."

Calvin's view is still different: "David, that he may humble all men before God, from the highest to the lowest, celebrates his terrible power in the various wonders of nature, which he affirms are not less fitted to arouse us to give glory to God, than if he were to assert his empire and majesty with his own voice. After he has struck fear into the proud, who are reluctant to yield, and addressed an exhortation to them accompanied by a gentle reproof, he sweetly invites the faithful voluntarily to fear the Lord."

Between these conflicting views the reader must judge for himself. Perhaps he may reject them all. Why may not verses 1, 2, as well set forth the aim of the author as verses 10, 11?

The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and El God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4.

1. Give unto the LORD, O ye mighty. This rendering is substantially and fully supported by Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Anderson, Hengstenberg and Alexander: only Ainsworth has, sons of the mighties; and Edwards, ye great ones. By the mighty the Chaldee, Hengstenberg and Alexander understand angels; several others, great men, princes. Doubtless the command is to all creatures, who bear the awful name of gods, Ps. lxxxii. 6; John x. 34; or of mighty ones, Ps. lxxxix. 7; Ezek. xxxii. 21. There is no reason for confining it to angels. The call is to give, yield, render, ascribe something to God. The Septuagint and kindred versions have rams, or the offspring of rams. This requires but a slight change in the original. But there is nothing to support it. The next clause states what is to be ascribed to God: Give unto the LORD glory and strength. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate and Doway read glory and honor; Arabic, glory and veneration; church of England, worship and strength; Amesius, glory and praise; Fry, glory and power; Alexander, honor and strength. The Chaldee, Calvin, Venema, Ainsworth, Edwards and Jebb support the English. Glory, so rendered in Ps. iii. 3; iv. 2; viii. 5; and honor in Ps. vii. 5; xxvi. 8. The second word is in the common version always rendered strength or power, Ps. viii. 2; xxi. 1; lix. 16; lxiii. 2. The import of the verse is well given by Clarke: "Ascribe all excellence and might to him;" and by Diodati: "Let there be no greatness nor height in the world, that doth not humble itself before the great and terrible God."

2. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name. Literally it is the glory of his name. The sense is glory worthy of his name, glory belonging to his name. The common version is good. The name of God is all that by which he has made himself known. See Ps. v. 11; vii. 17; viii. 1. The repetition of the same word Give three times shows the urgency of the duty enjoined. The meaning of the preceding verse and of this clause is further evinced by the next clause: Worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. The Chaldee: Worship before the Lord in the beauty of holiness; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate: Worship the Lord in his holy court; Arabic: Worship the Lord in his holy habitation; Syriac: Worship the Lord in the court of his holiness; church of England: Worship the Lord with holy worship; Calvin: Worship before Jehovah in the brightness of his sanctuary; Venema: Worship Jehovah in the glorious beauty of holiness; Amesius: Bow yourselves down, thus manifesting honor to Jehovah in the beauty of holiness; Ainsworth: Bow down yourselves to Jehovah, in the comely honor of the sanctuary; Edwards: Prostrate yourselves before Jehovah in the magnificent sanctuary; Street and Fry: Worship Jehovah with holy reverence; Hengstenberg: Adore the Lord in holy attire; Alexander: Bow to Jehovah in beauty of holiness. The verb rendered worship is the same that in the second commandment and often elsewhere is rendered bow down, Ex. xx. 5; Deut. v. 9; Ps. xcv. 6. It is sometimes rendered do obeisance, Ex. xviii. 7; 2 Sam. i. 2; xv. 5. When applied to God, the Doway generally renders it adore. In our version the more common rendering is worship. That religious worship is here intended is certain. Besides the various renderings of the last phrase already noticed, Boothroyd offers two readings both of which differ from our version: In holy splendor, or With holy reverence; Green, In his beautiful sanctuary; Horsley, In the pomp of holiness. Neither of these, nor any of those previously noticed is any improvement on the English version. We have the same phrase beauty of holiness elsewhere, 1 Chron. xvi. 29; Ps. xcvi. 9. See also 2 Chron. xx. 21. The margin of our version reads In his glorious sanctuary. The great ones of earth are never more properly employed than in humbling themselves before God, and in adoring his excellent majesty. One of the best specimens of such worship we have in Dan. iv. 34-37. The great sin of rulers is forgetfulness of God, and a refusal to give him the glory, which is his due. These lead to all their worst errors and crimes.

3. The voice of the LORD is upon the waters. The voice of the Lord frequently in this Psalm seems to mean thunder, at least in its connection with lightning and the usual accompaniments of storm. The very next clause of this verse seems so to explain it. In several parts of Scripture the phrase has this sense, Job xxxvii. 4, 5; xl. 9; Ps. xviii. 13; Isa. xxx. 30. The waters are not merely or chiefly the rivers and seas, but also the clouds, which are full of waters; and so we read of "the waters which are above the firmament," Gen. i. 7. See also Job xxxvi. 28; Ps. xviii. 11; lxxvii. 17; Jer. x. 13. God's voice is or was high in the heavens, even above the clouds. The effect of all the sublimities of a thunder storm on the human mind, especially when it has been very bold in error and wickedness, has been long and much spoken of: Ex. ix. 27-29. Calvin and Henry both refer to the celebrated ode of Horace, which speaks of the effect of thunder and lightning on men. God's voice may be heard in all nature. But the mass of men seem not to stand in awe of him till he speaks in thunder. Then Volney is on his knees like other guilty sinners, pleading for mercy. The Psalmist tells us what his meaning is. The God of glory [the glorious God] thundereth. Philosophize as we may respecting these amazing natural phenomena, they are wondrous and awful exhibitions of the power and majesty of God himself, the God of glory. Modern science divests a storm of none of its terrors. The LORD is upon many waters. In the storm there is a presiding God, and he is Jehovah. Calvin: "The very figures which he uses, sufficiently declare that David's design was to subdue by fear the obstinacy which yields not willingly otherwise. Thrice he repeats that God's voice is heard in great and violent tempests, and in the subsequent verse he adds, that it is full of power and majesty."

4. The voice of the LORD is powerful. Several ancient and some modern versions for powerful read in [or with] power and strength; others, very powerful; church of England, mighty in operation; Hengstenberg, power; Ainsworth, with able power. None of these are better than the common version. David adds: The voice of the LORD is full of majesty. The Chaldee, Calvin and Amesius, for full of majesty have, in beauty: Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, in magnificence; Arabic, with a vast glittering brightness; Syriac, with glory; church of England, a glorious voice; Venema, very magnificent; Edwards, majestic; Hengstenberg, majesty. The last Hebrew noun is in Ps. viii. 5, rendered honor; in Ps. xxi. 5, majesty. So terrible is thunder that many great beasts on land, and even some sea-monsters are said to be still, as if in awe of their Maker's voice.

5. The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars. Like the moderns, the ancients did not in common parlance nicely distinguish between thunder and lightning. Thunder-struck is still a good word in our language, although we all know that it is the lightning which strikes, thunder being mere sound. The power of lightning is simply and absolutely inconceivable; "enormous cedars are shivered and scattered by it in a moment." No substance known to us is in strength a match for it. Yet it is not an independent agent. It is the voice, the messenger of Jehovah, and so he adds: Yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. For ages men have heard of the majestic cedars of the ancient and fertile mountain of Lebanon which may still be seen. For their natural history see Bible Dictionaries.

6. He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn. Some refer them to the cedars of Lebanon just mentioned; but others regard them as used by anticipation for Lebanon and Sirion. This seems to accord with Scripture usage, Ps. cxiv. 4, 6. Some of the best commentators give this sense. Calvin: He maketh Lebanon to skip like a calf, and Sirion like a young unicorn; Green:

He maketh Lebanon to skip like a calf,
And Sirion like a young unicorn.

Edwards: He made Lebanon to skip like a calf, and Sirion like a young oryx. Others favor the same reading. Perhaps it is better than the common version. Still better is that of Amesius: The voice of the Lord causes that Lebanon and Sirion leap as a calf, as a young unicorn. The language is that of bold hyperbole. It seems as if the mountains were tossed with the tempest. The Septuagint is not good: He shall beat them small. Like Alps, Lebanon signifies white; its top being covered with snow at all seasons. It was famous in the literature of Judea. Sirion is the Sidonian name of Shenir or Hermon, sometimes also called Sion, Deut. iii. 8, 9; Cant. iv. 8; Josh. xiii. 11; Ps. cxxxiii. 3. Unicorn, see on Ps. xxii. 21.

7. The voice of the LORD divideth the flames of fire. For divideth it is best to read strieth or strieth out. God's voice strikes terrible flames from the clouds. Calvin: "This is done when the vapors, being struck, as it were, with his hammer, burst forth into lightnings and thunderbolts." Horsley: The voice of the Lord strieth out the forked flame of fire. This is better than Hengstenberg's: The voice of the Lord heweth with flame of fire.

8. The voice of the LORD shaketh the wilderness; the LORD shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh. Shaketh, puts into anguish, makes to travail. The verse speaks of but one wilderness, that of Kadesh, or Kedesh. From its geographical position McCheyne thinks Kadesh-Naphtali is meant. See Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 32. It was one of the cities of refuge. There was also a Kadesh in the tribe of Issachar, 1 Chron. vi. 72. There was also Kadesh some twenty miles from Hebron on the border of the wilderness of Paran. Moses speaks of it as in the "uttermost border of Edom," Num. xx. 16. Lightfoot thinks Miriam died there. From this place Moses sent spies into Caaaan. Beyond this place south and east lay the great wilderness of Zin, over which tempests swept with terrible power. This was probably the tract of country referred to in this verse. If by the voice of the Lord we understand his power, as some do, we may include not only tempests but also earthquakes which have long been the terror of Syria. That at Aleppo in 1822 is still remembered.

9. The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve. This rendering agrees with the Chaldee and with the Genevan translation. Syriac: The voice of the Lord which shaketh the boughs. This is poor. Lowth, Secker, Dimock, Green, Horsley and Fry: The voice of the Lord maketh the oaks to tremble. To this there are three objections: 1. It requires a change of the Hebrew text, which ought to be received as correct, if the manuscripts agree. 2. It omits all reference to the effect of storms and convulsions on the denizens of the forest. 3. It presents a specimen of the art of sinking. The oaks of Palestine are small compared with the cedars of Lebanon. We therefore confidently recur to hinds. Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: The voice of the Lord prepareth [or which prepareth] the stags; John Rogers' translation: The voyce of the Lorde moveth the hyndes; Edwards: The voice of Jehovah terrified the hinds; Bishops' Bible: The voyce of the Lord maketh the hinds to bring forth yong. This and the common version are virtually sustained by Calvin, Amesius, Dathe, Clarke, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Ainsworth: The voice of the Lord maketh the hinds tremblingly to travail. These expositions are given: 1. That as hinds bring forth their young with great difficulty (see Job xxxix. 1, 3,) the fright of the storm aids them in calving. 2. That the agitation produced by the storm sometimes makes them cast out their young prematurely. This falls in with the figurative language of the context. 3. That God's power, expressed by his voice, causes those changes, by which the forest is kept full of inhabitants. 4. The verb in this verse is the same as shaketh in v. 8; i. e., putteth in pain, terrifieth. This agrees with the scope of the Psalm. And discovereth [strippeth, maketh bare] the forests. This may be done either by stripping the leaves and branches from the trees, or by destroying the animals, or by driving them to their dens, and leaving the forest without living inhabitants. Chaldee: The animals flee to the wood. And in his temple doth every one speak of his glory. Four explanations are given: 1. While storms are thus raging in Lebanon and in the wilderness, a very different scene is witnessed in the temple at Jerusalem. There every one is crying, Glory. 2. The whole frame of nature is the temple or palace of God and all his works proclaim his glory. This is a bold and beautiful conception, though rather western than oriental. 3. By his temple some understand the church of God. Calvin: "God's voice fills the whole world and spreads itself to its farthest limits; but the prophet declares that his glory is celebrated only in his church, because God not only speaks intelligibly and distinctly there, but also there gently allures the faithful to himself." The church of God is preëminently his temple, Eph. ii. 21. There, says Gill, the saints "dwell and speak of the glory of God, of his divine perfections, and of his works of creation and providence; and of the glory of the person of Christ, and salvation by him; and of the glorious work of grace begun in their souls by the blessed Spirit." 4. Others think that the temple is the temple not made with hands, even heaven itself, where all that are truly good and great, the sons of God, thrones and powers, dominions and principalities, even every one of the blessed inhabitants of that better world praise the Lord. So the Chaldee: And in his sanctuary which is above all his ministers sing glory before him. If but one of these views be accepted, perhaps it should be the third. But neither of them necessarily excludes allusion to the others. The lower may point to the higher; and the higher imply the lower. Hengstenberg's rendering is beautiful and literal: And in his temple everything says, Glory.

10. The LORD sitteth upon the flood. The word rendered flood is found only here and about a dozen times in Genesis. In every place but this it certainly points to the Noachic deluge. It is not safe to apply it to anything else. The Hebrew verb is in the preterite, sat. It is so rendered by the Chaldee, Edwards, Hengstenberg, Ainsworth and Alexander. Venema has presided over. The prophet here reminds all great ones that the Lord whom they are called to fear and serve, is the awful God, who presided over the deluge, and who of course manages the lesser commotions of the elements, clouds, lightnings, thunders, winds, torrents of waters and earthquakes. In the deluge, Jehovah showed his power to destroy his foes, and to save alive his friends. The apostle of the circumcision refers to the deluge for the same purpose, 2 Pet. iii. 5, 6. Yea, the LORD sitteth King forever. Chaldee: He sat also upon the seat of mercy, and delivered Noah, and reigneth over his sons forever; Septuagint and kindred versions: The Lord shall sit King forever; Alexander thus paraphrases the verse: "The God, whose voice now produces these effects, is the God who sat enthroned upon the deluge, and this same God is still reigning over nature and the elements, and will be able to control them forever."

11. The LORD will give strength unto his people; the LORD will bless his people with peace. Chaldee: The Lord gave a law to his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace. For strength the Syriac has courage. By strength is to be understood all that is necessary to sustain life. To give peace is to make existence happy and desirable. To bless with peace is the strongest kind of phrase indicating the divine favor. This reminds one of the blessing pronounced by Aaron and his sons, Num. vi. 24-26.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Right affections will find matter of adoration and praise in all the works of God, in all the aspects of nature. If "an undevout astronomer is mad," so is an undevout meteorologist, or geologist, or sailor, or warrior, or artisan, or husbandman. God is everywhere. His wonders are everywhere. All but the blind or perverse see and worship.

2. No creature, however exalted, is too high to acknowledge his absolute dependence on God for all that has given him either honor or power, glory or strength, v. 1. What hast thou that thou hast not received? is the universal and awful challenge.

3. Dickson: "Of all men, princes should be most careful to glorify God, and yet it is most rare to see them humble themselves before him." To this duty they are loudly called by the multitude of their blessings, and the solemnity of their account. "To whom much is given, of him shall much be required." But earthly potentates are greatly tempted by their high station, by the flatteries of courtiers, and by the corruptions of the natural heart, which rejects God's easy reign.

4. Nor is there any danger that man or angel in the worship of God will exceed due bounds in ardor, humility or reverence, v. 1. Absolutely all perfection should be ascribed to him, who made us. Right worship is founded on the divine nature. To God belong glory and strength, every excellence in an infinite degree.

5. It is as right that God should have all his dues as that men or angels should have theirs, v. 2. To deny God's rights is most dangerous; nor should we pay him merely a part and not the whole of what he claims. He is infinitely amiable, and so should be unspeakably loved; he is infinitely powerful and majestic, and so is entitled to the most awful reverence.

6. We have made but little progress in religion till we see that there is a transcendent beauty in holiness, v. 2. There is no beauty like that, because it is the beauty of the Lord, and makes us like him. The superiority of angels over devils consists preëminently in the purity of the former and the corruption of the latter. Let our worship be to God, to God alone, offered just as commanded, and full of humility, simplicity, reverence and confidence.

7. God should be recognized in all the works of his hands, both in creation and providence, in the greatest and in the least things, in the uniform and in the unusual course of nature, in the waters above the earth and under the earth, in the calm and in the storm, when he thundereth, v. 3.

8. It is very marvellous that all sinners do not foresee and bewail the terrors that shall overtake them. If the thunder of God's power moves them so mightily here, can they hope to be unshaken in the day of wrath? v. 3. Experience shows that none are more easily overwhelmed with terror than those poor deluded souls, who commonly in the land of peace affect the greatest contempt of God and of heavenly things.

9. If men were governed by right affections and right reason, the standing works of creation, the clear, calm sky, the gentle zephyr would as truly and profitably impress them as the most terrific exhibitions of omnipotence in tempests and earthquakes. It is proof that unregenerate men are dreadfully depraved that they seldom wake up to a lively sense of the divine existence, except when some sad reverse, or awful accident, or terrific phenomenon startles them. "The thunder or the eclipse will move more than the making of heaven and earth."

10. It is fit that mercy should speak in notes of love and tenderness, while it is as fit that the revelations of wrath should be in tones of terror, v. 3. "If men will not listen to the still small voice of God's love, they shall be compelled to hear him in accents of thunder."

11. The evidences of the resistless power of God furnished in nature, particularly in the violent agitations of the earth and air, should satisfy every man that nothing will be easier than to accomplish the most terrible works of vengeance ever threatened, vv. 4-9. When God thundered, the emperor Caligula used to go and hide himself under his bed; and when God shall utter his last thunders, sinners will call to the rocks and the mountains, Fall on us and hide us from the wrath of the Lamb. God can easily bring about all the terrors of the last day.

12. He who commands the lightning, can rule anything, v. 7. It is a glorious truth both of natural and revealed religion, that nothing is too hard for God. Omnipotence is never balked.

13. If God's voice in nature is so powerful, we should naturally expect that his word in revelation would be mighty. And it is a fire and a hammer to break in pieces the flinty rock. Scott: "The voice of the divine law, if duly attended to, would fill the consciences of sinners with more terror and amazement than all the convulsions in nature; and the effects of the word of God, when attended by the operations of his Holy Spirit, are far greater upon the souls of men than that of thunder in the material world. By its energy the stoutest are made to tremble, the proudest are abased, the secrets of the heart are detected, sinners are converted; and the savage, the sensual, and the unclean become harmless, gentle and pure, resembling doves and lambs," Heb. iv. 12.

14. Great dread of thunder and lightning does not always prove one worse than his neighbors. Tornados, earthquakes and shattered nerves are not subject either to reason or piety. In many cases education has much to do with our agitations in times of terrible tempest. Yet pious people may safely remember that he who rides upon the storm and manages the seas, is their reconciled God and their heavenly Father. He will do all things well. "The children need not fear their Father's voice when he speaks in anger to his enemies." Let the saints never be afraid with any amazement.

15. No part of the earth, its centre or circumference, is hidden from God, or uncared for by him. The "great and terrible wilderness" is his, and is as much the abode of his essential presence as any part of creation, v. 8. To gracious souls the howling wilderness or barren islet has often been like heaven on earth, Gen. xxviii. 17; Rev. i. 9, 10.

16. The analogy between nature and revelation and between God's natural and moral government, should long since have satisfied mankind that everything threatening evil to those who incur the penalty of the divine laws, shall surely come to pass, vv. 5-8. It is monstrous that men should so study second causes as to forget him who is the sole Author of universal nature.

17. If man has a heart to learn, he can never be in want of a teacher. All nature has lessons for him, vv. 3-9. Some are startling, more are quiet and gentle. The best lessons are often given in the gentlest tones. Wo to him who sees, and hears, and feels, and cares for nothing of all that occurs around him.

18. Yet God's most glorious utterances are in, by, through and to his church, with her worship, doctrines and discipline, v. 9. So teach the Scriptures expressly, Eph. iii. 10.

19. We have the highest authority for the highest acts of worship, even adoration and praise, v. 9. To this very end the church was constituted.

20. The wicked of almost every age have found peculiar delight in deriding the judgments of God, especially in the deluge; but there is awful evidence that over that great event in our world God presided, v. 10. Nor can men ever set aside the terrors of that catastrophe except by terribly playing the fool.

21. God's government is fixed. It cannot be subverted, v. 10. Empires rise and decline, fall or vanish away, but his kingdom changes not. Others are sometimes strong and sometimes weak; but his possesses all vigor and might, world without end. It endures forever. It includes all duration and all worlds. Even the waste of waters, on which are seen no footprints of man or angel, proclaims there is a God, who sitteth King forever.

22. It is by God and by God alone that we live. All our strength is from him, v. 11. This is true of the natural life of all; it is delightfully true of the spiritual life of the saints. Arnd: "This is glorious consolation against the contempt and persecutions of poor Christians, the little flock, which has no outward protection in the world, no outward strength. But the Holy Ghost imparts consolation, and says, the world shall not give strength and power to the church, but the Lord; as King Hezekiah comforted himself when he said, 'With them is an arm of flesh, but with us is the Lord of hosts;' and John, 'He who is in us is greater than he who is in the world.'"

23. The reconciliation between God and his people is perfect. The consequence is necessarily peace, v. 11. And peace with God cannot fail to be followed by salvation. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "Great peace have they that love thy law; and nothing shall offend them."

PSALM XXX.

A Psalm and Song at the dedication of the house of David.

1 I will extol thee, O LORD; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me.

2 O LORD my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me.

3 O LORD, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave: thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit.

4 Sing unto the LORD, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

5 For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

6 And in my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved.

7 LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong: thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled.

8 I cried to thee, O LORD; and unto the LORD I made supplication.

9 What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?

10 Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me: LORD, be thou my helper.

11 Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness;

12 To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee, and not be silent. O LORD my God, I will give thanks unto thee for ever.

THE views respecting the design and occasion of this ode are these: 1. That it was written long after the time of David, for the dedication of the second temple, and was used on that occasion. This conjecture is set aside by the title. 2. That it was prophetically prepared for the dedication of the first temple. This cannot be proven, nor is it probable. 3. Calvin, Diodati, Grotius, Patrick and Gill think it was written after the death of Absalom, and David's return to his palace, 2 Sam. xx. 3. Morison quite rejects this opinion. 4. Some think it was made to celebrate recovery from some dangerous illness. So Mudge and Horne. To confine it to this is contrary to the title. 5. Theodoret and Horsley make the Psalm mystical; the former regarding the house as that reared by Messiah, and maintaining that it treats of the restoration of human nature by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; the latter referring the whole to the days of Messiah and the spiritual condition of the church. He esteems "the sickness, that of the soul, in consequence of the fall; the recovery, that of the soul by redemption." 6. Bellarmine, Chandler, Bouchier, Williams and others think this Psalm was used at the dedication of David's own palace, built by the liberality and artizans of Hiram, 2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Chron. xiv. 1. This well agrees with the common rendering of the title and with the pious usages of the Jews, Deut. xx. 5. It is much less objectionable than either of the preceding. It was while dwelling in this house that David expressed the pious sentiments found in 2 Sam. vii. 2. 7. The best view is that this Psalm was composed for the dedication of the altar in the threshing floor of Araunah, or Ornan on Mount Moriah, the site of the temple, 2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25; 1 Chron. xxi. 18-30. David expressly calls it the house of the LORD God, 1 Chron. xxii. 1. An edifice is not necessary to the being of a house of God, Gen. xxviii. 22. The old tabernacle was now in Gibeon, and could neither be visited nor be brought to Zion, 1 Chron. xxi. 29, 30. This service at the threshing floor God accepted by the usual token—fire from heaven. This view well suits the contents of the Psalm. It is approved by Venema, Calmet, Dathe, Clarke, Morison, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. It requires a different rendering of the title. But this can be made without any difficulty. Alexander's rendering is: A Psalm. A Song of Dedication (for) the House. By David. Tholuck's is better: A Psalm and Song of David at the dedication of the Temple. Hammond admits that the house points to the sanctuary, although he prefers the view next preceding. The Chaldee refers it to the dedication of the house of the sanctuary. If this is correct, it cuts off those previously stated, also all belief that it relates to the persecutions of Saul, etc. Nor does the title refer to the tune but to the occasion of the Psalm. For numbering the people God sent the pestilence, and it swept away many, till at the intercession of David and his elders, God bade the angel of death sheathe his sword. On the spot, where mercy was revealed, David reared the altar. The title therefore aids us in interpreting the Psalm. Hengstenberg: "This Psalm affords a very remarkable proof of the correctness and originality of the titles."

Some of these poems bear the name, A Psalm; some, A Song; some, A Psalm and Song, or Psalm-Song; and some, A Song and Psalm, or Song-Psalm. Diodati thinks that the double name implies that both voice and instruments were to be employed when the ode was used in the temple service; that when we have Psalm-song, the instruments preceded the voice; when Song-Psalm, the voice had precedence. But this is conjecture, or at best vague tradition. Luther: "This is a remarkable Psalm and truly Davidical." David's authorship is generally admitted. Scott dates it B. C. 1021; Clarke, 1017. It was written in David's old age. In style it is very terse and elegant, abounding in lofty sentiments of devotion. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. I will extol thee, O LORD. Extol, often elsewhere exalt, Ex. xv. 2; Ps. cxviii. 28; Isa. xxv. 1. It is equivalent to highly praise. Horsley reads, Hast brought me low; but the verb never means to depress. In Ex. ii. 16, 19, it is applied to drawing water. God had brought him out of a horrible pit. Rogers: Thou hast drawn me up as it were out of a dungeon. And hast not made my foes to rejoice over me. Their malignant hopes perished. This verse is an introduction to the whole Psalm. It celebrates deliverance from sore calamity pressing, and worse impending. David's use of the pronoun I and me does not discourage the idea that he refers to the sin of numbering the people, the consequent plague, and the merciful deliverance from it; for he distinctly said: "Lo, I have sinned, I have done wickedly; but these sheep what have they done," 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. The wicked always rejoiced when David erred or fell into any trouble, 2 Sam. xii. 14.

2. O LORD my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me. Cried, the word used by Jonah to describe his distress and earnestness in prayer when in the fish's belly, Jonah ii. 2. See also Ps. xviii. 6; xxii. 24. We know how earnest and humble was David's prayer for the removal of the plague, when he and the elders of Israel besought God to show mercy, 1 Chron. xxi. 16, 17. Tholuck: "The words 'to heal' and 'to build' are used in the Old Testament to denote any kind of healing. David tottered when his kingdom tottered." Healing is applied to converting a wicked heart, Isa. vi. 10; to repairing breaches, Ps. lx. 2; to recovering men from religious declension, Jer. iii. 22; to comforting the sorrowful, Ps. cxlvii. 3; to making whole a broken vessel, Jer. xix. 11. Calvin: "It may properly enough mean here any deliverance." Preservations and deliverances are none the less pleasing and powerful, when they are manifestly from God, as in this case. David had seen the angel of the LORD standing between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem; and from the lips of the same angel by the mouth of Gad he had received a message of mercy from the Lord, 1 Chron. xxi. 16, 18. None but God had brought deliverance to him and to Israel. Although David did not die, yet his life was threatened:

3. O LORD, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave. Grave elsewhere pit, hell, and often grave, Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17; xvi. 10; Job xvii. 16. Our translation agrees well with the ancient versions. Amesius: Jehovah, thou hast brought my soul out of the sepulchre; Fry: Thou hast brought up my soul from the abode of the dead; Horne: Thou hast brought up my animal frame from the grave; Green: Thou didst bring up my life, O Lord, from the grave. The next phrase is of like import: Thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit. The Chaldee: Thou hast strengthened me, that I might not descend into the pit. Others read, Thou hast brought me to life, Thou didst recover me, Thou hast quickened me, etc. On the word pit see on Ps. vii. 15; xxviii. 1. It is sometimes rendered a well, a cistern, a dungeon, but oftener a pit. John Rogers' translation thus gives the whole verse: Thou Lord hast brought my soul out of hell: thou hast kept my life, whereas they go down to the pytte; Bishops' Bible: Thou Lorde hast brought my soul out of hell: thou hast kept my life from them that go down into the pit; Genevan translation: O Lord, thou hast brought up my soule out of the grave: thou hast revived mee from them that go downe into the pit. Calvin: "David reckoned that he could not sufficiently express in words the magnitude of the favor which God had conferred upon him, unless he compared the darkness of that period to the grave and the pit." By a sense of his sin and folly, by an apprehension of the terrible justice of God, by an overwhelming depression of mind at the loss of so many of his people, and perhaps by feeling the symptoms of the terrible pestilence in his own body he had for a time been led to account himself as a dead man. But God was better than his fears.

4. Sing unto the LORD, O ye saints of his. Sing, often rendered sing praises, Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2, 11; sometimes used in connection with the words psaltery and harp; and commonly supposed to refer to singing with the accompaniment of musical instruments. Some render it, Sing a Psalm; others, Play; others, Make music. The call on the pious, godly, merciful or saints is to unite in the most solemn and joyful manner to praise and exalt God. Nor should the worship be mere adoration. An amazing mercy had been received, and gratitude was called for. So it is added: And give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. The Chaldee and Venema: Celebrate the remembrance of his holiness; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac and Vulgate: Declare [or acknowledge] the remembrance of his holiness; Amesius: Speak much to the memory of his holiness; Edwards: Give thanks to his holy name; Alexander: Give thanks to the memory of his holiness. The sense doubtless is, Confess, celebrate, speak, utter praise in honor of his holiness. Holiness is the sum of the moral excellence of God's character, and is the sheet-anchor of the hopes of the righteous. It secures them the final victory in every case. Monuments and memorials should everywhere be erected to the praise and glory of God's infinite rectitude. By that he governs the world. Moved by that holiness, which is as kind as it is just, Jehovah had averted the plague, and now let him be duly praised.

5. For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. Perhaps there are not in all the Scriptures

a dozen verses more remarkable for pith and brevity than this. Let the reader omit the words supplied by our translators, and he will see the force of this remark. Doway: For wrath is in his indignation; and life in his good will. In the evening weeping shall have place, and in the morning gladness; Edwards: For his anger is but for a moment; in his favor is life; sorrow may last out the evening, but joy cometh in the morning; Jebb: For there is but a moment in his anger: Life is in his favor: Through the night endureth weeping, but in the morning there is singing; Green: For his anger is only for a moment; but his favor is for life. Sorrow may continue for an evening; but joy cometh before morning. The common version gives the sense in idiomatic English. Hengstenberg: "In the second half of the verse, weeping is personified and represented by the figure of a wanderer, who leaves in the morning the lodging, into which he had entered the preceding evening. After him another guest arrives, viz., joy." Of course the only persons of whom this verse is always true are the saints, the meek of the preceding verse. The verse is striking even according to the common interpretation; but it is even more striking, if, as some suppose, the plague lasted less than twenty-four hours. For the sin of proudly counting his subjects, God gave David a choice of three evils; 1. Seven years of famine; 2. Three months of war; or, 3. Three days of pestilence. He chose the latter. The work of death began. But it did not last three days. It endured but a part of a calendar day. In our version of 2 Sam. xxiv. 15 it reads, "So the Lord sent a pestilence upon Israel from the morning even to the time appointed." But Hengstenberg is confident that instead of "to the time appointed" it should read "till the time of meeting," and that by this we are to understand "the evening religious assembly" or "the time of the evening sacrifice," 1 Kings xviii. 29, 36; 2 Kings xvi. 15. This is ingenious and probably correct. It allows room for the efficacy of David's intercessory prayer and the gracious answer to it as given in the history. The word appointed though often so rendered is often given congregation, feast, assembly, solemn feast, solemn assembly, set time, solemnities. The plague had hardly broken out till God said to the destroying angel: "It is enough: stay now thine hand." Truly God's anger endureth but a moment; in his favor [or good will] is life: weeping may endure [abide or lodge] for a night; but joy cometh [arriveth or succeedeth] in the morning. Having celebrated the great mercy received he proceeds to state the secure and vain condition of his mind before his affliction.

6. And in my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved. For prosperity the Chaldee has boldness or security; Septuagint, success; Vulgate, abundance; Arabic, time of my riches; Syriac and Amesius, tranquillity; Venema, serene prosperity; Ainsworth, false quietness; Fry, peace; Hengstenberg and Alexander, security. The best rendering is ease, security, carelessness, induced by success. The carnal mind naturally and easily perverts even a little prosperity to the engendering of pride and self-sufficiency, forgetfulness of God and practical atheism. The mere taking of a census is not wicked, as is evident from the Scripture itself, Ex. xxx. 12; neither is the beholding of a city, nor the making of a speech, nor the opening of a cabinet; but the doing of any of these things out of vain glory is very offensive to God, Isa. xxxix. 1-7; Dan. iv. 29-33; Acts xii. 21-23. Buddæus: "The thing itself shows that David, in the whole matter, was actuated by pride and vain glory." Even Joab saw the folly David was about to commit and faithfully warned him against it, 2 Sam. xxiv. 3. The pestilence was an awful rebuke, and the shortness of its continuance a great mercy.

7. LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong. Favour, so rendered in v. 5; elsewhere will, good-will, voluntary will, pleasure, good pleasure. All that is great, good, wise, holy, or stable, is so by the sovereign will of God alone. Mountain seems to point to the kingly power and authority of David. Diodati: "My kingdom, whose chief seat was mount Zion;" Pool: "Thou hast so firmly settled me in my kingdom; which he calls his mountain, partly because kingdoms are usually called mountains in prophetic writings, Ps. xlv. 3, 4; Isa. ii. 2; Jer. li. 25; Dan. ii. 34, 35, 44, 45; and partly with respect to mount Zion." There seems to be no good reason for reading beauty instead of mountain, as do the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway; nor for the rendering of Edwards: "By thy favor thou hast given a settled firmness to my bloom;" nor for the rendering of Houbigant, Mudge and Green, who read, "Thou by thy favor hadst given such firmness to my health." Ainsworth's rendering is striking: "Jehovah, in thy favorable acceptance thou hast settled strength to my mountain." There is a question whether this clause is connected with what he said in v. 6 before the pestilence, or whether he spoke it after his affliction. On this expositors are divided. Many, among them Venema, Patrick, Chandler, Henry, Pool, Fry, Scott, Morison and Tholuck, favor this first view. Scott says: "While David ascribed his great prosperity, and the firm establishment of his authority to the faithfulness, power and love of God; he seems to have given way to unwarranted confidence, and to have remitted his vigilance and activity, and probably the fervency of his devotion." But Hengstenberg clearly takes the other view, and supposes this clause to have been uttered as expressive of David's mind after the affliction was over. He thus paraphrases the clause: "I have learned by painful experience that the power of my kingdom had its root in thy favor." This view is the most simple and natural. Experience instructed him: Thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled. To hide the face is to be displeased. Applied to God, it denotes the withholding of those mercies, which comfort us, and the letting loose of those calamities, which overwhelm us. Troubled is the rendering of a very strong word. Alexander: "I was confounded, agitated, terrified, perplexed." The affliction in this case was public, national, swift and terrible. No wonder it drove David to prayer.

8. I cried to thee, O LORD. Cried, elsewhere called, Ps. xlii. 7; cxlv. 18, but often cried, Isa. xxi. 8; xl. 2, 6. It expresses heartiness and earnestness. The next clause is parallel. And unto the Lord I made supplication. This verb is sometimes rendered besought, intreated, and often made supplication. It describes the cry for mercy, the plea of gracious dealing. The Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Amesius, Ainsworth, Jebb, Fry and Hengstenberg read the verbs of this verse according to our version in the past tense. The Arabic and Edwards put them in the present. But the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Luther, Venema and Alexander follow the Hebrew, and read in the future. On this subject see Introduction, § 6. If we understand the words, and I said, as prefacing this verse, then the sense is much the same as if we use the past tense. Great weight is due to the remark of Alexander: "The translation of the futures as past tenses is a license, which could only be justified by extreme exegetical necessity." Some have thought that necessity existed here. Perhaps it does. Calvin: "This is the chief advantage of afflictions, that while they make us sensible of our wretchedness, they stimulate us again to supplicate the favor of God." The change from the second to the third person in the use of the word Jehovah is remarkable, though there are instances of changes as great. • xxxviii. 16-19; Ps. vi. 5; lxxxviii. 10-12. The same thing is repeated in other words: Shall the dust praise thee? Dust, the body after it ceases to be animated, when it has mouldered to dust. Yet again does he urge the plea: Shall it [the dust] declare thy truth? q. d., "Shall my cold and dead remains be to thy enemies any proof of thy faithfulness, thy truth as a covenant-keeping God? My death will afford new grounds of exultation to all who hate thee and me; and I shall never again on earth be allowed to speak one word to thy praise." These considerations were much strengthened by David's peculiar relations to the theocracy and the throne of Israel, God having promised to establish him and his seed in it. That David was not actuated by any mere terror of dying, nor by a natural love of life, is certain, for he freely offered to die, if his death would arrest the progress of the pestilence, 2 Sam. xxiv. 17.

9. What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? For pit the Chaldee reads the place of the sepulchre; the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, Ainsworth and Alexander, corruption; Hengstenberg, the grave; others generally pit. See Ps. vii. 15, where it is rendered ditch. In Ps. xvi. 10, it is rendered corruption. In Ps. lv. 23, ciii. 4, it is destruction. The impossibility of the dead rendering any service to God on earth is clearly stated in Scripture, Ecc. ix. 10. And it is employed more than once as an argument for the sparing of the life of God's servants, Isa.

10. Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me. This is still a continuance of his prayer. It was a cry for mercy, pity, favor, gracious dealing. Not only had David sinned in numbering the people, but he ruled a guilty nation whose iniquities were not forgotten before God, as is evident from 2 Sam. xxiv. 1, 2. They had been both ungrateful and rebellious. In many ways they had offended God. The arresting of the terrible plague would therefore be an act of pure, undeserved mercy both to David and to Israel, though David speaks of it as though it were pity to himself alone. LORD, be thou my helper. The Septuagint and some kindred versions read, The Lord became my helper. But the Chaldee, Syriac, Calvin, church of England, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander make each clause of the verse a petition. This is best.

11. Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing. Here begin the words of triumph. The word rendered mourning expresses any great and violent grief, elsewhere rendered wailing, lamentation, not elsewhere in the Psalms. See Gen. i. 10; Est. iv. 3; Jer. vi. 26; xlviii. 38. Dancing, always so rendered in the text of the common version. It expresses a high degree of joy, corresponding with the degree of grief formerly felt. The whole account of the staying of the plague, and the effect of that happy cessation of pestilence, would fully justify the strength of the language here employed, 2 Sam. xxiv. 18-25; 1 Chron. xxi. 18-27. Araunah himself was greatly moved by this providence, and offered David every facility for a joyful sacrifice. True, this man of heathen descent may have become a real and an open convert to the true religion; but of this we have no assurance. Great public mercies sometimes deeply affect even unregenerate men. David adds: Thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness. The idea is the same as in the preceding clause. The language is borrowed not only from the general custom of the Israelites and other ancient nations in covering themselves, when sad, with sackcloth, but from the fact that David and the elders of Israel had, during the plague, literally been clothed in sackcloth, 1 Chron. xxi. 16. Hengstenberg: "Sackcloth is a hair garment, which mourners put on: it was, as it were, the robe of penitence." How great was the change produced, as in a moment, by the mercy of God. He interposed in love, and gladness followed. Though the plague probably lasted considerably less than an entire day, yet it had already swept away seventy thousand men. Had it raged the entire three days, as David had been led to expect, and with the increased violence which pestilence is apt to acquire by the panic created in the public mind, its devastations must have been terrible. From so overwhelming a judgment David and Israel were delivered, and the sacrifice offered was that of grateful, joyful hearts. Such a mercy was not to be uninfluential. David says it was

12. To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee and not be silent. Glory, for the general signification of the word see Ps. iii. 3; iv. 2; vii. 5; viii. 5; and for its particular signification here, see Psalm xvi. 9. By glory we should understand tongue.

So Ainsworth and many; though for my glory the Chaldee has The honorable of the world; church of England, Every good man; Jebb, My Spirit; Edwards, Fry and Hengstenberg, My soul; Alexander, Everything glorious. But most prefer the common interpretation, Tongue. Calvin: "As David adds immediately after, I will celebrate thy praise forever, the context demands that he should particularly speak of his own duty in this place." The last phrase is, O LORD my God, I will give thanks unto thee forever. The verb here is the same rendered in v. 4 give thanks; in v. 9, praise. Hengstenberg: "The forever indicates that the Psalmist will set no limits to the praise of God."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Even in this world of sorrow no small part of our fit work is praise, vv. 1, 12. As long as life lasts, especially in the case of the righteous, mercies greatly abound. Much more will they be called to praise in heaven, Isa. liv. 7, 8. Let us extol him here with heart and voice, for life and all its blessings; then may we hope to spend our eternity in his blissful presence and service. If God exalts us, let us exalt him. If he humbles us without destroying us, let us count it a great mercy, and give thanks. "All the vicissitudes of our earthly existence are subject to his sovereign disposal." They could not be in better hands.

2. In state, spirits and hopes the best men are liable to great depression, v. 1. The condition of the believer in covenant with God is one of safety, not of security. Though his enemies shall not finally prevail, yet they often and dreadfully annoy him.

3. Because the wicked hate the righteous, they rejoice over them as often as they see them sad and dejected, v. 1. "Ye are not of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

4. The whole Psalm shows how dreadful is sin in those who rule or represent the nation. It brings down terrible chastisements. The reason why national sins are so sorely punished in this world, is that nations, as such, will not be judged in the next world. Their existence will then have ceased. In the final judgment individuals alone will undergo the examination of God.

5. There is no getting on without prayer, v. 2. We may be saved without learning or great sagacity, but not without prayer. Cobbin: "In God's own time and way he can deliver us when we call upon him for help. In this fluctuating state our joys are nearly allied to our sorrows, our prosperity to adversity, and our seasons of sacred joy to those of deep depression. But who ever besieged the mercy-seat in vain?"

6. When God heals and helps, the work is done to purpose, v. 2. None can resist him. He needs no assistance.

7. The preservation of human life is so great a work as to be always and easily referable to God alone, v. 3. No positive act on his part is necessary to terminate it. His simple and total withdrawal would cause us instantly to perish.

That life which thou hast made thy care,
Lord, I devote to thee.

Surely we ought to give all to God. The dangers seen and unseen, which we are constantly encountering, at once overcome us, if God leaves us for a moment. If we have never been in the perils of war or of famine, yet who of us has always been beyond the reach of pestilence.

8. He, who heartily loves God and sincerely praises him, wishes all others to do the same, v. 4. The reasons are 1, true religion is benevolent; 2, God is infinitely excellent and glorious, and so worthy of boundless honor and devotion. Dickson: "Dwelling a while upon the consideration of mercies shown unto us bringeth with it rejoicing in God, and a singing disposition, whereunto when we are once wakened and warned, we will think that one mouth to praise God is too little, as here we see in David, who not only praiseth God himself, but also setteth all the saints on work to the same purpose, saying, sing to the Lord, all ye saints of his."

9. Yet it is idle to ask any but saints to join in so spiritual an exercise, v. 4. However much wicked men may love good gifts, they always hate the Giver of all good things. Many of them do not even thank him for existence. Voltaire put it in print: "I wish I had never been born." Thousands to this day despise his "unspeakable gift," Jesus Christ. If God got no honor except what the wicked give him, his praise would soon cease to be heard and his name cease to be reverently pronounced on earth.

10. God's holiness is as amiable as it is spotless. Because it is infinite, it is to be trusted and rejoiced in. It is ever just cause of thankfulness, v. 4. Has our religion such a temper as to enable us to adore and glory in the holiness of God?

11. Though to the wicked the night of death is followed by a night of endless despair, yet to the righteous the longest and darkest night has its morning of joy, v. 5. Sharp as are the trials of the saints, they are but short. Great is the mercy to us that God is slow to anger and that his anger endureth but a moment. If he delighted in punishing, who could stand before him? While the Scriptures assure us that God's anger is short, they as clearly teach us, that his mercy endureth for ever. Oh that the saints would study God's character. Wonderful love, mercy and purity shine in it all. His name is the glory of the universe.

12. Inspired writers carefully maintain the distinction between saint and sinner. This Psalm sets it forth wonderfully. Hengstenberg: "The divine judgments are annihilating in their character to the ungodly: in their case joy never follows weeping." On the other hand the very afflictions of God's people promote their eternal well-being.

13. Though prosperity may come to a good man, yet it is never without peril. Even David was not strong enough to withstand its power, v. 6. Because of our sinfulness its natural tendency is to harden the heart and draw away the affections from duty and from God. This is often declared in Scripture. Sometimes the language of Inspiration is very striking. See especially Deut. viii. 10-18; xxxii. 15; Pr. i. 32; Ezek. xvi. 49, 50; Hos. xiii. 6. We are sadly wrong when we pervert God's blessings to the encouragement of carnal security. When the sun shines, why should we say, There will never be a storm or a cloud?

14. If we have success, surely we ought to refer it to God, v. 7. Without him there is neither strength, nor wisdom, nor joy, nor speed, nor stability.

15. In God is our life. If he hides his face we cannot but be troubled, v. 7.

16. Anything is good for us that puts us to praying earnestly, v. 8.

17. It is very lawful in prayer to fill our mouths with arguments drawn either from the glory of God, or our own weakness and necessities, v. 9. Surely then we may plead the merits of the great Redeemer. "Faith in God is very argumentative."

18. Let none suppose that it is wicked to die, or to offer to die, if we can thereby promote the good of our race, the cause of truth, or the glory of God. The right way is to leave the time and manner of our departure to the sovereign disposal of God.

19. God's people ought not to object to leaving this world for a better. Death is no enemy to a believer, 1 Cor. iii. 22. The union between Christ and his people is not dissolved by death. They sleep in Jesus. It is not to death that a good man persistently objects, but to a death that will bring dishonor on God. Scott: "We should entreat the Lord that we may not close our lives under his frown, in a way dishonorable to his name, or unprofitable to our brethren."

20. What we want is mercy, v. 10. Not a good thing do we deserve. All we need must flow to us through undeserved kindness and great pity, or we shall never get any good.

21. If we obtain help of God, we need no other aid, v. 10. He is sufficient. He alone is all-sufficient.

22. It is not wicked to be very sad, to mourn and put on sackcloth, v. 11. It is not sinful to shed tears and heave sighs. Jesus wept. His soul was sorrowful even unto death. There is a time to weep, and a time to mourn, Ecc. iii. 4. Dickson: "It becometh the child of God to weep when he is beaten, and to humble himself in the exercise of prayer and fasting." One of the worst signs is to be scourged and refuse to be humbled.

22. It is not wicked to be very glad, v. 11. There is a time to laugh, Ecc. iii. 4. We may rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Blessed be God, his plan is not to make stocks and stones of us, but to make us exceedingly joyful.

23. Our best faculties of body and mind, those which constitute our glory above the beasts, belong to God, v. 12. Never is speech better employed than in commending Christ, glorifying God, praising the Holy Spirit, uttering all the memory of God's loving-kindness.

PSALM XXXI.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 IN thee, O LORD, do I put my trust; let me never be ashamed: deliver me in thy righteousness.

2 Bow down thine ear to me; deliver me speedily: be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me.

3 For thou art my rock and my fortress; therefore for thy name's sake lead me, and guide me.

4 Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me: for thou art my strength.

5 Into thine hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O LORD God of truth.

6 I have hated them that regard lying vanities: but I trust in the LORD.

7 I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversities;

8 And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy: thou hast set my feet in a large room.

9 Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble: mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly.

10 For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing: my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed.

11 I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighbors, and a fear to mine acquaintance: they that did see me without fled from me.

12 I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind: I am like a broken vessel.

13 For I have heard the slander of many: fear was on every side: while they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life.

14 But I trusted in thee, O LORD: I said, Thou art my God.

15 My times are in thy hand: deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me.

16 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant: save me for thy mercies' sake.

17 Let me not be ashamed, O LORD; for I have called upon thee: let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave.

18 Let the lying lips be put to silence; which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous.

19 Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee; which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men.

20 Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man: thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.

21 Blessed be the LORD: for he hath shewed me his marvellous kindness in a strong city.

22 For I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes: nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee.

23 Oh love the LORD, all ye his saints: for the LORD preserveth the faithful, and plentifully rewardeth the proud doer.

24 Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the LORD.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv.

There is no good reason for the opinion of Mudge and Edwards that Jeremiah wrote this ode. Verse 13 is quoted by the weeping prophet, Jer. xx. 10. So verse 5 is quoted by Christ, Luke xxiii. 46. But these things in no way impair the Davidic authorship. The title gives it to him. Ingenuity and learning have failed to find for it any historic occasion. Theodoret refers it to the rebellion of Absalom; Kimchi, Patrick and others, to the time when David was sore pressed by Saul after he had escaped from Keilah, and was in the wilderness of Maon, 1 Sam. xxiii. 13-26; Arama, to the time when David was in Keilah, 1 Sam. xxiii. 1-12. Hengstenberg: "Several abortive attempts have been made to find out a particular historical occasion for the Psalm." It represents, as Cocceius has well remarked, "the perpetual conflict, which believers and the church have to maintain in this world, and the deliverance and victory by which that conflict is sure to be followed."

Critics have often noticed the exceeding simplicity of the language of the whole composition. Everything involved is avoided. This is thought by some peculiarly to belong to those Psalms, which do not refer to individual sufferings, so much as they describe sufferings common to all God's people. Perhaps there is some force in the suggestion. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1060; Clarke, B. C. 1062. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, El God and Elohim God, on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; iii. 2.

1. In thee, O LORD, do I put my trust. The verb is that usually so rendered, or hope, or have hoped. But Venema reads placed my protection; Amesius, betake myself; Ainsworth, hope for safety; Jebb, have taken refuge; Fry, have taken shelter. See on Ps. vii. 1; xi. 1; xvi. 1; xxv. 20. The Hebrew is in the preterite. This signifies that the act is continued until now. Though we may not fix on any one event of David's life as being here specially noticed; yet it is clear that the Psalm relates to a state of peril, perhaps of many perils. In this condition an avowal of strong confidence in God is eminently proper. "What time I am afraid I will trust in the Lord." This is the best method of quelling his anxieties, of enabling him to behave as he ought. He also states his trust as a ground of argument with God: Let me never be ashamed. Never, literally not for ever, not to eternity. Ashamed, also confounded. See on Ps. vi. 10; xxv. 2, 3. The shame and confusion are such as arise from defeat and overthrow. Deliver me in thy righteousness. "God displays his righteousness in performing his promise to his servants." It is a righteous thing with God both to save his people and destroy his foes, 2 Thess. i. 6, 7. That justice, which governs the world and which will preside at the last day, is a glorious and lovely attribute. It is every way consistent with all else that is adorable in the character of God. Righteousness is certainly more than faithfulness, but without the latter, the former could not exist. The righteousness was God's, not David's.

2. Bow down thine ear to me. The Arabic unites this and the next clause and renders them: Speedily give me a hearing. The language of the whole verse is that of genuine and strong emotion. To incline the ear is to show a readiness to listen to even a whisper. Deliver me speedily. The case was urgent. The danger was imminent. A true apprehension of real peril seeks immediate relief; and a true faith seeks that deliverance from God alone. He adds: Be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me. There is considerable variety in rendering this clause. For rock and defence some read munition and fortress, protector and refuge, helper and refuge, strong rock and strong fortress. All these give the same sense. However the words may be rendered, there is no doubt that the imagery is borrowed from a place by nature very strong, and by art rendered impregnable. Such a defence we all need and should all seek.

3. For thou art my rock and my fortress. The words rendered rock in this verse and the preceding are not the same. Both are found in Ps. xviii. 2; the former rendered strength, the latter rock. See on that place. The word rendered fortress is the same as that rendered defence in v. 2. This clause therefore asserts that God is to the psalmist what in verse 2, he prayed God would be to him. We never have ill-success in our approaches to God, when we can truly plead a covenant relation with him. David adds: Therefore for thy name's sake lead me and guide me. Instead of guide, the Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Arabic read nourish. On the phrase for thy name's sake see on Ps. xxiii. 3. Alexander: "The futures in this second clause suggest the idea of necessity, and might perhaps be correctly rendered by the use of our auxiliary must."

4. Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me. On the use of nets see on Ps. ix. 15. The wicked are sometimes permitted to lay snares from which nothing but infinite wisdom and power can rescue the righteous. So God's servants often feel and look to him alone. For thou art my strength. Strength, as in Ps. xxvii. 1. We have the same word in verse 2, rendered as an adjective, strong rock, literally rock of strength. Good cause have all the righteous for going to God; first, he can save them, secondly, none else can.

5. Into thine hand I commit my spirit. For commit many versions read commend. This does not materially change the sense. Our Lord used the Septuagint rendering, commend, Luke xxiii. 46. Alexander: "The verb means to entrust or deposit anything of value." This is the precise and final form, in which we find the idea in Scripture, 2 Tim. i. 12. Every believer, living or dying, may use these words. Our Lord Jesus greatly loved all Scripture. And many things in this ode were very well suited to express his thoughts. But he did not quote all this verse: Thou hast redeemed me, O LORD God of truth. This clause "more properly relates to the type than to the antitype," for although the verb is sometimes rendered deliver, yet it is far more commonly redeem, and properly signifies deliverance by redemption, Ex. xiii. 13; Lev. xxvii. 27; Num. xviii. 15. God of truth was a very fitting title in this case. It reminded David of the faithfulness of his defender, and it contained an unanswerable argument with God to continue his mercies. In his plea with God David was also able to present his own uprightness and honesty of character:

6. I have hated them that regard lying vanities. There seems to be nothing to justify the change in the rendering of this clause adopted by the Septuagint and kindred versions: Thou hast hated, etc. The sense is good, but not so good as that given by our version. The Chaldee is quite against it. Hengstenberg: "The sense does not suit the connection, and Ps. xvi. 4; xxvi. 5 are in favor of the first person." The hatred here spoken of is that of displacency, not of malevolence. We have the same word in the same sense in Ps. v. 5; xi. 5; cxxxix. 22. The form of the verb here points to a habit of the life long since formed and continued until now. Regard, elsewhere rendered keep, observe, take heed to. The care and attention manifested by the wicked to different forms of sin and folly are great. They guard them as if they were treasure. They observe the maxims of wickedness as the righteous do the ordinances of God. They take heed to evil as if it were good. They regard lying vanities. For lying vanities various versions read vanities, vanities to no purpose, vanities of falsehood, vanities of vain falsehood, vainest vanities, idolatrous vanities, vanities of worship. Alexander: "The words here combined are highly contemptuous, denoting vanities of nothingness, or nothings of nonentity." Doubtless idols and idol worship are chiefly intended. In Scripture idols are often called vanities. Paul says an idol is nothing in the world, 1 Cor. viii. 4. Idol worship, however splendid, is the merest farce, a mockery of God and of man, fit matter of divine ridicule; see Ps. cxv.; Isa. xlv. No marvel David hated the whole system of false worship. His confidence was in no creature, and so he adds, But I trust in the LORD. Trust, it here denotes the repose of the soul on Jehovah.

7. I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy. There is great uniformity in rendering this clause, only for the first verb some prefer triumph, or exult. The more the true religion is tried, the more is it found to be a fountain of joy. Unfeigned confidence in God will surely in the end bring gladness and exultation. The divine mercy is perfectly reliable. It meets all the wants of every humble soul. Past mercies lay the foundation for the expectation of greater mercies yet to come. Experience of the divine kindness is a marvellous nourisher of gladness. For thou hast considered my trouble. When God takes in hand any grievance, he does not give partial relief and lay the matter aside. He considers the whole case. The proper remedy necessarily flows from the divine nature. How often are we ready in darkness to say, "My way is hid from the LORD, and my judgment is passed over from my God." But this is the language of sinful unbelief. It is well when we can say as David here, Thou hast known my soul in adversities. God notices all that happens to the righteous. He is ignorant of none of their distresses. Some regard the first clause of this verse as an anticipation of deliverance yet to come, and thus throw great animation into the verse; but the sense is as good and the construction more natural to make the triumph and gladness be in view of infallible tokens of relief already vouchsafed.

8. And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy. Often had David's enemies almost grasped him. It has always been true that the righteous were scarcely saved. Yet they were saved. There was always a way of escape. If all others are shut, God opens a passage to the skies. God does not long leave his chosen in straits. Thou hast set my feet in a large room. Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. The worst chains are the bonds of iniquity and the fetters of a fiery condemnation. These taken away, and God's favor secured, nor men nor angels can hedge us up, or hinder our progress Zionward.

9. Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble. Have mercy, as in Ps. iv. 1; vi. 2; ix. 13; xxv. 16; li. 1. The mercy sought is favor, grace, unmerited kindness, not a debt due him, but a gratuity. For trouble some read affliction, distress. Hengstenberg: I am hard pressed. In trouble we often feel our need of mercy more than in prosperity. He adds: Mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly. Hengstenberg urges that the grief is vexation, dejection. Calvin renders it anger, and needlessly thinks it signifies sinful anger. This is not supported by the text or context. Grief is enough to waste and consume the eye, giving it a sunken appearance, to take away the appetite, the courage, the whole strength. The bodily effects produced by mental distress, when long continued and violent, are marked and uniform. Life itself is often taken by this means. Many die of a broken heart.

10. For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing. Spent, i. e., wasted, consumed. Hengstenberg: "The sense is, 'My constant pain, my continual sighing, wear me out before the time, end my life, shorten my years.' " It is always a solemn thing to die; but to feel that life is waning and wasting merely through the wickedness and perversity of men clothes the whole matter with sadness. It is terrible to see ourselves killed inch by inch through the depravity of others. Sad indeed is our lot when the business of each day is weeping and sighing. David adds: My strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed. The chief doubt respecting this passage arises from the word rendered iniquity. In favor of our version is the Chaldee, Ainsworth, church of England, Jebb and Alexander. Hengstenberg has Guilt; Castellio, This punishment; Horsley, My punishment; Amesius, Punishment of sin; Venema, Writhing; Calvin and Fry, Sorrow; Mudge, Edwards, Green and Rogers, Affliction. The word occurs very often and is commonly rendered iniquity, sometimes fault, punishment. It is best to give it here the usual signification. David had an abiding sense of his own sinfulness. He often confessed it. Though he did not deserve at the hands of men the cruel treatment he received from them, and so often pleads his righteousness, yet he had learned that the wicked were God's sword, and admitted that he deserved all that came upon him. Sin is the real cause of all our suffering. In the true sense of that term in Scripture, David was righteous. Yet he was not in himself free from all iniquity. He often smarted for his sins. Tholuck: "The sting of conscience had blended with the external causes of misery." Strength and bones are aptly spoken of as failing together.

11. For I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighbors. To be a jest, a reproach is the severest kind of trial, to which man can subject us. The enemies of the Lord's anointed king started all sorts of evil reports against him. The more they lied against him, the more they hated him. So terrible was the popular outcry that even David's former neighbors and friends to a sad extent became his despisers in proportion as they had once esteemed him. He was not only a derision but also a terror to his former friends. And a fear to mine acquaintance. They were afraid to be seen with him, or to be suspected of intimacy or even sympathy with him. They considered his cause ruined, his prospects dismal. They thought God had forsaken him, and so it was easy to persecute and take him. How far this was carried is next declared: They that did see me without fled from me. Without i. e., abroad, in the streets, or in the fields. If any man has ever seen former and esteemed friends evidently avoiding him, he will know what the prophet here means. Yea, he had been so long and painfully separated from his usual places of resort, that to many he was as if dead:

12. I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind. Calvin: I am forgotten as one dead; Fry: I was given up as one that is dead; Boothroyd: I am disregarded as one dead; Hengstenberg: I am forgotten in the heart like a dead man; Alexander: I was forgotten as a dead man out of mind. The verb is in the preterite, but shows that for some time he had been, and still was forgotten. The present tense best suits the English idiom. There is no difference between being forgotten in the heart and forgotten out of mind. He adds: I am like a broken vessel. Anderson: "Utterly neglected as being worthless;" Berleberg Bible: "A broken vessel, which is good for nothing, which can be made no use of, cannot be made whole again, for which no one cares, and the fragments of which are thrown away." In subsequent Scriptures we often find the same figure.

13. For I have heard the slander of many. For slander of many, John Rogers' translation and the Bishops' Bible read blasphemy of the multitude; Genevan translation, the railing of great men. It means evil report, defamation. In this verse for seems to refer back to verse 9, where he pleads for mercy, and begins to assign reasons, and continues to do so through this verse. The word is not elsewhere found in the Psalms, and but a few times in any place. Its signification is uniform. Many, the many, a multitude, the multitude. The enemies of David were many and powerful. The object of slander in cases like this is twofold, first, to gratify a wicked, fiendish spirit of lying and malice; and secondly, to withdraw sympathy from the sufferer by persuading the masses that he is an evil man. Fear was on every side. That is, fear has been and still is on every side. The Hebrew is very brief and forcible. Every path seemed beset with danger. No rational prospect of deliverance presented itself. The persecutors could be satisfied with nothing but the extremest measures: While they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life. All envy, slander and malice naturally lead to murder. These men were bent on shedding David's blood. Tholuck: "A man exiled by his king, who would with royal favor reward those who betrayed him (1 Sam. xxii. 7, 8; xxiii. 21,) could not but become the reproach of those, whose houses he used to frequent. Nor does the fear of his kindred seem strange, since their connection with him (especially at a time when enmity towards an individual became transferred upon all his family) was no doubt fraught with danger to them. We read indeed that David, in order to secure the safety of his parents, deemed it necessary to remove them to the land of the Moabites. (1 Sam. xxii. 3.) It was even true that his nearest relatives and friends had forgotten him like a dead man: he could no longer meet with Jonathan, and probably saw his relatives during his decennial flight on that occasion only when he met them in the cave of Adullam. (1 Sam. xxii. 1.) That cave was near Bethlehem, the town of David's tribe, and he seems afterwards not to have been so near the capital. . . No secret nook or corner of the country was too remote to prevent infuriated Saul from attempting the seizure of the fugitive."

14. But I trusted in thee, O LORD. Trusted, the same verb in the same form as in verse 6, where it is given in the present tense. Nothing was left to David but confidence in God. This was enough; I said, Thou art my God. The covenant relation may always be pleaded. Entire reliance on God did never fail any soul. The fiercer the storm, the more does the anchor sure and steadfast show its value. The darker the night, the more blessed is the light of one bright star.

15. My times are in thy hand. Chaldee: In thy hand are the times of my redemption; Septuagint and Vulgate: In thy hands are my lots; Arabic: In thy hands is my inheritance; Syriac: In thy hands are the times; Jebb: In thy hand is my time; Edwards: My critical times are in thy hands; Calvin: "The import of the language is, Lord, it is thy prerogative, and thou alone hast the power to dispose of both my life and death. Nor does he use the plural, times, in my opinion without reason; but rather to mark the variety of casualties, by which the life of man is usually harassed." The whole of life, with all that threatens it, with all that continues it, is in the hand of the wise, good, powerful, perfect ruler of all things. This lays a good foundation for the prayer: Deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me. His enemies sought his life. They hunted him like a wild beast. But it was all in vain. His times were not in the hand of Saul, or of any finite creature.

16. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant. Making the face to shine is a very ancient form of expressing the manifest presence of God and his lively comforts to his people, Num. vi. 25. We had the same figure in Ps. iv. 6. When God's face shines on any one, his grace is marvellously manifest to him. Such lively comforts and hopes as are thus imparted are all the fruit, not of man's desert, but of God's mere favor; and so David prays: Save me for thy mercies' sake. Mercies, loving-kindnesses. In God, not in man, must be found the cause of every deliverance, even to the best saints.

17. Let me not be ashamed, O LORD. Ashamed, as in v. 1. It occurs again in this verse. The argument used here is: For I have called upon thee. The argument used in v. 1 is: In thee do I put my trust. These are not diverse. He, who trusts, will pray. He, who prays aright, must confide. That trust, which leads to calling on God, and that prayer, which is offered in faith, cannot fail. They must bring help to the righteous. They must as surely bring a downfall to their incorrigible foes: Let the wicked be ashamed. For an explanation of the imprecatory form, found here and in verse 18, see Introduction, § 6. And let them be silent in the grave. Grave, as in Ps. vi. 5; in ix. 17, hell. Death puts it beyond the power of the wicked to harass the people of God any more. Their craft and malice and blasphemies are powerless when their earthly career is closed.

18. Let the lying lips be put to silence. Surely God will bring to naught every falsehood and all who love it. To ask him to do so is but to ask him to exercise the glorious holiness of his nature. The liars here spoken of did not satisfy themselves with inventing harmless fables for their own diversion, but rage and malice were in their words: Which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous. Grievous things, opprobrious things, iniquity, a hard word, a hard and mean thing, so some. The margin has it, a hard thing. Others prefer an adverb, hardly, cruelly, recklessly, insolently. All these are true, but the marginal reading is perhaps the best. The speeches of the wicked are often very galling to the righteous. And then they utter their falsehoods in pride and contempt. The present scorn and haughtiness of the wicked will only be equalled by their final shame and confusion. The meanness, cowardice and deceitfulness of their real characters will burst forth at last. The war against God's saints must and shall be put down. It is too wicked to be allowed to last forever.

19. Oh how great is thy goodness which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee. Here seems to be a very sudden transition. But it is justified. The prophet had gained a sight of the dreadful end of the wicked, which must be the signal for the glorious triumph of the righteous. The fitness of the bold language here used arises from the fact that David either foresaw deliverance coming, or had already experienced it. The latter is the more probable opinion. This part of the Psalm, if not all of it, was probably composed when David saw the schemes of his persecutors disappointed, God's promise to him respecting his authority fulfilled, and his enemies either dead, or fled, or quite in his power. The goodness here referred to seems to be God's providential goodness in this life—a sure token indeed of greater goodness yet to come; but yet a great thing in itself. Several things commonly heighten the displays of God's providential goodness to his saints: 1. Its principal acts are usually very unexpected. At such a time as men look not for him Jehovah appears. 2. It is very seasonable. A day or an hour sooner or later would have quite changed the aspect of the whole event. 3. God's operations are commonly noiseless. He comes not with observation. God made a world with less noise than man makes a coffin. 4. When God manifests his providential goodness he does it effectually. The enemies are all gone; the victory is complete. Not an Egyptian was left alive at the Red sea. 5. If means and instruments are used they are so inadequate, so unexpected that our wonder is greatly increased. Ahithophel's suicide breaks the neck of Absalom's rebellion. 6. God's providential goodness to the righteous is by covenant and according to a fixed plan. He always designed to lift up David's head above all his enemies round about. His goodness is laid up, hidden, reserved, or treasured up for the saints. It is hidden in God's purpose. It is hidden as treasure of great value. It is laid up as a portion, an inheritance that none but they shall have. Yet God's tender mercies are over all his works, and he "maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good." But to his saints God's goodness is unmixed, unfailing. It does great things for them because they fear him. On the fear of God, see on Ps. ii. 11. This goodness is not only laid up for the righteous, but at proper times it is manifested for them: Which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men! It is chiefly known to be laid up, because on fit occasions it is wrought for the saints, described here as those that trust in God. For the nature of this trust, see on Ps. vii. 1. Before the sons of men refers to the trust publicly expressed, or to the goodness publicly displayed. The latter gives the better sense. Genuine trust in God, however secret, shall not be publicly disappointed. Friend and foe shall see that God is righteous and faithful.

20. Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man. Instead of pride various versions have wrath, disturbance, strife, trouble, provoking, insults, association, leagues. God's face or presence in this place points, not so much to the sanctuary, as to the aspects of his providence. His presence shields his friends, but confounds his foes, Ex. xiv. 20. Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues. For strife some have broils, contradiction, contention, quarrel. The English text gives the sense as well as any other. A pavilion or tent was a hiding-place for men and things, sheltering the former from the heats of summer and the cold blasts of all seasons, hiding the latter from the sight and cupidity of men. The saints are made quite safe. Arnd: "This our beloved God does secretly, so that no human eyes may or can see, and the ungodly do not know that a believer is, in God, and in the presence of God, so well protected, that no reproach or contempt, and no quarrelsome tongues can do him any harm." If good men could be ruined by reproaches, and slanders, and plots of violence, and strifes of tongues, not one of them would ever reach heaven. But none of these things can harm them, because they are hidden in God.

21. Blessed be the LORD. See on Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46; xxviii. 6. For he hath shewed me his marvellous kindness in a strong city. Arnd: "The strong city is God himself, and his powerful and gracious protection, in which we are even more secure than in a strong city." Calvin suggests that we read, as in a strong city. There is no valid objection to this. It doubtless gives the true sense. Walford: "The particle of similitude is wanting in Hebrew, as is not uncommon. The intention of the Psalmist is evidently to describe by a metaphor his signal deliverance as if he had been guarded by invincible fortifications."

22. For I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes. Chaldee: But when I sought a place to fly to I said, I am cut off from the presence of thy glory; Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic: But I said in the high excitement [or excess] of my mind; I am cast away from before thy eyes; Arabic: I said in my senselessness, Have I fallen away from the sight of thy eyes? Syriac: I said in my haste, I have perished from the sight of thine eyes; Calvin: I said in my perturbation, I am cast out of thy sight; Edwards: For I said in my consternation, I am banished from the sight of thine eyes; Hengstenberg: And I said in my rapid flight, I am torn away from thine eyes. The chief doubt is whether we should read haste, flight, fear, or terror. Trepidation, which expresses haste arising from fear, is perhaps as good a rendering as any other. It is clear that David here deplores a weakness and confesses a sin. He had allowed his mind to become sinfully despondent respecting a cause in which he had God's word. But this sad temptation did not finally prevail: Nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee. If God required perfect faith before he answered a prayer, all our petitions would be rejected. But he regards our cry, even when we serve him, in much weakness and in many temptations.

23. Oh love the Lord, all ye his saints. Love to God is generally said to embrace—
 1. Love to him for what he has done for us, Ps. cxvi. 1. So here also we have an expression of the love of gratitude. 2. Love of complacency, which delights in God and loves him for what he is. There can be no piety in man or angel without this love. It is much spoken of in Scripture, Ps. xxxvii. 4; Ps. xlii. 2. We must take pleasure in the Almighty. 3. Love of benevolence, which bears good will to the kingdom of God, wishes him honored, and is pleased when he is glorified. We are called on to love God in each of these senses. For the LORD preserveth the faithful, and plentifully rewardeth the proud doer. By his government God shows his adorable and lovely nature. He ought to be loved for all he is and for all he does. His character would not be perfect, of course it would not be wholly lovely, if he either failed to preserve the faithful, or put down the proud. For The LORD preserveth the faithful, we might read, The Lord keepeth faith, viz., with his saints. This is the settled judgment of every believer. On the other hand some admit that in this life to the wicked there is some recompense, but they say, Where is the proportion between crime and punishment? The answer is, that in the end, punishment shall be condign. In due time God will plentifully, abundantly, in the highest degree, send a just recompense on the proud. The inference from all the foregoing is a timely exhortation to all the saints, or meek, or gracious ones;

24. Be of good courage, i. e., quit you like men, be ye steadfast, be ye established, or be ye strong. The command carries with it the promise of help to all who obey. And he shall strengthen your heart. He who will exercise the grace he has, shall have more grace. Every victory won in faith shall prepare the way for another conflict, which shall also have a happy issue. Alexander: "Be strong in purpose and desire, and he will make you strong in fact." Nor is it one class only of God's servants that need such exhortation. The address is to all: All ye that hope in the Lord. All true piety, however feeble, has some hope, some confidence in Jehovah. All who have thus set their hope in God, will accept in meekness these exhortations.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Great honor is brought to God by the trust which his people repose in him in the darkest hours, v. 1. This is a reason why they should diligently study to be hopeful and confident in God at all times.

2. Genuine trust in God is in him alone. It mingles not human helps and friendships with the divine. It is silent as the grave respecting all resources but the infinite, eternal and unchangeable One, v. 1.

3. Genuine trust may always be pleaded as a reason why God should grant our prayers, v. 1. He never awakens hope or inspires confidence to disappoint them. That be far from him.

4. The righteous have many good and no bad prospects for eternity, v. 1. They shall never be ashamed. All the good things they receive here are but pledges of better things to come; while the evil they receive here is all the evil that shall ever befall them.

5. Every attribute of God demands and secures the salvation of believers. They were sinners, and so deserved ill. But because they are in covenant with God, even his righteousness requires their full deliverance, v. 1. Compare 1 John i. 9. Dickson: "As the Lord sendeth, in his wisdom, trouble after trouble upon a believer, so he sendeth, in his justice and faithfulness, promised delivery after delivery."

6. It is a great mercy that God hears prayer. We may confidently ask him to hear our prayers, condescendingly bowing his ear to us, v. 2. Arnd: "O God, thou hearest what is offered in such a soft voice that thou hearest my sigh! Ah! keep not at such a distance from me! I have no temporal defence; no place of strength and safety; be thou my castle and strong-hold."

7. When men are greatly in earnest and their hearts truly engaged, they desire the speedy assistance of God, v. 2. A pious soul in darkness asks that the darkness may now be dispelled. He who rightly wishes deliverance from sin, asks that he may now be saved.

8. It is well to despair of all created help, to renounce all trust in ourselves or other creatures. David had no hope but in God alone, vv. 1, 2.

9. God can fully and effectually defend and save. He is a strong rock, a place of munitions, a rock and a fortress, vv. 2, 3. Trust in him cannot be vain. The thing is impossible. His nature forbids it. No truth is more sure or clear.

10. If merely a creature's honor, the credit of ministers, or the glory of angels were involved, man's salvation would indeed be uncertain. But every step involves the honor of God. We plead for his name's sake, v. 3. If God should begin and not continue, or if he should carry on but not complete the work, all would admit that it was for some reason that must bring reproach on the Almighty. This can never be. God was self-moved to undertake man's salvation. His glorious name makes it certain the top-stone shall be laid in glory.

11. Divine guidance cannot be too earnestly and constantly sought, v. 3. Left to ourselves, we make fatal mistakes. If man could be his own guide, why could he not be his own Saviour? It is therefore right to submit the whole understanding to the teaching of God and the heart to the purification of the Holy Ghost.

12. The history of God's people unites with Scripture in showing that the righteous are scarcely saved. Many a time are their feet in the net, and none but God can pull them out, v. 4. In this matter their success in no wise depends on native genius, or force of character, but on the purpose and grace of God. Dickson: "Though the godly be both weak and simple-witted, yet they have a wise and strong God to call upon, who is able to break the snare, and set his own free."

13. The more the Scripture is studied and the more we learn by experience, the clearer will it appear that God's almightiness is a truth necessary to Christian peace and joy, v. 4. There has lately passed from this earth one, whose memory is embalmed in the hearts of thousands, REV. JAMES WADDELL ALEXANDER, D. D. Among his many contributions to piety none deserves a higher place than his work entitled "CONSOLATION." None of its chapters is more full of blessed truth than the fourth, entitled, "THE OMNIPOTENCE OF GOD A GROUND OF ENLARGED CHRISTIAN EXPECTATION."

14. It is a privilege of believers at all times to commit and commend their spirits to God, v. 5. It is delightful specially to do so in a dying hour. So did our Saviour. Dying Stephen, Rev. James Waddell, D. D., the celebrated blind preacher of Virginia, Mrs. Sarah B. Judson and many others, when dying, cried, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit." On the way to the stake Huss frequently said: "Into thy hands I commend my spirit; thou hast redeemed me, my Lord Jesus, God of truth." Luther dying thrice said: "Into thy hands I commit my spirit." John Janeway's last words were: "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." John Frederic Oberlin: "Lord Jesus, take me speedily; nevertheless, thy will be done." Calvin: "Whoever relies not on the providence of God, so as to commit his life to its faithful guardianship, has not learned aright what it is to live."

15. How precious is redemption! All the saints love to speak of it, and glorify its author, v. 5. No marvel that inspired pens never weary of this theme, and often break forth in songs of praise respecting it, even without formal notice.

16. If men are not grieved when they behold the transgressors, they are not saints,

v. 6. When Paul saw the city of Athens terribly sunk in idolatry, his spirit was stirred in him. He, who without sorrow and aversion can behold the wickedness of the wicked, has a heart very unlike the heart of God.

17. There is no reasonable way of accounting for idolatry, except on the supposition that men are terribly blinded, perverted and debased by sin. The whole system of idol-worship and of magic, necromancy, auguries and divinations, is such a mass of lying vanities, that none but a depraved mind could for a moment receive it.

18. Real mercies never lose their use to a pious mind, v. 7. Long after their reception we may call them to mind. Jacob did so when dying, Gen. xlviii. 16. He, who has no heart to think of past mercies, can hardly plead in any right way for new blessings. Sometimes the only light left us is the light of the promises, increased by the light of a blessed experience.

19. It is obligatory on us to maintain and cultivate joy and gladness in God's service, v. 7. It would bring an indelible stigma on religion if all its professors showed by their deportment that they served a hard master, who sent them a warfare at their own charges, and left them in such sadness as to make their lives bitter. Blessed be his name, he giveth songs in the night. "Thou meetest him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness."

20. God knows our souls in affliction, v. 7. He weighs well our cause. He always looks to his saints, especially when they are bathed in tears, or are buffeting the waves of adversity. He considers all our trouble. Blessed be his name for that.

21. "Troubles seldom come alone." David's were multiplied. Read the list, vv. 7-13. How heavy the load—how hard it pressed. When sorrows begin to come, blessed is he, who is prepared for the worst.

22. If it were possible for God, even for a short time, to take sides with the wicked against the righteous, it would destroy all religion in the world. But he never, even for an hour, shuts up a good man into the hand of the enemy, v. 8.

23. When God gives enlargement, who can put us in straits? v. 8.

24. Let all good men keep alive the knowledge and memory of the divine mercy, v. 9. In it is the life of men. The dying saint and the living Christian have no other resort. Dr. McLaren of Scotland dying said: "I am gathering together all my sermons and all my prayers, all my good deeds and all my evil deeds, and am throwing them overboard, determined to swim to glory on the plank of free grace." Let us never hold a doubtful doctrine on this vital point.

25. The worst sting of any trial is sin, v. 10. This gives our griefs their dreadful poignancy. Dickson: "The conscience of sin joined with trouble is a load above a burden, and able to break a man's strength more than any trouble." The reason is that sin is the bitterest and most accursed thing, the most venomous and deadly poison, the most killing and horrible evil in the universe. Nothing, nothing can compare with it. Though a man seems all gay and blithe, yet if sin be upon him he pines away and dies.

26. If the existence and contemplation of sin produce such effects here, what must they bring on the soul in the next world, where retribution will be perfect?

27. If we experience sharp trials at the hand of man, so did David, v. 11; so did Christ. If we fare no worse than the Master and his great type, we may call ourselves happy. Oftentimes the bitterest ingredient in our cup is the part former friends are allowed to act. This too entered into the trials of David and of Christ.

28. When almost all men either condemn or despair of a good cause, it is an illustrious act of faith not to give it up. In this case David hoped against hope. He followed the promise, not appearances. That which made the faith of the penitent thief most remarkable was that he steadily looked to the Sun of righteousness, though he was under an eclipse; believed on a Saviour, who was deserted by his own disciples, dying in ignominy, and confessing that he was forsaken of God. No marvel that such an instance of faith has been celebrated ever since and shall be to the end of the world.

29. Neither the multitude of our foes nor their slanders, nor their counsels, nor their murderous devisings, nor anything else can destroy us, or dismay us, if God be with us, v. 13.

30. Confidence in Jehovah as our God shall never, no never, no never be disappointed, v. 14. There is a sentence in one of the Apocryphal books of the Old Testament, which once gave poor Bunyan great relief. He thought it was in the Bible. He was mistaken in that, but not in supposing that it embodied a Scripture truth: "Look at the generations of old and see; did ever any trust in the Lord, and was confounded? or did any abide in his fear, and was forsaken? or whom did he ever despise, that called upon him?" Ecclus. ii. 10.

31. How comforting is the Scripture doctrine of providence, v. 15. We might as well believe there is no God, as believe that he neither sees, nor hears, nor cares, nor acts in human affairs. If we trust his government, all shall be well, and none will more surely, loudly or joyfully say so, than those, who in this life meet the saddest reverses.

32. Persecution is no novelty, v. 15. The spirit of it has raged from the days of Cain and will continue till the last sinner is converted. The offence of the cross will never cease till all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

33. When the sun shines, we do not need candles, and when we have the light of God's countenance, it matters but little, whether men smile or frown, praise or blame, bless or curse, v. 16.

34. Shame, defeat, overthrow, silence and confusion are surely coming, but not to the righteous, v. 17.

35. It will be unspeakable bliss to live in such a country as heaven, where lying lips are never opened, where grievous things are never spoken, where pride and contempt are unknown, v. 18.

36. He, who has God for his God, "possesses God, with all his treasures of grace, with all his goodness, and love, and friendship," v. 19. God withholds nothing from those, who withhold nothing from him.

37. It is an unspeakable blessing to be allowed to lead a quiet and peaceable life, even though it be in troublous times, when the world is all in an uproar. This can never be done but by that peace which is God's peculiar gift. He hides his chosen in the secret of his presence, in a pavilion, v. 20. Dickson: "How great peace of conscience before God, and comfort in the Holy Ghost, the Lord can give a believer when he hath to do with proud, open persecutors, and privily whispering slanderers, it is a secret and hid mystery to the worldly man!" Calvin: "The power of divine providence alone suffices to ward off every species of evil." In Bedford jail Bunyan was quietly stealing away to heaven, while his detestable prince, with his minions and myrmidons, was tossed on the sea of vanity.

38. He, that will see, may see wonders of mercy wrought for those, who love and fear God, v. 21.

39. Dickson: "There may be in a soul at one time both grief oppressing and hope upholding; both darkness of trouble and the light of faith; both desperate doubting and strong gripping of God's truth and goodness; both a pointing and a fighting; a seeming yielding in the fight and yet a striving of faith against all opposition; both a foolish haste and a stayedness of faith," v. 22.

40. Distrust of God's goodness, love and mercy is a sin to be confessed, v. 22. Sincerely confessed, we will guard against it with much vigilance.

41. Love to God is an old doctrine, v. 23. It is as clearly taught in the Pentateuch as in the Gospels, in the Psalms as in the Epistles.

42. No faithful soul ever perishes. The reason is God reigns and preserves it, v. 23.

43. The recompense to the incorrigibly wicked will be soon enough and terrible enough, without our making ourselves busy to do them evil, v. 23.

44. Let all the servants of God be of good courage. Let no cowardly behaviour ever mark their conduct, v. 24. He, that fights their battles, is the Almighty. "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

45. This Psalm shows that David was in many respects a type of Christ. Let us study the figure, as well as him who was pre-figured.

PSALM XXXII.

A Psalm of David, Maschil.

1 BLESSED is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.

2 Blessed is the man unto whom the LORD imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.

3 When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long.

4 For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah.

5 I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah.

6 For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found: surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him.

7 Thou art my hiding place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah.

8 I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye.

9 Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee.

10 Many sorrows shall be to the wicked: but he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him about.

11 Be glad in the LORD, and rejoice, ye righteous: and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

ON the title see on Psalms iii. xi. The word Maschil is here first found in the title of a Psalm. Subsequently it occurs in Psalms xlii. xlv. lii. liii. liv. lv. lxxiv. lxxviii. lxxxviii. lxxxix. cxlii. Of the thirteen, having this title, at least six were written by David, viz. xxxii. lii. liii. liv. lv. cxlii. Some Jewish writers say that Maschil is prefixed to no Psalms but such as were dictated by an interpreter; others, that all Psalms thus marked were explained by an interpreter; others, that Maschil is the name of a musical instrument used when the Psalm was sung; others, that Maschil was the first word of a song, to the tune of which the Psalm was to be sung. In support of these views, or any of them there appears no solid reason. Yet a few respectable writers favor the last.

There is no reason for regarding Christ as the speaker in this Psalm. Maschil is no doubt derived from a verb found in verse 8, which signifies to instruct, be wise, consider, understand. By the Chaldee, Maschil is rendered a good understanding, by the Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, knowledge, intelligence, understanding. In the Hebrew title, it is a participle, which by Musculus, Montanus, Vatablus and Munster is rendered, teaching; by Gejerus, giving information; by Calvin, giving instruction; by Venema, hastening. Amesius gives the whole title, A didactic ode of David; Ainsworth, An instructing Psalm of David; Pool thinks Maschil the same as Instructor; Dodd, David's Instruction; Jebb says, its obvious meaning is, A wise direction, a moral lesson, a didactic composition; Fabritius, Piscator and Junius call it, A didactic ode; the marginal reading and Symson, A Psalm of David, giving instruction; Boothroyd, An instructive Psalm of David; Hengstenberg, A Didactic Poem; Williams, An instructing or didactic Psalm; Alexander, An instructive or didactic Psalm; Tholuck, A Psalm of David giving instruction. Authority is clearly in favor of Instruction. Yet some Psalms bearing this inscription are no more instructive than some, which have a different inscription, or no inscription. All admit this to be one of the penitential Psalms. See introductory remarks on Ps. vi. That David wrote it is claimed in the title, asserted in Rom. iv. 6, and generally admitted.

Scott and Clarke agree in giving the same date, B. C. 1034, though Clarke thinks it somewhat older than Psalm li., while Scott and Tholuck suppose it later. In this opinion they are probably correct. When David wrote the li. God had not restored to him the joy of his salvation. In this it is evident he was enjoying a sweet sense of God's favor. This composition clearly refers to the great error of David's life. The Scriptures declare his very great rectitude of character and conduct with that one exception, 1 Kings xv. 5. The matter of Uriah was the only one in which David seems to have showed a reluctance to acknowledge the truth. The contents of the Psalm quite agree with this view. Hengstenberg: "Most commentators suppose that David composed this Psalm when he obtained forgiveness from God after his adultery with Bathsheba, and the death of Uriah, to which that sin led. The correctness of this view can scarcely be called in question."

Many difficulties have been urged against the evangelical view of this composition; but each of them seems to be based in ignorance of the nature of true experimental religion. A minute consideration of them all would not be profitable. Some of them may be noticed hereafter. The only name of God used in the Psalm is Jehovah, on which see on Ps. i. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1, on which see. O the blessednesses—a rich variety of happinesses. Transgression, elsewhere sin, rebellion, trespass, but commonly as here. The Septuagint has it in the plural, transgressions. Forgiven, in verse 5 in another form forgavest, literally, lifted up, borne away. If this is so, the language must have been well understood by a pious Jew, who annually saw the service of the scape-goat solemnly performed; one goat being slain and the other led away to a land uninhabited. Whose sin is covered. All the ancient versions, except the Chaldee, read sins not sin. Sin, so commonly; once sin-offering; cognate to the word so often rendered sin and sin-offering. The Septuagint uses the word commonly rendered sin in the New Testament. Covered, the same as is in verse 5 rendered hid. This is the verb used in Deut. xxiii. 13, from which Usher supposes the figure of covering sin is derived. Yet in Ex. xv. 10, it is applied to Pharaoh and his hosts who were covered in the Red sea. It is also applied to the act of filial piety performed by the sons of Noah, when they covered his nakedness, Gen. ix. 23. In fact the word seems to be used to describe any act of effectual hiding.

2. Blessed is the man unto whom the LORD imputeth not iniquity. Blessed, the same word as in verse 1. The Chaldee has son of man, and puts the verb in the future will not impute; as do also the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Venema, Jebb and Alexander. The Arabic and Vulgate use the preterite. Calvin, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Piscator, Fabritius and Hengstenberg have the present, imputeth. The Hebrew is future; but see Introduction, § 6. Our version gives the sense. The word rendered impute first denotes the reckoning, counting, or imputing to men that which is supposed to be properly their own. Thus in Gen. xxxviii. 15; 1 Sam. i. 13; 2 Sam. xix. 19; "When he saw her he thought her to be an harlot;" "Eli thought that she had been drunken;" "Let not my Lord impute iniquity unto me." The word is used in the same sense in Lev. xvii. 4; Neh. xiii. 13; and elsewhere. It has this proper signification here. Then it signifies that there is reckoned, counted, imputed to one something, which did not belong to him previous to such reckoning or imputation. So it is used in Num. xviii. 27, "And this your heave-offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshing-floor, and as the fulness of the wine-press." See also Lam. iv. 2, and many other places. In the first case we regard and treat persons according to what they personally are; in the second, according to what they relatively are. To impute sin in the first sense "is to charge guilt upon the guilty in a judicial way, with a view to his being punished for it." To impute sin in the second sense is to hold one liable in law for the acts of his representative. The doctrine of the Old and New Testaments on this point is the same. Thus Paul prayed that the sin of those who had deserted him, might not be laid to their charge, 2 Tim. iv. 16. Here we have the word in its first sense. And in Phil. 18, we have it in its second sense: "If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on my account." In all these cases the Hebrew and Greek words are those we render impute. God may and does charge upon the guilty their own sins; he may and does impute to Adam's posterity the sin of their federal head; he did impute to Christ the sins of his people; and he may and does impute to believers the righteousness of Christ. In all these cases the Scripture is clear and the testimony and teaching of orthodox Christians is almost unvarying. The clause under consideration speaks of the non-imputation of sin. To impute iniquity is to charge iniquity in condemnation, and to act accordingly. Not to impute sin is just the opposite. It is to remit the offence, pardon, forgive, absolve the sinner, cast his sins behind the back so as not to see them, bury them in the sea, remove them out of sight, blot them out, so that they rise not in judgment to condemn one. He, who receives such a favor receives another of great price, viz., purity of heart: And in whose spirit there is no guile. Septuagint: In whose mouth there is no guile. In Scripture guile is a name often given to sin. The reason is that sin is always deceitful, a falsehood, a lie. There is no honest sinning. If a transgressor is candid to men, he yet deceives himself, robs his own soul, robs God, lies to the Almighty and defrauds his Maker; or, in attempting to climb up some other way than through Christ, he is a thief and a robber. One must be regenerated before he can be "an Israelite in whom there is no guile." Clarke: In these two verses "four evils are mentioned: 1. Transgression; 2. Sin; 3. Iniquity; 4. Guile. The first signifies passing over a boundary; doing what is prohibited. The second signifies the missing of a mark, not doing what was commanded; but is often taken to express sinfulness; or sin in the nature, producing transgression in the life. The third signifies what is turned out of its course or situation;—anything morally distorted or perverted. Iniquity, what is contrary to equity or justice. The fourth signifies fraud, deceit, guile, etc. To remove these evils, three acts are mentioned:—Forgiving, covering, and not imputing. 1. TRANSGRESSION must be forgiven, borne away, i. e., by a vicarious sacrifice; for bearing away sin always implies this. 2. SIN must be covered, hidden from the sight. It is odious and abominable, and must be put out of sight. 3. INIQUITY, what is perverse or disturbed, must not be imputed, must not be reckoned to his account. 4. GUIL must be annihilated from the soul." In Rom. iv. 6-10 we have an inspired interpretation of the first three clauses of vv. 1, 2: "Even as David also describeth the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputeth righteousness without works, saying, [Paul quotes the Septuagint] Blessed are they whose iniquities are forgiven, and whose sins are covered. Blessed is the man to whom the Lord will not impute sin. Cometh this blessedness then upon the circumcision only, or upon the uncircumcision also? For we say that faith was reckoned to Abraham for righteousness. How was it then reckoned? when he was in circumcision, or in uncircumcision? Not in circumcision but in uncircumcision." These words taken in their connection clearly show: 1. That the forgiveness of sin and the justification of the believer are never separated; that the non-imputation of sin is always accompanied by the imputation of righteousness without works, which is Christ's righteousness. 2. Under every dispensation the method of justification is the same whether Abraham, David or a believer under the Gospel is concerned. 3. Justification in the full sense of the term, including both pardon and acceptance, lies at the foundation of all real blessedness to man. 4. Man, sinner as he is, may be received, regarded and treated as if he were righteous. 5. In justification, rites and ceremonies, even though they be instituted by God, do not effect our justification. Abraham was justified before his circumcision.

Having stated the blessedness of justification, David proceeds to narrate his own behaviour and experience respecting the commission and confession of sin.

3. When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long. For waxed old, others have wasted, wasted away, wore away, consumed, decayed. For roaring Boothroyd has pangs; others, crying. Kept silence, i. e., before God, or refrained from due confession. Diodati: "When I have not disburdened my conscience by a sincere confession of my sins to God, and have not with prayer sought the true means to obtain grace;" see v. 5. Some think that for eighteen months, all agree that for several months after David's first great wrong to Uriah he made even to God no full ingenuous confession of his sin. The child, which was the fruit of adultery, was born before Nathan visited David, 2 Sam. xi. 27; xii. 14. David had too much conscience to live easily under the burden of such sins; but as yet he had too little humility to confess the whole truth. He kept silence, but he was filled with tumults and perturbations. He had conscience of sin, which he believed to be unpardoned; but he was not roused to cry for forgiveness. Remorse was gnawing at his vitals. His spirits ran low by means of his disquietness. His sin was from the first fearfully aggravated, and David was too enlightened not to have painful apprehensions. Yet he stood out against all these. Doubtless he saw that when his people should by his own acknowledgment regard him as an adulterer and a murderer, it would naturally and terribly weaken the attachment of the pious to a dynasty headed by so great an offender. A thousand courses of false reasoning were doubtless suggested to him. Yet this concealment did not bring relief. Sins never grow out of date. There is no statute of limitation for crimes either at God's bar, or at the bar of conscience. And so his bones waxed old, wasted away, grew weak. His health threatened to fail him quite. Appetite failed. He forgot to take food. God held his eyes waking. Dry, profitless grief was drinking up his blood and spirits. His disquietness was terrible. It was like the roaring of a hunting lion, or of a ranging bear, or of a wild bull caught in a net. Roaring, almost uniformly used in Scripture to describe the roaring of lions hunting their prey, or figuratively of terrible warriors whose near approach strikes terror like the roar of a lion, or lastly the distress of a soul greatly disquieted, Job iii. 24; iv. 10; Ps. xxii. 1; Isa. v. 29; Ezek. xix. 7; Zech. xi. 3. There seems to be no warrant for Patrick's opinion that the allusion is to a wounded lion. This grief was all the day long, continually, or every day. Such distress had its judicial cause in his sins, but its effectual cause in divine providence and the power of God's Spirit:

4. For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me. Chaldee: For day and night thy stroke grew heavier upon me. The other ancient versions mainly agree with the English. Nor do the modern versions materially vary. God's hand was manifested in withholding wonted comforts of mind, and in letting loose an angry conscience. Such a state of things might well produce the most distressing effects. My moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Moisture, life-blood, vital moisture, freshness. Grief, especially such as that begotten by remorse, or by a sense of being forsaken of God, has always been noted for drying up the juices of the animal system, Ps. xxii. 15. The drought of summer was a strong figure in Judea, where there were but two rainy seasons in the year, and the summer was long, and hot, and dry. Respecting the summer of Palestine, Dr. Russell says: "From the end of May, if not sooner, not so much as one refreshing shower falls, and scarce a friendly cloud appears to shelter from the excessive heat of the sun till about the middle of September; the verdure of spring fades before the middle of May; and before the end of that month the whole country puts on so parched and barren an aspect, that one would scarce think it capable of producing anything, there being but very few plants which have vigor enough to resist the extreme heat." The drought of summer is therefore a very strong expression. There is nothing in the Hebrew to warrant the form of some ancient versions: I am turned in my anguish, whilst the thorn is fastened.

5. I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. The Arabic puts the first of these verbs in the present, and the second in the preterite. Fry puts both in the present. The Septuagint, Syriac, Ethiopic and Vulgate put both in the past tense. Amesius puts both in the future. The Chaldee, Venema, Jebb and Alexander follow the Hebrew and put the first verb in the future, and the second in the preterite. Those who think we have no right to anticipate I said, may well regard the common version as probably the best. But we have a right to supply I said at the beginning of the verse and then the Hebrew tenses should be followed. Acknowledged, literally caused to know. One ingenuous acknowledgment goes farther to secure peace of mind than all false disguises. When we know that we deal honestly with God and with our own consciences, we may safely hope that Jehovah will deal mercifully with us through Jesus Christ. Sin, nearly the same word and of the same signification as that so rendered in v. 1. Hid, in v. 1, covered. Iniquity, so rendered in v. 1. All this acknowledgement was made in accordance with a purpose. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD. Confess, it includes confession of sin and solemn worship and adoration with thanksgiving, 1 Kings viii. 33, 35; 2 Chron. vi. 24, 26; Ps. xxx. 12; Isa. xii. 1. And thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Forgavest, iniquity, sin, as in previous clauses. Chaldee: Thou didst remit the impiety of my sin forever; Arabic: Thou forgavest to me the iniquity of my heart; Syriac: Thou remittest to me all my sins; Vulgate and Doway: Thou hast forgiven the wickedness of my sin; Edwards: And so thou forgavest my heinous sin; Alexander: And thou didst take away the guilt of my sin.

6. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found. In lieu of the last clause several propose such words as these, acceptable time, seasonable time, time of finding, right time for finding.

For this evidently refers to what went before, viz., David's success in confession and prayer as recorded in v. 5. Godly, the same word is elsewhere rendered holy, merciful, good, in the plural often saints, Deut. xxxiii. 8; 2 Sam. xxii. 26; Mic. vii. 2; Ps. xxx. 4; xxxi. 23. Pray, so rendered in Ps. v. 2; lxxii. 15. Mayest be found, points to prayer seasonably offered, viz.: in the day of grace. Nor shall his prayer be unavailing: Surely in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him. From the time of the deluge floods of great waters fitly described overwhelming calamities. When they abound, the devout child of God shall have a high rock and shall be untouched. This interpretation agrees with the context, is natural, and is supported by the analogy of Scripture teaching. There is no good cause for searching out a recondite meaning when this is so obvious, and so well sustained. On him, whose sins are pardoned, overwhelming calamities shall have no power. The reason is given:

7. Thou art my hiding place. No calamities sweeping over the land, no fierceness and lawlessness of men can reach him, whose refuge is Jehovah. The punctuation of the next two clauses varies considerably. Thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Chaldee: Thou shalt preserve me from tribulation, with songs of redemption thou shalt encompass me; Syriac: Thou, preserve me, and from my enemies free me, encompass me with glory and salvation. With the common version virtually agree the church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Jebb and Alexander. A few, as Edwards and Hengstenberg, prefer the present tense. There is no good reason for materially varying from the common version, which is fully sustained by the Hebrew. Shalt preserve, see on Ps. xii. 7; xxv. 10, 21. Trouble, it is specially such as comes from the conduct of enemies. Sometimes in the singular it is rendered enemy, adversary: and often in the plural enemies, adversaries. See on Ps. iii. 1; iv. 1. Compass, surround, come round about, sometimes in a good and sometimes in a bad sense. We had it in Ps. xvii. 11; xviii. 5; xxii. 12, 16. It here expresses the abundance and the perfection of the deliverance wrought. Scott: "The Psalmist daily received so many mercies, which he celebrated with the songs of deliverance, that he was wholly compassed about with them."

8. I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye. The speaker in this place, some think, is God, who in response to the strong faith and joyful hope previously expressed gives this assurance. The Chaldee is striking: I will give thee understanding and will teach thee: in the way in which thou shalt walk I will counsel thee, and I will set mine eye upon thee for good. This is indeed paraphrase; but it is very good; we have none better. The first verb instruct closely corresponds with Maschil in the title of the Psalm and evidently alludes to it. The whole verse is a promise of divine guidance. That the eighth verse contains the words of God is the opinion of Ainsworth, Morison, Fry, Horsley and Clarke. Tholuck regards it as an oracular utterance like that of Ps. xl. 4. Horne regards the Redeemer as the speaker. Scott and Pool allow that either God or David may be the speaker, yet Pool evidently inclines to the latter view. But Calvin, Diodati, Patrick, Dodd, Mudge, Henry, Slade, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others think David is certainly the speaker here. The objection urged to making God the speaker is that it quite breaks the connection and allows the introduction of another, when David himself is desirous of giving instruction from his own experience. It must be admitted that there is force in the statement. Yet many undeniable instances might be found where the connection is, without any notice, interrupted by the introduction of another speaker. If the phrase guide thee with mine eye be understood as meaning no more than guiding by counsel drawn from experience and exercised with watchfulness, then is there nothing in v. 8, which may not be attributed to David. Hengstenberg regards Ps. li. 13, as parallel to this verse. Those, who thus expound this verse, regard the rest of the Psalm as pointing out the way in which David would warn us to go. But the remaining verses give the same lessons whether we regard God or David as the speaker. The first lesson respects docility :

9. Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding. Ancient and modern versions are usually agreed in giving the sense of these words: Be not stubborn, untractable. Show that you have mind, and know things beyond the brutes. The residue of the verse has caused much diversity: Whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee. It is generally agreed that the bit and bridle, or curb and rein, are for controlling these animals. To this many add the idea of ornament. But what is the meaning of Lest they come near unto thee? Calvin has, Lest they kick against thee; Horsley: Be ye not like a horse or a mule which no man can govern with a bridle; but the muzzle must compress his jaws, that he fall not upon thee. The original is elliptical and obscure. The last clause is literally, Not to come to thee, or There is not a coming to thee. Hammond's remarks are just and forcible: "Our English, that renders lest they come near unto thee, supposeth, without reason, that the use of the bridle is to keep the horse and mule from doing violence to thee, as if they were bears and tigers, and the like ravenous beasts. The true use is quite the contrary, to make them come to thee, or go, or turn the way that thou wouldest have them; and their not doing so is the effect of their obstinacy and want of managery; and that is it wherein we are forbidden to be like them." Having called them to docility and a right temper, he gives the lessons promised :

10. Many sorrows shall be to the wicked. In the Hebrew the verb is wanting. Many sorrows always have been, now are, and ever shall be to them. Calvin and Jebb have shall be. The Chaldee, Arabic, Syriac, church of England, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander supply a verb in the present tense, are, or remain. For sorrows in some versions we find plagues, pains, galling pains, wounds. The word is here found first in the Psalter. It is also in Ps. xxxviii. 17; lxix. 26; Jer. li. 8. Wicked, in Ps. i. and often ungodly. Such shall have sorrows: But he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him about. Trusteth, as in Ps. iv. 5; ix. 10; xxii. 4. Mercy, rendered goodness, kindness, loving-kindness, Ps. v. 7; vi. 4; xxxi. 7, 16, 21. The aim of the verse is a double contrast first, between men, one wicked, the other confiding in Jehovah; secondly, between the portions of such, one having many sorrows, the other having mercy compassing him. The mercy of the Lord puts a wall of fire around the righteous, a cloud of goodness over him, a bow of promise before him. The God of mercy is his God. Very fittingly does the Psalm close with the exhortation :

11. Be glad in the LORD and rejoice, ye righteous; and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart. We have here three verbs expressive of holy mirth. Be glad, rejoice, shout for joy. They are rendered be glad, exult, glory; rejoice, exult, sing for joy. They express the varied emotions and manifestations of joy, the calmest and the most exultant. The command thus to rejoice is given to the righteous and to the upright in heart. We had the first of these terms in Ps. i. 5, 6; the second, in Ps. vii.

16. They include the two chief characteristics of good men, who are just, justified, righteous, and upright, honest, sincere, earnest, holy in heart. All the saints have cause for these rejoicings.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. To deny our sinfulness is to deny our need of pardon, and to cut off all hope of salvation and of eternal happiness. Blessedness does not begin till pardon is received, v. 1, and an offer of pardon to the innocent is an insult.

2. Though the Bible is a sober book, it uses a variety of terms and phrases respecting sin, all of which are improper unless sin is a dreadful evil. In Ex. xxxiv. 7, we have iniquity, transgression and sin. Here we have the same and in addition guile, vv. 1, 2. Elsewhere other names and phrases mark it as rebellion, revolt, wickedness, a horrible thing, folly, madness, a lie, contempt of God, vileness, desperation. It discards all the principles of reason. It defies all the attributes of God. Left to itself it is incorrigible. It is blind to all that is glorious and terrible. It counts ruin a trifle, and puts the creature before the Creator. It makes its victims esteem God such an one as themselves. It forgets the infinite holiness of him, in whose eyes the heavens are not pure and the stars are not clean. God's indignation strikes no just and lasting terror into the stupid souls of wicked men, myriads of whom suppose the wrath of heaven may be averted by rites, the fires of hell extinguished by tears, and peace secured by self-inflicted tortures. Oh that all would "learn, 1, That sin draweth on a debt which no man can satisfy, such a debt as a man must perish, if it be not forgiven. 2. That sin is a filthiness which neither God can behold, without abominating the sinner, nor the guilty conscience can look upon without horror except it be covered. 3. That sin draweth on a guiltiness which may draw men to damnation if it shall be imputed. 4. That there is no justification of a sinner before God by his good works."

3. With the Lord is mercy and with him is plenteous redemption. To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses. It is his glory and his delight to forgive transgressions, cover sin, and not impute iniquity, vv. 1, 2. He still gives knowledge of salvation unto his people, Luke i. 77. He has exalted his Son a Prince and a Saviour to grant repentance and remission of sins unto Israel, Acts v. 31. Salvation is possible. To believers it is certain.

4. God's salvation is not partial. He not only pardons, he accepts as righteous. He does not impute iniquity, he does impute righteousness without works, vv. 1, 2; Rom. iv. 6-8. He not only saves from wrath, but he gives a right to the tree of life. The question is not between Christ's righteousness and our own, for we have none. All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags. The question for our sinful race is merely between Christ's righteousness and damnation. Without his merits, we perish. Nor can we have his righteousness otherwise than by its being set to our account. It is not imparted. It is imputed. We are invested with it. It is our linen white and clean. It is our glorious wedding garment.

5. Justification and sanctification are distinguishable but not separable. Where one exists, the other is not wanting. Where sin is forgiven, guile is banished, vv. 1, 2. Compare Rom. viii. 1. He, who believes that one may have God's favor and not his image also, that one may be under the smiles of heaven while he loves sin, and that God has no sentence of wrath against one who loves deceit, is already undone. Nothing but a miracle of mercy, opening his eyes, removing his deceptions, and converting his soul to God, will save him from a rueful eternity.

6. Of all the forms of sin none is more congenial with its nature than guile, deceit, falsehood, a lie, v. 2. Yet to deceive God is impossible; to deceive our fellow-men can do us no permanent good; and to deceive ourselves will ruin us. Berleberg Bible: "As children imagine that they are not seen, when they put their hands upon their eyes, and cover them so that they themselves see no one, in like manner, men act with equal folly, in supposing that their sins and crimes, when concealed from themselves, are also concealed from the all-seeing eye of God."

7. None have more need of thorough experience in religion than those, who would teach others, vv. 1-4.

8. Vital piety has a deadly foe in carnal security. It hinders all the good we might otherwise gain. It makes sinners and hypocrites cry, Peace and Safety, when destruction is at the door. It causes the truly pious to settle on their lees, and rest satisfied when their state is deplorable. Men may have some conscience of sin and yet deal treacherously with themselves and with God. Those, who think themselves well, seek no remedies.

9. Nor is carnal security less a foe to solid peace. It strengthens delusions, which in the end only heighten misery. Even in their progress they commonly torment. Calvin: "It often happens that those are tortured with the sharpest grief, who gnaw the bit, and inwardly devour their sorrow, and keep it enclosed, and shut up within, without discovering it, although afterwards they are seized as with sudden madness, and the force of their grief bursts forth with the greater impetus the longer it has been restrained." Arnd: "Melancholy arising from Sin consumes away the body, reduces it to a wretched condition, and gives rise to a secret weeping at heart, so that there is constantly a howling."

10. The distinction between the judicial and fatherly forgiveness of God is sound and Scriptural. Immediately upon David's saying to Nathan, "I have sinned against the Lord; Nathan said unto David, The Lord also hath put away thy sin." Yet after this David wrote Psalm li. and had the experience here described in v. 3-5. Tholuck: "The prophet pronounced forgiveness; but it was a different thing for David to appropriate and rejoice in it before the Lord."

11. Sin is a dreadful entanglement. One sin leads to another, evil begetting evil without end, unless the grace of God steps in to break the fearful succession. David looked—lusted—committed adultery—resorted to artifice—stained his soul with innocent blood—for a long time virtually justified himself—grew obstinate and irritable and would soon have plunged into ruin, had not the love of God sought and humbled him.

12. The sorrows of unpardoned sin may at any moment become intolerable, wasting our health and sinking us into despondency and even despair, vv. 3, 4. No fire burns like the wrath of God dropped into a guilty conscience. No hurts are so fearful as those of a spirit wounded by transgression.

13. The Scriptural doctrine of confession of sin is of great importance and holds a prominent place in both Testaments, vv. 3-5. The confession here mentioned is not auricular to a priest, so much extolled by Romanists; nor that mutual confession of infirmities commended by an Apostle, James v. 16; nor acknowledgments of wrongs done to a brother, Luke xvii. 3, 4; but that confession which is due to God alone as Lord of conscience and final Judge. On this the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments are clear and harmonious, Pr. xxviii. 13; 1 John i. 8-10. All godly confession of sin is full, ingenuous, humble, penitent. Henry: "Those, that would have the comfort of the pardon of their sins, must take shame to themselves by a penitent confession of them." That such confession is necessary is clear, 1, from the command of God; 2, from the example of good men; 3, from the nature of the case, no man being ready to forsake sin, until he is prepared to confess it; and no man being in a mood to acknowledge the mercy of pardon for a sin, whose heinousness he is not ready to admit.

14. The excellency of confession consists not in any merit that is in it as some vainly dream, but as it is an act demanded by the simple truth in the case, and as it makes God's gracious pardon a welcome gift. The connection between confession and pardon is close and intimate. We cannot love and cherish God's enemies, and love and fear him at the same time. God is more ready to forgive sin than we are to forsake it, or confess it, v. 5.

15. To everything there is a season. Especially is there a time to turn to the Lord by confession and prayer. The wise call upon God when there is a possibility of finding him, v. 6. Isa. lv. 6. There will be praying at the judgment day and in hell, but it will be too late. God will not then hear.

16. If we have had an experience of God's methods of dealing with souls, we should first profit by it ourselves, and then modestly let it be known that others may avoid our errors, and avail themselves of the encouragements afforded by our success at the mercy-seat, v. 6. One right act may have a very wide scope. Praying people are safe in times of the most overwhelming calamities. The floods of great waters shall not come nigh unto them.

17. Dickson: "Experience of God's mercies bygone should fasten resolution to make use of faith hereafter in all troubles. After one trouble the godly should prepare for another, after one delivery expect another," v. 7.

18. Whether God or his servants invite us to be instructed, we should attend unto the things which are spoken for our learning, v. 8.

19. Henry: "Those are best able to teach others the grace of God, who have themselves had the experience of it; and those who are themselves taught of God, ought to tell others what he has done for their souls," v. 8.

20. In any pursuit in life the right temper is of great importance; but in receiving instruction a wrong temper is fatal. He, whose only resemblance to the horse consists in his restiveness, and he, who resembles the mule only in his obstinacy, will make no progress in learning the lessons of salvation. Submission, docility, quietness are essential. Sin has no worse effect on man's character than in gendering that dreadful perverseness, which precludes amendment.

21. Our headlong and headstrong dispositions will in some way meet a terrible check. Berleberg Bible: "If we do not consent to serve God willingly, we must serve him in the long run whether we will or not. He, who runs away from God's willing service, falls into his compulsory service. On this account the wise Stoic prayed, 'Lead me, O God, the way which thou hast chosen: and if I will not, nothing is better than that I be compelled.' Recourse is not had to bit and bridle, unless we will not become wise by gentler means. God employs these for the purpose of delivering us from destroying ourselves."

22. The miseries of the unconverted are inconceivably dreadful. Over them depravity reigns; guilt loads their souls with its fiery chains; ignorance blinds their minds; and they have no might to do good. God, the stars and all nature will yet fight against the impenitent. Many sorrows shall be to the wicked, v. 10. The connection between sin and misery is closer than that between soul and body—it is inseparable. Though the wicked exalt himself as the eagle, and though he set his nest among the stars, thence will God bring him down. Sinners have to bear all their troubles alone. They know not God. They have no access to the mercy-seat. The only remedy for human woe is found in Christ. Because sinners reject him, they have nothing but wretchedness left them. The righteous get good out of all the evil that befalls them; but the wicked so pervert everything as to get evil out of all the good sent them.

23. Both Testaments rightly make it the duty of God's servants to be filled with holy joy, even in times of trial, bereavement and tribulation, v. 10. They have good cause of exultation. Mercy compasses them about.

24. If the righteous may so rejoice even to exultation, while they are yet in the vale of sorrow and on the battle-field of life, what will not their rejoicings be when the war shall be ended, and God himself shall come forth to bless them?

25. Even in this life real blessedness is possible, vv. 1, 11. It is all laid in the pardon of sin, and in a free justification. If guilt makes men cowards, pardon and acceptance make them intrepid. If guilt poisons every cup of joy, justification sweetens every cup of anguish. If guilt makes death the king of terrors, an interest in Christ makes the believer shout, "Death is swallowed up in victory." If guilt shall make the wicked in the last day cry to the rocks and to the mountains to fall on them and cover them from the face of him that sitteth on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb, the right, which believers have to the tree of life, shall give them boldness in the day of judgment. The sinner saved by grace has all things and abounds, because he has Christ for his sacrifice and Christ for his righteousness. Bouchier: "The criminal may be pardoned; but he is returned into a scorning world with a tainted name and a ruined character. He is released from the temporal penalty of his guilt to seek shelter and subsistence where he may, compelled almost to return to the former associates of his sin, as the only beings who will admit him into their brotherhood without a sneer or a reproach. No friendly voice is by his side to instruct and teach him in the way he should go, no eye looks kindly on him to guide and direct him." Worse than all he has no peace within, no change of heart. Left to himself he is as vile as ever he was. But the sinner, who has fled to Jesus, finds all he needs; grace, friends, a home, eternal oblivion of his past crimes, and assurance of everlasting victory over all his foes. O how amazing is the Gospel Plan.

26. And now, dear reader, will you accept the pardon offered, the salvation provided? Now is your time. If out of Christ, this may be your last call to salvation. Why will you die? How can you escape if you neglect so great salvation? What will you say, when God shall punish you? Will you confess your sin, accept Christ and be saved? WILL YOU?

PSALM XXXIII.

- 1 Rejoice in the LORD, O ye righteous: for praise is comely to the upright.
- 2 Praise the LORD with harp: sing unto him with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings.
- 3 Sing unto him a new song; play skilfully with a loud noise.
- 4 For the word of the LORD is right; and all his works are done in truth.
- 5 He loveth righteousness and judgment: the earth is full of the goodness of the LORD.
- 6 By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.
- 7 He gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap: he layeth up the depth in storehouses.
- 8 Let all the earth fear the LORD: let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him.
- 9 For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast.
- 10 The LORD bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought: he maketh the devices of the people of none effect.
- 11 The counsel of the LORD standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.
- 12 Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD; and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance.
- 13 The LORD looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men.
- 14 From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth.
- 15 He fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works.
- 16 There is no king saved by the multitude of a host: a mighty man is not delivered by much strength.
- 17 A horse is a vain thing for safety; neither shall he deliver any by his great strength.
- 18 Behold, the eye of the LORD is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy;
- 19 To deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine.
- 20 Our soul waiteth for the LORD: he is our help and our shield.
- 21 For our heart shall rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name.
- 22 Let thy mercy, O LORD, be upon us, according as we hope in thee.

IN the Hebrew this Psalm has no title. The inscriptions given it by several of the ancient versions are without authority. "In eight of Kennicott's MSS. this Psalm is written as part of the preceding." Venema says: "I have joined these two Psalms together because the latter is not only subordinate to the former, but because, as Lyra testifies, some suppose that they are to be taken as one. This is plain partly in the want of a title in Ps. xxxiii. and partly from the obvious connection of the last verse of Ps. xxxii. with the subject of this ode." Yet the last verse of Ps. xxxii. is to it a very fit termination; and the first clause of v. 1 is as fit a heading to Ps. xxxiii. But few agree with Venema, and we shall not spend more time on the matter. We have already considered Psalms i. ii. and x. neither of which has a title.

The Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic and Vulgate ascribe this Psalm to David. So also do the great mass of learned men. This may be correct. There is nothing in the style to forbid the supposition. The writer was but the penman of the Holy Ghost.

Commentators have not agreed on the occasion on which the Psalm was written. It contains no marks pointing out any such. The Psalm was well suited to many periods of the ancient church. From vv. 7, 9, 10, 15, 16, 18, Dodd thinks it was probably composed by David to celebrate the deliverance of Israel at the Red sea, and God's conduct of his people through the wilderness. Perhaps more unite in supposing that it celebrates the wisdom, power and goodness of God in creation and providence than in any other one view. The names of the Most High in this song are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. Scott dates it B. C. 1034; Clarke gives no date. Amyrald: "The style is pleasing, flowing, measured, without any poetical digressions or figures, at least of such a kind as to occasion any difficulty."

1. Rejoice in the Lord, O ye righteous. The translations of this clause vary only in the strength of the word used for rejoice, as sing praises before the Lord, praise him, leap for joy, exult. Alexander: "The Hebrew verb, according to the etymologists, originally means to dance for joy, and is therefore a very strong expression for the liveliest exultation." The summons is to the righteous, the just. The reason for thus rejoicing is: For praise is comely for the upright. Pious exultation, publicly expressed, with gratitude for mercies, becomes good men. If the upright refuse to praise the Lord, who shall extol him? Comely, seemly, desirable, beautiful. Calvin: "The real meaning is that there is no exercise in which they can be better employed." Praise is often commanded; to it amazing mercies summon all the saints; it is a great privilege, refreshing the heart, reviving the spirit and exciting others to the same blessed service. All the upright have countless reasons for praising God.

2. Praise the Lord with harp: sing unto him with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings. The first verb is the same noticed in Ps. xxxii. 5, and there and elsewhere rendered confess. When we acknowledge God's mercies, we oblige ourselves to the work of thanksgiving. The second verb sing is often rendered sing praises. We met it in Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2; xviii. 49. It occurs often. The first name here given to a musical instrument is uniformly rendered harp; the second, when it designates a musical instrument, is always rendered psaltery, except in few cases where it is viol; the third, when used on this subject is always rendered as here an instrument of ten strings. See Ps. xcii. 3; cxliv. 9. The and is not in the Hebrew, and some make the passage speak of but two instruments, the psaltery being of ten strings as they suppose. So Venema, Hammond, Edwards, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander. But others fitly agree with our version; as Calvin, Ainsworth, Amesius. For psaltery some read lute or lyre. But the names of musical instruments in the Bible are the torment of translators and scholiasts. We do not certainly know the shape, size, or power of any of them; though it is generally supposed that all those mentioned in this verse were stringed instruments.

3. Sing unto him a new song. This clause could hardly be rendered otherwise, if a decent respect should be paid to the Hebrew and the English. The verb sing and the noun song in both languages have the same origin. The only peculiarity in the clause arises from the word new. What does it mean? Some think the prophet says his themes are not sufficiently celebrated in any sacred ode of his time, and so he calls the just and the upright to unite in a song, with which they were not as yet familiar. Calvin regards new as equivalent to rare and choice. "It is no common song, therefore, which he exhorts them to sing, but a song corresponding to the magnificence of the subject." Hengstenberg: "A new song is a song which springs up from the heart." Compare Ps. xxxiii. 3; xcvi. 1; xcvi. 1; Rev. v. 9. The glory of God is new every morning. New mercies demand new praises. Play skilfully with a loud noise. Chaldee: Behave beautifully by singing in a joyful shout; church of England: Sing praises lustily unto him with a good courage; Calvin: Sing loudly with joyfulness; Venema: Play elegantly well with a loud noise; Amesius: Play in the best style with a loud noise; Edwards: Play skilfully, and sing with exalted voices; Hengstenberg: Play skilfully with shouts of joy; Alexander: "The import of the clause is substantially the same as that of the first: Render a strong and striking testimony to the praise and honor of God."

4. For the word of the Lord is right. Calvin supposes the term word here signifies counsel or ordinance. Alexander: "The word here meant is the word of promise;" Hengstenberg: "The Psalmist speaks of God's truth and faithfulness;" Pool makes it comprehend "all God's counsels and commands;" Gill, "the revealed word of God;" Tholuck, "God's promises." If there was any conceivable sense, in which the word of the Lord was not right, holy, just, good, wise, true and pure, our hope would perish. He who will not execute his threatenings, cannot be relied on to fulfil his promises. We cannot trust God in any respect, unless we can trust him in all respects. It does not diminish the force of the passage to make it express a universal truth. As is God's word, so are his doings. And all his works are done in truth, i. e., in sincerity, in faithfulness, with uniformity and stability. Jehovah's ways are not fickle, or changeable. We know what we are doing when we rely on him. In creation and providence are not found gins, and snares, and traps to catch the honest. Luther: "What the Lord has spoken, that he holds for certain. We cannot argue for a revelation, nor against the wiles of the devil, unless we believe God to be true." Even Balaam's Theology taught him, "God is not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken and shall he not make it good?" Num. xxiii. 19.

5. He loveth righteousness and judgment. God is one in essence and excellence. His character is a perfect whole. The Chaldee and Syriac quite agree with the English, but the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Vulgate read, He loveth mercy and judgment. The first of these nouns never means mercy, but always right, justice or righteousness. Our version is supported by the church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander. For judgment some read justice. The extent, to which Jehovah carries his love of righteousness and judgment, is that he has never done a wrong, and never taken sides with a wrong doer. Jehovah could not cease to love righteousness and judgment without ceasing to be. Nor is the divine character and conduct marked by mere uprightness and purity. The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord. The earth, the same word generally so rendered. Goodness, in vv. 18, 22; Ps. v. 7; vi. 4; xxxii. 10, mercy; in Ps. xvii. 7, loving-kindness. In creation all things show God's goodness, his benevolence, and moral excellence. In providence his goodness, loving-kindness and mercy appear. In redemption they shine forth illustriously. Creation and providence are here specially referred to. There is not a little sprinkling of the divine goodness in the world. The earth is full of it.

6. By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth. Instead of breath, the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Calvin, Doway and Ainsworth have spirit. The Word of God is a name expressly given to Christ, John i. 1. Many suppose that the doctrine of the divine personality of the Son and Spirit of God is here taught. Scott: "Most of the ancient expositors, by the Word of the LORD, and the breath, or spirit of his mouth, understand the Son of God, the personal Word, and the Holy Spirit, as proceeding from the Father and the Son." It is as certain as inspiration can make it that the Son of God did create all things, John i. 3; Heb. i. 2. It is no less certain that the Holy Spirit is Creator, Gen. i. 2; Job xxvi. 13. So that those referred to by Scott teach no error, but that which is clearly supported by God's truth. The heavens is a name given to the universal frame of nature, the great part of which is above and around us. The host of heaven points to the sun, moon and stars, and to the angels.

7. He gathereth the waters of the sea together as a heap. For gathereth some read gathered. Perhaps this is better. The clause refers to the work of God stated in Gen. i. 9, 10, and continued in providence, Job xxxviii. 8-11; Jer. v. 22. Heap is the best rendering. See Ex. xiv. 22; xv. 8; Ps. lxxviii. 13. The notable thing to which our attention is called is that at the creation and ever since the water, which is the very emblem of instability (Gen. xlix. 4), God has gathered into seas and large bodies and keeps it there with such uniformity, as to make safe an abode even on the sea-shore. All this is the more wonderful as the seas are on the outside of a ball moving with a rapidity more than two thousand times greater than the ordinary speed attained on our best railroads. Nay, more, Jehovah puts away the waters in secret places: He layeth up the depth in store-houses. Some read in the cellars of the abysses; others, in treasures or treasuries. There are vast caverns in the earth filled with water, in Scripture called the fountains of the great deep, Gen. vii. 11. David tells us of the paths of the sea; and a remarkable scientific book of modern times begins thus: "There are rivers in the sea."

8. Let all the earth fear the LORD. He, who built and upholds the world, is surely a being of awful majesty and infinite glory. His worship must be reverential. His favor must be ineffable bliss. His wrath must be inconceivably dreadful. Worms may trifle with worms. But God is to be greatly feared and had in reverence. All the earth was made by him. His supporting hand withdrawn, all nature would fall headlong. There is good reason for fearing him. Let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him. If the human mind can stand in awe at any time, or for any cause, it should be at thoughts of God, or in beholding the amazing displays of his adorable nature. World, parallel to earth in the first clause.

9. For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast. See on verse 6. It would be better to omit the word done. In sublimity of style this verse is nearly parallel to the words of Moses, Gen. i. 3, noted by Longinus and other critics as furnishing a very striking specimen of the sublime in writing.

10. The LORD bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought. Some render the verb dissipates. Even as the sun scatters the mist, so when God sets himself against any plan, or counsel, of the wicked, there is presently nothing of it left. Calvin and Jebb have scattereth; Edwards, hath baffled; Alexander, has annulled. Heathen, also rendered nations, Gentiles. The ease, with which God annuls the counsels of men, is illustrated in the history of every age. The cackling of geese once defeated a wise plan for destroying an empire. The First Cause of all things, holds all second causes in his hand, and can subvert any plot in a moment, and by means and instruments esteemed the most contemptible. He maketh the devices of the people of none effect. Devices, inventions, thoughts. People, in the plural number, peoples, parallel to heathen, in the preceding clause. He maketh of none effect, breaketh, discourageth, disalloweth the thoughts of the people. Under his rule nothing wicked can stand. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic and Vulgate add a clause to this verse, "and frustrates the counsels of princes." But this is not in the Hebrew, Chaldee, or Syriac. It is doubtless mere paraphrase.

11. The counsel of the LORD standeth forever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations. Standeth, literally shall stand. Here counsel and thoughts precisely correspond to counsel and devices in v. 10. Many causes make human plans and purposes feeble and uncertain; infinite perfections make God's plans and counsels immovable and infallible. Because he is God, and all his enemies worms, he shall establish all his thoughts. For ever, to eternity.

12. Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1; xxxii. 1. Such a nation shall be protected, guided, defended, have peace, prosperity, success, stability. If God is with a people, their cause is safe. He repeats: And [blessed is] the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance. Both clauses refer to the Jewish people, who alone at that time were as a nation acquainted with the true God, and in covenant with him. But it was to the pious portion of the nation that the richest blessings came. The church is here clearly spoken of. The truth asserted is of universal application.

13. The LORD looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men.

14. From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth. All the ancient versions, together with Calvin, Jebb, Fry and Alexander put all these verbs in the preterite. Ainsworth, Venema, Amesius, Edwards and Hengstenberg with the English use the present tense. In both verses this seems best to suit the scope of the argument. The theme of the Psalmist is God's universal and particular providence over human affairs. This providence the wicked often deny, Ps. x. 11. But here we are told God does see, look, behold all the sons of men, all the inhabitants of the earth. Not one is above his ken, beneath his notice, or beyond his grasp. He looks not as an idle spectator, but as a Judge and Governor, from the place of his habitation, or as Calvin, from the dwelling-place of his throne. Compare Pr. xv. 3; Ecc. xii. 14.

15. He fashioneth their hearts alike. In rendering this clause there is some diversity. Jebb closely adheres to the English. He fashioned alike their hearts. Amesius most closely follows the Hebrew and probably gives the sense: He is equally the former of their heart. God is the maker of all hearts and turns them as he will. God's providence embraces the free acts of rational creatures. He considereth all their works. The Syriac has considereth; the other ancient versions, Calvin, Jebb and Fry, understandeth; Venema, distinctly understandeth; Edwards, observeth; Boothroyd, inspecteth; Hengstenberg, marketh. Ainsworth: He discreetly attendeth unto all their works. Jehovah knows, searches, weighs, considers all that men think, say or do. "Nothing in the circumstances of any of his creatures can remove them from the penetrating search of that eye which is as a flame of fire."

16. There is no king saved by the multitude of a host. In doctrine the passage is of the same import as that in Ps. xlv. 5-8. It has historic illustration in 1 Sam. xiv. 4-23; 1 Kings xx. 20, 21; 2 Chron. xiv. 9-17. Modern history is full of remarkable instances showing the same truth. The reason, why numbers count nothing as against God and his providence, is that all creatures, if left to themselves, are foolish and powerless. There is no proportion between all finite force and skill on the one hand, and infinite wisdom and energy on the other. Even when a cause is good and its friends are successful, they are so by the blessing of the Lord. It is added: A mighty man is not delivered by much strength. For mighty man many read giant. Strength as in Ps. xxii. 15; xxxi. 10; also rendered force, might, power. Even good men are not saved by inherent strength, independently of God. But human power arrayed against God's plans and authority is like stubble before the flame. The strongest man is no more than the weakest; the mightiest army, if arrayed against Omnipotence, is no more than a squad.

17. A horse is a vain thing for safety; neither shall he deliver any by his great strength. Syriac: Deceitful is the safety of a horse, nor by the abundance of his strength shall he rescue his rider. The English closely adheres to the Hebrew, except that for vain thing, the original has a lie. The truth here taught is repeated in Pr. xxi. 31.

18. Behold, the eye of the LORD is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy; i. e., God's eye is upon them for good. He looks to them; he has respect to them, Isa. lxvi. 2; Gen. iv. 5, 6. He watches them day and night. Calvin: "A doubt might creep into the minds of the weak, whether God would extend this protection to every individual; but when the psalmist introduces him as keeping watch and ward, as it were, over the safety of the faithful, there is no reason why any one of them should tremble, or hesitate with himself a moment longer, since it is certain that God is present with him to assist him, provided he remain quietly under his providence." The objects of this tender care are described as both fearing and hoping. Upon such the eye of God is constantly set:

19. To deliver their soul from death, and to keep them alive in famine. "In him we live and move and have our being." Compare Acts xiv. 17. It is only through the mercy of God that earth is not covered with perpetual sterility, and stripped of all its inhabitants. But such is the divine goodness that in the greatest exigencies God's people may safely trust in him. He will either keep them alive by miracle as he did some of old, or by ordinary means as he commonly does, or he will take them to himself, thus at once setting them free from all troubles. God's goodness in time of scarcity has been wonderfully illustrated many a time, especially in days of persecution. See the histories of those times and the lives of martyrs and confessors. The result of all this teaching and experience is most happy.

20. Our soul waiteth for the LORD. Waiting on God implies a quiet and submissive spirit, a conscientious discharge of known duty, heartiness and earnestness of soul in expecting deliverance at the right time and in the right way. Sometimes it points to the pious believing expectation of a coming Messiah, Isa. xxv. 9; Luke ii. 25. Again it refers to his coming to effect any needed deliverance, Isa. viii. 17; Lam. iii. 26. Impatience is an enemy to waiting, Ps. xl. 1. Living in sin shows that we have no proper regard to God. Not to expect is to despise or despair. Waiting is one of the exercises of that fear and hope, mentioned in v. 19. The next clause shows that waiting is not a hopeless duty. He is our help and our shield. Help, as in Ps. xx. 2; in Ps. cxv. 9, 10, 11, as here, it is united with shield. On the shield and its use see Ps. iii. 3.

21. For our heart shall rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name. Experience confirms everything taught in God's word; and all the trust of the pious leads to joy, giving them irrefragable proof of the truth of the religious system which they have embraced.

22. Let thy mercy, O LORD, be upon us, according as we hope in thee. Alexander: "The claim in reality amounts to a petition that as God had given the desire he would fulfil it." Great faith brings great mercies; great hope shall issue in great deliverances.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Rejoicing in God must be a principal duty of pious men, v. 1; Ps. xxxii. 11; etc. Joy in the Lord is one of the bonds between the old and new dispensations, one of the bonds between the church militant and the church triumphant.

2. True joy in God has fit expression in devout praise, v. 1. "Is any merry, let him sing Psalms." Dickson: "There is no exercise more becoming the godly, than praising of God, whether we look to the object of the praise, which is God; or whether we look to their obligation above all people in the world; for praise is comely to the upright. And there is no exercise whereunto we have more need to be stirred up, than to praise; such is our dulness, and such is the excellency and necessity of the work."

3. The praises offered to God should be of the most spirited kind, v. 2. We should stir ourselves up to take hold on him. Henry: "Here is a good rule for this duty: 'Do it skilfully, and with a loud noise; let it have the bent both of head and heart; let it be done intelligently, and with a clear head; affectionately, and with a warm heart.'"

4. The second and third verses of this Psalm bring directly before us the subject of instrumental music. A few things are here offered on the propriety of now employing such music in public worship.

a. It is entirely certain that the primitive Christians did not use any instruments of music in their public worship. This is plain from the teachings of Justin Martyr, Chrysostom and Theodoret. On Psalms cxliii. cxlix. Chrysostom, and on our Psalm v. 2, Theodoret give decisive testimony. It is collected in Bingham, Vol. II. pp. 494, 495. Chrysostom says "it was only permitted to the Jews as sacrifice was, for the heaviness and grossness of their souls. God condescended to their weakness, because they were lately drawn off from idols; but now instead of organs, we may use our own bodies to praise him withal."

b. It is certain that organs were not introduced into Christian churches anywhere till at least as late as the middle of the thirteenth century. Thomas Aquinas says expressly, "Our church does not use musical instruments, as harps and psalteries, to praise God withal that she may not seem to Judaize." Both Protestants and Romanists admit this testimony to be decisive as to the fact that instruments were not used as late as the time of the great Schoolman, A. D. 1250.

c. It is quite clear from Scripture that instruments of music were used before the days of Moses to express the joyful feelings of the heart, Job xxx. 31.

d. Few will deny the lawfulness of using instruments of music in private to raise the joyous emotions of the soul, even in devotion. Such a view would generally be regarded as extreme.

e. The introduction of instruments of music in aid of sacred song is not a provision of the law of Moses. This came in the days of David. It was no essential part of the ceremonial institute of the great prophet who wrote the pentateuch.

f. In discussing and settling this question it will not aid in finding the truth to lose our tempers and employ harsh and extravagant language, as is too often done.

g. Those who decline or refuse the use of instrumental music themselves, ought not to judge their brethren who think it profitable. "Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?"

h. Brethren who wish to have instrumental music, ought not to use their liberty maliciously. It is not right to make a schism in the body of Christ on such points.

i. Those who insist on the sinfulness of employing these aids are in all fairness bound to produce at least one clear text, or adduce a fair and plain inference from some passage of Scripture, sustaining their views.

j. If instruments are used in public worship, it ought to be only as aids to congregational singing. Where they discourage this, they are an intolerable offence. "Light and silly voluntaries, long and unmeaning interludes between the stanzas, loud accompaniment, fancy stop, and see-saw swell-playing, and other things similar," should be wholly discountenanced.

k. In very high latitudes the Moravians found the organ of great use in aiding the people in keeping their voices from sinking to a low key.

l. It will probably interest the reader to see the views of two eminent worthies on this subject. Calvin: "It is evident that the Psalmist here expresses the vehement and ardent affection which the faithful ought to have in praising God, when he enjoins musical instruments to be employed for this purpose. He would have nothing omitted by believers which tends to animate the minds and feelings of men in singing God's praises. The name of God, no doubt, can, properly speaking, be celebrated only by the articulate voice; but it is not without reason that David adds to this those aids by which believers were wont to stimulate themselves the more to this exercise; especially considering that he was speaking to God's ancient people. There is a distinction, however, to be observed here, that we may not indiscriminately consider as applicable to ourselves everything which was formerly enjoined upon the Jews. I have no doubt that playing upon cymbals, touching the harp and the viol, and all that kind of music which is so frequently mentioned in the Psalms, was a part of the education; that is to say, the puerile instruction of the law: I speak of the stated service of the temple. For even now, if believers choose to cheer themselves with musical instruments, they should, I think, make it their object not to dis sever their cheerfulness from the praises of God. But when they frequent their sacred assemblies, musical instruments in celebrating the praises of God would be no more suitable than the burning of incense, the lighting up of lamps, and the restoration of the other shadows of the Law. The Papists, therefore, have foolishly borrowed this, as well as many other things from the Jews. Men who are fond of outward pomp may delight in that noise; but the simplicity which God recommends to us by the apostle is far more pleasing to him. Paul allows us to bless God in the public assembly of the saints only in a known tongue, 1 Cor. xiv, 16. The voice of man, although not understood by the generality, assuredly excels all inanimate instruments of music; and yet we see what St. Paul determines concerning speaking in an unknown tongue. What shall we then say of chanting, which fills the ears with nothing but an empty sound? Does any one object that music is very useful for awakening the minds of men and moving their hearts? I own it; but we should always take care that no corruption creep in, which might both defile the pure worship of God and involve men in superstition. Moreover, since the Holy Spirit expressly warns us of this danger by the mouth of Paul, to proceed beyond what we are there warranted by him, is not only, I must say, unadvised zeal, but wicked and perverse obstinacy."

It is probable the views of Calvin are as strong, and as strongly expressed as any person on that side of the question would desire. On the other side Richard Baxter, in his Christian Directory, Works, vol. v., pp. 499-501, thus delivers himself: "Quest. cxxvii., Is church-music by organs or such instruments lawful?

Answer. I know that in the persecuted and poorer times of the church, none such were used (when they had not temples, nor always a fixed meeting place.) And that the author of the Quest. et Resp. in Justin Martyr speaketh against it. And I grant, 1. That as it is in the power of weak, diseased Christians, to make many things unlawful to their brethren lest we be hurtful to them, and to deprive us of much, not only of our liberties but our helps, so in abundance of congregations, church-music is made unlawful by accident, through their mistake. For it is unlawful (cæteris paribus) by an unnecessary thing to occasion divisions in the churches; but where one part judgeth church-music unlawful, for another part to use it, would occasion divisions in the churches, and drive away the other part. Therefore I would wish church-music to be nowhere set up, but where the congregation can accord in the use of it; or at least where they will not divide thereupon. 2. And I think it unlawful to use such strains of music as are light, or as the congregation cannot easily be brought to understand; much more on purpose to commit the whole work of singing to the choristers, and exclude the congregation. I am not willing to join in such a church where I shall be shut out of this noble work of praise. 3. But plain intelligible church-music, which occasioneth not divisions, but the church agreeth in, for my part I never doubted to be lawful. For, 1. God set it up long after Moses' ceremonial Law, by David, Solomon, etc.

2. It is not an instituted ceremony merely, but a natural help to the mind's alacrity: and it is a duty and not a sin to use the helps of nature and lawful art, though not to institute sacraments, etc., of our own. As it is lawful to use the comfortable helps of spectacles in reading the Bible, so is it of music to exhilarate the soul towards God.

3. Jesus Christ joined with the Jews that used it, and never spake a word against it.

4. No Scripture forbiddeth it, therefore it is not unlawful.

5. Nothing can be against it, that I know of, but what is said against tunes and melody of voice. For whereas they say that it is a human invention; so are our tunes (and metre, and versions.) Yea, it is not a human invention; as the last psalm and many others show, which call us to praise the Lord with instruments of music.

And whereas it is said to be a carnal kind of pleasure, they may say as much of a melodious, harmonious concert of voices, which is more excellent music than any instruments.

And whereas some say that they find it do them harm, so others say of melodious singing: but as wise men say they find it do them good. And why should the experience of some prejudiced self-conceited person, or of a half-man that knoweth not what melody is, be set against the experience of all others, and deprive them of all such helps and mercies, as these people say they find no benefit by.

And as some deride church-music by many scornful names, so others do by singing (as some congregations near me testify, who these many years have forsaken it, and will not endure it: but their pastor is fain to unite them, by the constant and total omission of singing psalms.) It is a great wrong that some do to ignorant Christians, by putting such whimsies and scruples into their heads, which as soon as they enter, turn that to a scorn, and snare, and trouble, which might be a real help and comfort to them, as it is to others."

m. The author knows not how better to close remarks on this subject than by quoting with entire approbation a sentence or two from Morison: "Never let it be forgotten, that no sounds of the most exquisite harmony, whether proceeding from human voices, or from harp of sweetest sound, can be acceptable with Jehovah, if the music of a redeemed heart does not give tone and emphasis to the song of praise. It is infallibly certain that there can be no religion in mere sounds of any description, unless the worshipper sings with grace in his heart, making melody unto the Lord."

5. We may rest assured that whatever affects the joyful solemnity of God's worship is not unimportant, v. 3.

6. A broad foundation for pious confidence is laid in the truth and excellence of God's word, v. 4. If one precept, promise, doctrine, threatening, or prediction of God could fail, then indeed we would be undone. But that can never be.

7. The uniformity, stability and righteousness of providence in administering human affairs, and especially in carrying out the principles of Holy Scripture in all things to which they apply are truly admirable, v. 4. All the events of providence "make up a harmony of well-ruled concords and discords."

8. In all earthly affairs change is the order of things. The winds, the tides, the seasons, the face of nature, and even friends change, but in all our calculations we may rely on the immutable holiness, justice and goodness of God, v. 5. The Judge of all the earth will do right. He never errs, never wrongs a creature, never is unkind.

9. Creation and providence, stars and seas, the heavens and the laws of matter all publish the claim of Jehovah to supreme and holy worship, vv. 6, 7. If the Creator and Governor of the world is not to be adored, religious worship can never be regarded as proper. If it is not due to him who made and keeps us, who feeds and clothes us, it is due to none.

10. Sentiments of profound reverence for God should be felt by all men, if they even consulted nature alone, vv. 8, 9. "His omnipotence, manifested in framing and settling the world at a word, should move men to fear him."

11. No weapon formed against Zion shall prosper, v. 10. If plans and plots, counsels and devices, the most cunning and the most cruel, could have injured the church of God, there had not been left even a small remnant. Long, long ago the enemy hoped to make a full end of the worship and service of God on earth; but he has failed, and shall ever fail.

12. God's counsels and thoughts being all infinitely holy, just and good, could not be changed but for the worse, and all his perfections forbid any change whatever. All is right, when God plans it. All is sure to come to pass because he has planned it. The more they are tried, the firmer will God's word and counsels be found to be. He, whose hope of success rests on a failure of the divine purpose, will meet a dreadful overthrow. "God has promised nothing but what he has determined to perform."

13. Righteousness exalteth a nation, v. 12. When people heartily enter on a course of piety, they initiate a process of mental and social improvement, which must elevate them far above anything they ever before attained.

14. It is a rich mercy that God makes the first motion towards the salvation of men! If any people are his inheritance, it is because he has chosen them, v. 12. The doctrine of the New Testament is the same. "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you."

15. In all the vast extent of creation, nothing is hid from the observation of the Almighty, vv. 13, 14. If anything could escape his notice, or elude his grasp, that might be fatal to his plans and to the salvation of his people. Unless he controls all causes, that one, which he does not control, may do untold mischief.

16. He, that made the hearts of all men, cannot but know them, and understand all their operations, v. 15. This proves that he is God, that he can fully save his people from their sins, and that the wicked shall not gain an advantage over God's people.

17. All the names and forms of strength and power belonging to creatures are nothing without God, vv. 16, 17. Four of these are here specified, a king, a host, a giant and a horse. Where the word of a king is, there is power, Ecc. viii. 4. But when God does not support it, or wars against it, it is as powerless as the chattering of a swallow. The mightiest monarch can do nothing except it be given him of God,

John xix. 11. David often acknowledges that God made him all he was. Neither is an army a protection if God be against it. The very greatness of a host has often been its ruin. God, who made the stars fight against Sisera, can easily defeat any military preparations. Without lifting a finger he can send an angel and in one night he shall destroy the greatest army that ever invaded a country. A giant has many a time done great things. But let not the mighty man glory in his might, Jer. ix. 23. Giants shall die like men. God has given to the horse strength, and clothed his neck with thunder. The glory of his nostrils is terrible. He paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength. He goeth on to meet the armed men. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted. He smelleth the battle afar off. Yet he is nothing without God. He may as soon carry his rider into danger as out of it.

18. No man ever acts with true wisdom till he fears God, and hopes in his mercy, v. 18.

19. A good man may be sure of natural life as long as it is best for him to have it, and when it is taken away, he may confidently expect a better life in a better world, v. 19. Compare Isa. xxxiii. 16; xli. 17, 18; 1 Tim. iv. 8.

20. Is not waiting upon the Lord a duty too little insisted on in our day? v. 20. The author does not remember that he ever heard more than one or two public discourses respecting this excellent exercise.

21. There is a beautiful proportion in the character of truly pious men. Where there is genuine trust, there is gracious fear, and where these are, there is also holy joy, vv. 18, 21.

22. The cry for mercy ever becomes us, till we get our crown, v. 22. It is never out of place. Even in closing a triumphant song it is proper.

PSALM XXXIV.

A Psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

- 1 I will bless the LORD at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth.
- 2 My soul shall make her boast in the LORD: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad.
- 3 Oh magnify the LORD with me, and let us exalt his name together.
- 4 I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears.
- 5 They looked unto him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed.
- 6 This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles.
- 7 The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.
- 8 Oh taste and see that the LORD is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him.
- 9 Oh fear the LORD, ye his saints: for there is no want to them that fear him.
- 10 The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger: but they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing.
- 11 Come, ye children, hearken unto me: I will teach you the fear of the LORD.
- 12 What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good?
- 13 Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile.
- 14 Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it.
- 15 The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry.
- 16 The face of the LORD is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth.
- 17 The righteous cry, and the LORD heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles.

18 The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.

19 Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the LORD delivereth him out of them all.

20 He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken.

21 Evil shall slay the wicked: and they that hate the righteous shall be desolate.

22 The LORD redeemeth the soul of his servants: and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xi. We know the historic occasion of this ode. See title and 1 Sam. xxi. 10–15; xxii. 1, 2. The name of the king before whom David appeared was Achish. His title was Abimelech, which means my Father the King. It occurs often in Scripture. Like Pharaoh and Cæsar, it was worn by a succession of princes. The Syriac and Theodoret strangely confound Abimelech with Ahimelech the priest mentioned in 1 Sam. xxi. 1–8. For behaviour in the title some read sense, some intellect, some countenance. Luther has behaviour. That gives the sense. Beyond reasonable doubt David is the author of this Psalm. This is an alphabetical poem. See Introduction, § 13, and on Ps. xxv. The alphabetical arrangement is not perfect, the sixth letter being omitted, and the seventeenth beginning vv. 16, 22.

The morality of David's conduct before Achish is matter of dispute. Did he sin in feigning madness? On this question some judicious commentators give no opinion. Those who justify stratagem in war would approve of this device. Those, who believe that under all circumstances truth and candor are obligatory, would condemn his conduct. Calvin speaks safely when he says: "Although God sometimes delivers his people, while at the same time they err in choosing the means, or even fall into sin in adopting them, yet there is nothing inconsistent in this. The deliverance was the work of God, but the intermediate sin, which is on no account to be excused, ought to be ascribed to David." Some have even thought that this Psalm gives evidences of compunction for this artifice. But this is doubtful. The object of the ode is to celebrate the divine goodness, and to awaken just sentiments in his own mind, and in the minds of others. The whole structure of the Psalm would lead us to suppose that it was composed after David was quite out of peril. Some have thought he wrote it in the cave of Adullam. While this cannot be proved, it is not a wild conjecture, 1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2.

That the occasion of this Psalm fully justified the high strains it employs is manifest from the great peril, in which the history shows David to have been, and from the very remarkable prayer, which David offered on that occasion, as we have it in Ps. lvi. Jebb: "The characteristic word of this Psalm is Jehovah," on which see on Ps. i. 2. Clarke dates it B. C. 1062; Scott B. C. 1061.

1. I will bless the LORD at all times. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12, which see. At all times; some read, in all time; some, at every time. The meaning is, in every condition, prosperous or adverse; "in every posture of my affairs." He repeats: His praise shall continually be in my mouth. Continually, always, ever.

2. My soul shall make her boast in the LORD. Calvin: "The term soul in this place signifies not the vital spirit, but the seat of the affections." The boasting of a good man, when approved of God, is a high degree of exultant enjoyment of good in possession, united with a persuasion of bright and glorious prospects. Were this boasting in one's own strength or holiness, nothing could be more vain; but when it is in the Lord, nothing is more ennobling or commendable. It is also a great encouragement to others: The humble shall hear thereof and be glad. For the humble Luther has the miserable; many, the meek; and many, the humble. See on Ps. ix. 12, 18. It is applied to Moses, Num. xii. 3. A word closely resembling this is rendered humbled, in

Ps. XXXV. 13. The meek of the earth must take courage at what they see done for their poor brethren. Being humble, they know they deserve no good thing. They are grateful for mercies, which the world lightly esteems; and they are hopeful and glad when they see great things done for the lowly. Even a faint-hearted Israelite might have waxed bold when he saw the three young men walking loose in the fiery furnace; or when he met them afterwards, and found not a hair of their head singed, nor their coats changed, nor the smell of fire passed on them. Peter was not more affected with his miraculous deliverance from prison than were his brethren, Acts xii. 11, 16.

3. Oh magnify the LORD with me. Magnify, make great, lift up. For many good reasons every true worshipper desires others to unite with him in adoring and praising Jehovah. God is so excellent, his mercies are so marvellous, the work of praise is so enlivening, and any praise rendered by one falls so far short of what God deserves, that if a good man could, he would enlist the universe of creatures in aid of the worship he offers. From the peculiar construction of this clause in the Hebrew some think that the word name in the next clause should be here understood. If so, the sense will not be varied. David repeats his call on others: And let us exalt his name together. United, religious worship, celebrating the praises of Jehovah, is that, to which all are here cited.

4. I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears. Here is the great event which caused the vows and challenges of the preceding verses. He sought the Lord by prayer and in faith. His fears were great. He had killed Goliath, the great champion of the very king before whom he now stood a helpless stranger, fugitive and prisoner. The Philistines remembered the deed, and no doubt accused David to their prince. To sense and reason all looked dark. In that sad hour David's mind was turned to God, and he gained his cause. The Lord, in whose hands is the king's heart, made Abimelech indifferent respecting his prisoner; nay, he drove him away; and so the royal sufferer was permitted to go to a stronghold, and meet his whole family and his friends. God can save by few or by many, from the jaws of lions, or the swords of kings. The more pressing the calamity, the more earnest should be our applications to the throne of grace:

5. They looked unto him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed. The Chaldee agrees with our version. But all the other ancient versions put the first and second verbs in the imperative and the last in the future: Come ye to him [or look to him] and be enlightened: and your faces shall not be confounded. Calvin puts all the verbs in the future; the church of England, all in the preterite; Edwards, all in the imperative; Fry: Look unto him and be ye gladdened, and your faces shall not be made ashamed; Horsley: Look towards him, and thou shalt be enlightened; and your faces shall never be ashamed; Hengstenberg: They look at him and are brightened, and their countenance is not ashamed. There is considerable difficulty in getting at the precise sense of this verse. Jehovah is spoken of in each of the preceding verses, and so by him the great mass of sober commentators understand God. But unless we admit that this is a dramatic Psalm, we must admit that David is spoken of in the next verse in the third person singular, as this poor man and him. Yet there would be a good sense, if we supposed the humble to have looked, or to be looking at David's deliverance, and thus getting assurance that they should not be ashamed. There is doubt respecting the best rendering of the verbs as to tense. But the authorized version is most conformed to the original, and the verse may well be understood as declaring that David's deliverance was not peculiar to himself, but that whenever the humble looked unto God, they were lightened, and were not left to shame. The first two verbs in Hebrew are in the past; the last is in the future. We might read the whole: They looked unto him and were lightened, i. e., were cheered as by light. Nor shall their past experience deceive them: and their faces shall not be ashamed.

6. This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles. Poor, rendered humble in Ps. ix. 12; afflicted in Ps. xviii. 27; lowly in Pr. iii. 34; needy in Pr. xxxi. 20. The prayer offered by this poor man was earnest and fervent. He cried. His cry brought down the blessing. He was saved out of all his troubles, distresses, tribulations, adversities, anguishes, see Ps. ix. 9; xxii. 11. Calvin and others think David in this verse introduces all the godly as pointing to him and speaking of him. This is not necessary to the understanding of the passage; nor is it favored by many. The safest rule respecting the introduction of the dramatic form is not to resort to it unless the sense requires it. The inspired writers often introduce themselves in the third person. Of this there are many instances in the writings of Moses. See also Ps. cxxxii. 1; Hos. i. 2; John xxi. 24; 2 Cor. xii. 2, 4. In vv. 1-4 the psalmist speaks of himself; in v. 5, of God's people generally; in v. 6, of himself; in v. 7, he returns to general views.

7. The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them. Three views have been held respecting the angel of the Lord. 1. Many think it means any heavenly messenger sent to protect the righteous, or fight against their foes. 2. Others think that by angel in the singular, we are to understand angels. The word rendered encampeth resembles Mahanaim, armies; see Gen. xxxii. 1, 2. In Hebrew the singular is often put for the plural—one for the species. 3. Others think that by the angel of the Lord we are here and often elsewhere to understand the Redeemer, Gen. xlviii. 16; Ex. xxiii. 20, 23; xxxii. 34; Judges xiii. 15-22; Mal. iii. 1. See Hengstenberg's Christology. This sense does not forbid us to suppose him to be attended by the heavenly host. He is "The captain of the Lord's host," and "All the host of heaven stands by him on his right hand and on his left," Josh. v. 14; 1 Kings xxii. 19; Heb. i. 6, 7. The special ministry of angels is to them that fear Jehovah, or to "them, who shall be heirs of salvation." The angel delivereth them, however many their foes, however great their own weakness, however feeble their hopes, however alarming their case.

8. Oh taste and see that the LORD is good. To taste is to make proof by experience. To see is either to gain the result of such tasting, or it is to enjoy. The word see has both significations. The former seems to be the more appropriate here, and is equivalent to knowing certainly. Blessed is the man that trusteth in him. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1; xxxii. 1. Trusteth, rendered elsewhere putteth trust, hath hope, maketh a refuge. Edwards renders it: O try, and be sensible of the goodness of Jehovah: how happy the man, who trusteth in him.

9. Oh fear the LORD, ye his saints. Fear, as in v. 7; Ps. xv. 4; xxii. 23; xxxiii. 18. Saints, holy ones. There is nothing more unfriendly to true piety than its degenerating into irreverence and familiarity with God. Fear gone, all solemnity vanishes, and love becomes fondness. The command is clear. An encouraging reason is given: For there is no want to them that fear him. There is nothing wanting in the symmetry of their characters, in the supply of their temporal necessities, in furnishing them against the machinations of the wicked One, in the day of conflict, in the hour of death. For such persons an ample provision is made in all respects and for all duration. Among all the redeemed in glory there is not one who looks back and sees that on earth there was any mistake in the divine conduct towards him. God doeth all things well.

10. The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger. The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Luther and Houbigant instead of lions, or young lions, read the rich. John Rogers' translation is much the same: The ryche shall want and suffre hunger, but they which seke the Lord, shall want no maner of *thyng*e, that is good.

While Ainsworth gives lions in the text he yet says: "Hereby may be meant the rich and mighty of the world, whom God often bringeth to miserie." Rapacious and cruel men are in Scripture often compared to lions, 1 Chron. xi. 22; Ps. xxxv. 17; Jer. ii. 15; Neh. ii. 11-13; 2 Tim. iv. 17. Hengstenberg thinks that the connection and the word rendered lack, which is literally "reduced to poverty," require us by lions to understand powerful and violent men. Alexander: "The sentiment then is, that while the most powerful and least scrupulous of men may be reduced to want, the people of God shall be abundantly and constantly provided for." But the Chaldee, church of England, Calvin and Amesius retain in the text lions. In either way we get a good sense. Young lions are not those, which cannot hunt their prey, or are feeble. This is clear from Ps. lviii. 6, where we read of "the great teeth of the young lions," and from other places, Job iv. 10; Ps. xvii. 12; Mic. v. 8. The argument is, that those, who like young lions rely on their strength and rapacity, shall suffer because God is against them. But they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing. Seek the LORD, a phrase, like the fear of the Lord, denoting the whole of religion, as in v. 4; Ps. ix. 10; xiv. 2. Calvin: "If it is objected, that the good and the virtuous are not always exempted from penury, I answer, that the hand of God is stretched out to succor them in due season, when they are reduced to the greatest straits, and know not to what side to turn, so that the issue always shows that we seek not in vain from him whatever is necessary to the sustenance of life." Sanctified poverty, sanctified afflictions of every kind are not real evils, but truly good things.

11. Come, ye children. Most of the versions have children; Edwards has young men; Ainsworth, Hengstenberg and Alexander have sons. In our version it is sons, Ps. iv. 2; xxxi. 19; and children in Ps. xi. 4; xii. 1. The address is to young people, whatever their age. Hearken unto me. Heedlessness is a great sin among youth. They are slow to hear, listen, weigh, ponder, consider. Folly is often bound up in their hearts. They must be warned, exhorted, commanded to pay attention to the lessons which so much concern them. They ought to hearken. It is a great matter, it is their life. I will teach you the fear of the LORD. If this be taken as the point to which all the residue of the Psalm refers, then David here proposes to show them, 1. What it is to fear the Lord; 2, What are the proper fruits of godly fear; 3, What are the motives to fear God. The first appeal is to the natural desire for happiness:

12. What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good? The sense is not varied by some of the ancient versions, rendering the last clause, Who loveth to see good days? The sinner is himself the greatest loser by his crimes; and the saint the greatest gainer by his holiness. The cause of piety would labor under a sad disadvantage, if in the long run the saint fared no better than the wicked. The love of happiness being natural and universal, and having some influence over all men, who are not desperate, an appeal to it for the purpose of securing attention is not out of place. True, piety has a higher motive, and virtue a higher spring than anything ending in personal advantage. But that does not impair the strength of the consideration here presented. On the temporal benefits of true piety see on Ps. i. 3. The first direction for seeing good, or good days is:

13. Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile. Keep, hold back, restrain, vigilantly guard, preserve. The same word is applied to keeping the commandments, keeping covenant, keeping the law, keeping the heart. This ought to be easy work; but sin has made it very difficult, and, without divine grace, impossible, Jas. iii. 2-10. Yet we may not on that account be excused from our duty, Jas. i. 26. The ways in which men sin with the tongue are many. Laurentius says there are as many sins of the tongue as there are letters in the alphabet.' Richard Baxter has catalogued thirty. The best expositions of the decalogue mention even more. Speaking becomes sinful when it is hasty, rash, continual, unseasonable, excessive, clamorous, senseless, unchaste, indelicate, impure, filthy, prevaricating, quibbling, deceitful, lying, slanderous, tattling, babbling, backbiting, detractive, reproachful, opprobrious, flattering, seductive, betraying confidence, revealing secrets, awakening groundless suspicions, talebearing, news-carrying, railing, reviling, boastful, scornful, desperate, murmuring, foolish, egotistical, vain, proud, malignant, bitter, resentful, cursing, profane, or blasphemous. "The tongue is a world of iniquity." Sins of the tongue lead to horrors of conscience, loss of peace of mind and loss of appetite; to broils, quarrels and bitter contentions; to fightings, stabbings, shootings and murders. Perhaps no form of sin more terribly destroys personal, domestic, social and public peace and prosperity. "The tongue is a fire." It burns all who abuse it. It burns them up. Dreadful plagues befall it here and hereafter, Ps. lii. 5; cxx. 4. The two forms of sinful speaking noticed in the verse are evil and guile. The latter word is elsewhere in our version rendered deceit, subtlety, treachery, craft, and several times guile. Evil, elsewhere, mischievous, wickedness, wrong. Hengstenberg: "In giving the details of the fear of God, the duties toward our neighbor are, according to David's usual way, dwelt upon with particular care, because there hypocrisy, which is so ready to appropriate to itself promises with which it has nothing to do, finds least scope for its exercise." Guard your lips, but do more:

14. Depart from evil and do good. Evil, as in vv. 13, 16. Evil and good are here used as in common parlance. This mode of pointing out our duty is very fitting: "Cease to do evil; learn to do well," Isa. i. 16, 17. While our direct duty to God is not ignored, our duty to man is the chief matter involved in this verse and the preceding. Seek peace and pursue it. Peace, that is the things which make for peace, for the quiet and order of men, of families, of neighborhoods, and of nations. Peace is a great blessing, and, where principle is not sacrificed, it is never purchased at too great a cost, Rom. xii. 18; Heb. xii. 14. The great means of seeking and promoting peace are uprightness, kindness, forbearance, forgiveness, gentleness, quietness. We are at liberty, in some cases we are bound, to sacrifice our own rights for the sake of peace. We are to pursue peace, if she seems to flee from us, until the further pursuit would involve faithlessness or an evil conscience; then we must stop. It is not possible to live peaceably with some men. They love strife. Without formal quotation, verses 12, 13, 15, 16 of this Psalm are inwoven into 1 Peter iii. 10-12. The duties of vv. 13, 14 are enforced thus:

15. The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous. That is, his providence is over them for good; to notice their wrongs and distresses; to mark their wants and desires; to supply their lack and necessities; to give them restraining and sustaining grace; and to crown their lives with goodness, and their conflicts with victory. And his ears are open unto their cry. The righteous are often in great straits, but they know how to cry unto the Lord, and his ears are never closed to their entreaties. He never fails to regard the voice of earnest, humble, believing prayer. This is their happy lot. It is far different with the wicked.

16. The face of the Lord is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth. Face, the Hebrew word occurs very often and is commonly so rendered. It is also rendered countenance, mouth, presence, anger. The last seems to give the best sense, and is fully justified by the rendering of the same word in Ps. xxi. 9; Lam. iv. 16. Yet God's mouth, that is, all he speaks, is against the wicked. And his presence, although it may accompany the wicked, is to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth, to extirpate them utterly. See on Ps. ix. 5, 6. No man on earth hopes or desires to spend his eternity with thieves, liars, burglars, murderers, tyrants, oppressors, persecutors and blasphemers who died in their sins. Who now cares for Cyrus, Alexander, Cæsar or Charlemagne? Their names, though still repeated on earth, have no sweet odors. No man reveres their memory, fears their power, or would give a farthing to be of their lineage. Whereas there are millions on earth who think of Abel, Enoch, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, Hannah, Anna, Mary, John, Peter and Paul, and hope soon to see them in glory and be joined to their assembly.

17. The righteous cry, and the LORD heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles. That which in v. 6 is recorded of David is here asserted to be true of all the servants of God. Our translators have supplied the righteous, because they are evidently here spoken of. Some suppose the word so rendered has been lost from the Hebrew text. But of this there is no considerable proof. Others propose to make v. 16 parenthetical. But this is not necessary. In seeking for an antecedent to a pronoun or for a nominative to a verb, it is very common to go back until the reading will make good sense. That this verse speaks of the righteous is so clear that the Chaldee, Septuagint, Arabic, Syriac, Ethiopic and Vulgate all supply that word. The next verse speaks of the same persons as penitents:

18. The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit. Both clauses describe the same character, and the same state of mind. Broken, as in Ps. li. 17; Isa. lxi. 1. Contrite, as in Ps. li. 17; Isa. lvii. 15. It means bruised, crushed, smitten, humbled. He who has a broken heart and a contrite spirit is heartily sorry for having offended God, violated his law, and grieved his Spirit. He makes a full surrender. He has no hope in himself. He sees that he is self-destroyed. God has smitten him, conscience has smitten him, the law has slain him. If God does not save him he sees he is ruined forever. But the LORD is nigh unto such. He binds up the broken-hearted. He sets at liberty them that are bruised. He will not break the bruised reed. He revives the spirit of the contrite ones. To the poor in spirit he gives the kingdom of heaven.

19. Many are the afflictions of the righteous. Afflictions, the plural of the word rendered evil in other verses of this Psalm. Taken in the sense of evil suffered, it is rendered hurt, harm, sorrow, mischief, wretchedness, wrong, adversity, trouble, calamity, misery. The word seems specially to point to such evils as are brought on us by the wickedness of men. The Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate have tribulations; Syriac and Arabic, calamities. The sources of afflictions to the righteous man are, 1. Himself. Gladly would he have no longer need to cry, O wretched man that I am! He is grieved at his own coldness, unbelief, ingratitude, and the ease with which he yields to temptation. All his sins afflict him. 2. The righteous beholds the transgressors and is grieved. Rivers of water run down his eyes because men keep not God's law. Not only the pride, the slanders, the scorn, the cruelty of the wicked against himself, but all their known sins afflict him. 3. Then because the righteous man is not perfect here, his heavenly Father afflicts him in mind, body and estate. Moreover, God often afflicts him that by example he may illustrate the power of sustaining grace. His trials are multiplied, his afflictions many. But they are not permitted to destroy him, or depress him above measure. Left to himself, they would sink him into the lowest depths, but the LORD delivereth him out of them all. Delivereth, the same verb as in vv. 4, 17; Ps. xxxiii. 16, 17. This deliverance is effectual, seasonable, well ordered. This verse explains, limits and relieves from misconstruction the doctrine of v. 18.

20. He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken. Hutchinson adduces this verse as proof that the whole Psalm refers to Messiah. His canon is that a sentence in any Psalm, clearly applicable to Christ, determines the whole composition to refer to him. An attempt to carry out such a rule would show its absurdity. Yet this verse is expressly applied to Christ in the New Testament, John xix. 31-37. It has its most glorious fulfilment in him. In his case there was no limit to its fullest import. But it was fulfilled in David also, and it is fulfilled in all believers so far that not a bone of them is "broken without God's wise and merciful appointment." His care of his chosen is most tender and loving. The hairs of their heads are all numbered. Not one falleth to the ground without their Father. He giveth his angels charge concerning them. It is estimated that one generation of men converted to God in early life outlives two generations of godless, violent, treacherous men. The Scriptures intimate as much, Ps. lv. 23.

21. Evil shall slay the wicked. Evil, as in vv. 13, 14, 16, and in v. 20, in the plural, afflictions. The renderings are various. Chaldee and Arabic: The death of the ungodly is evil; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: The death of sinners is very evil; Syriac: Evil [or malice] shall slay the wicked; church of England: Misfortune shall slay the wicked; Calvin and Genevan translation: Malice shall slay the wicked; Venema: To the bad evil shall bring death; Amesius: Affliction has power over the wicked in death; Edwards: Calamity will destroy the wicked; Jebb: Evil shall slay the ungodly; Hengstenberg: Misfortune slays the wicked. John Rogers' translation: But mysfortune shall slaye the ungodly. Pool thinks the evil is "either, 1. The evil of sin. His own wickedness, though designed against others, shall destroy himself. Or, 2. The evil of misery. When the afflictions of good men shall have a happy issue, theirs shall end in their total and final destruction." If the word be rendered affliction, then the contrast is between the righteous of v. 19, who survive many afflictions, while one affliction often kills the wicked; or misery at last kills him. But there is clearly a reference to the righteous retribution, which shall at last and with certainty bring on the wicked the fruit of his own doings: And they that hate the righteous shall be desolate. For desolate the Syriac has fail; Arabic, perish; Edwards, doomed to perish; Hengstenberg, become guilty; Chaldee, be condemned; Ainsworth, be condemned as guiltie; Fry, be held guilty; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, John Rogers' Translation, Jebb, Alexander and margin, be guilty. The verb is in the future. All who hate the righteous shall be held and treated as guilty persons. The law will condemn them. Tholuck: "Guilt shall not leave the wicked, for it cannot be forgiven until it be confessed, repented of, and covered by faith." The consequence of unpardoned guilt is horrible desolation.

22. The LORD redeemeth the soul of his servants. The ancient versions all put the verb in the future, shall redeem or shall preserve. But the church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander have it in the present, agreeing with our version. The Hebrew word is a participle, redeeming. In our version the verb is rendered rescue, deliver, ransom, redeem. Jehovah delivers now, and shall always deliver; he redeems by the blood of his Son; he ransoms by the great price paid on Calvary; he rescues from every impending evil; he saves eternally. And none of them that trust in him shall be desolate. Trust, the same as in v. 8. Shall be desolate, precisely the same as in v. 21, only here it is preceded by the negative. There is nothing to warrant Fry in placing v. 22 between vv. 5, 6.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Truth, candor, honesty cannot be too highly esteemed. They are essential in a gracious character. Henry: "We cannot justify David in his dissimulation. It ill became an honest man to feign himself what he was not, and a man of honor to feign himself to be a fool and a madman. If, in sport, we mimic those who have not so good an understanding as we think we have, we forget that God might have made their case ours."

2. There is on earth and in heaven no nobler work than praise. It is angelic. We ought to be much in it at all times, v. 1; "in pain, sickness, poverty, persecution, and even in the agonies of death." We should praise him continually, because continual blessings, not one of which is deserved, are descending upon us; and because some mercies conferred on us are so great that we ought often to make mention of them. Special mercies demand special praises. Tholuck: "Every day of a pious man's life is marked with the monuments and tokens of the mercy of God, so that he has every day to sing a new song." Calvin: "If by one benefit alone God lays us under obligation to himself all our life, so that we may never lawfully cease from setting forth his praises, how much more when he heaps upon us innumerable benefits?"

3. It is lawful and agreeable to the example of wise men to form good purposes, v. 1.

4. It is very proper to call to mind past mercies, when present trials press us sore and to sing in days of darkness, v. 1. It is a sad error to rely on past mercies so as to seek no new ones. But it is no less a sin to be so eager after new mercies as to slight or forget old ones.

5. Religious joy cannot be too high. We may exult and make our boast in God, v. 2. He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord, and let him glory in the Lord as much as he pleases.

6. It profits our brethren and honors God for us truthfully to narrate his gracious dealings with his people. Therefore we should mention the loving-kindness of the Lord that others may hear thereof and be glad, v. 2. But we should not cast pearls before swine. "Only humble souls sensible of their own weakness are the people who reap benefit by God's mercies bestowed on others."

7. The unity of divine worship, which is founded on the unity of the divine nature, is best maintained when with our souls and all our affections we heartily invite all God's servants to join with us in our highest acts of devotion, vv. 2, 3. He, who has cheered us, can cheer others; and he, who has saved us, can save any one, however great his sins, or afflictions.

8. Dickson: "The fear of what is like to be should not hinder prayer; for the fears of the godly are not certain prophecies; for God can deliver out of them all," v. 4.

9. The old and tried method of obtaining deliverance from our fears by seeking the Lord in the way of prayer and a good conscience is far safer and more successful than any finesse men may adopt. David says nothing in praise of the latter, but often commends the former, v. 4.

10. God's grace and kindness to one of his servants has a mighty effect on others, so that they look and brighten up and their faces are not ashamed, v. 5. Not an example of mercy to one saint was ever lost upon others, who feared God, and knew of the deliverance vouchsafed to their brother.

11. The substance of one good man's experience in grace and providence so closely resembles that of all the saints as to make it of easy application and of excellent use to their cases.

12. The best way to profit by God's wonders showed to any of the worthies of old is not unduly to magnify their gifts and excellencies, so as quite to put them out of sight of us poor creatures, but to admit, as they themselves did, that they were poor, v. 6. Yea, the best of them said they were poor and miserable and blind and naked.

13. A religion, which would exclude prayer, would be contrary not only to nature, but to the oft-repeated precepts and examples of Scripture, vv. 4, 5, 6, 17. Dickson: "The Lord putteth the godly to trouble, and by trouble putteth them to their prayers, and delays answer till the need be great, and then they cry to the Lord, and he giveth evidence of his hearing, and sendeth deliverance."

14. Every example of a believer in distress rescued from trouble, is a warrant to all other souls, who are cast down and self-renouncing to lay fast hold of the covenant. Even if verse 6 does not positively decide who this poor man was, any humble soul may fill the blank with his own name. To him that believeth all things are possible. Morison: "O how bright with mercy will be the records of that world, where shall be seen inscribed, in the book of providence, all the salvation that God has wrought for his ransomed church."

15. It is very important to entertain correct and lively views concerning the ministry of angels, v. 7. Much is said on this subject in God's word, 2 Kings vi. 15-17; Ps. xci. 11; Luke xvi. 22. However great the number and power of our enemies, these heavenly messengers are more numerous and more mighty. There is an innumerable company of them, and they excel in strength.

"Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth, Unseen, both when we sleep, and when we wake."

16. How dare any teach that the fear of God is not an essential part of true piety, when it is so often spoken of as if it were the whole of godliness? vv. 7, 9, 11.

17. Nothing better prepares us to call on others to serve God in all his ways than a blessed experience of his grace and mercy in our own souls and lives, v. 8. He, who has tasted and seen, is fittest to call on others to taste and see. The blind never call on their fellows to admire a rainbow. The deaf never urge others to listen to music. Tholuck: "Heaven and earth are replete with the goodness of God. We omit to open our mouths and eyes, on which account the Psalmist desires us to taste and see."

18. Dickson: "All that the believer can attain to in this life of spiritual consolation, whether by faith or experience, sweetened with lively comforts of the Holy Ghost, is but a taste in comparison of what is to be had hereafter, and yet that taste, O how sweet, a joy unspeakable, and full of glory is it!" v. 8.

19. It is a duty of all, who have found mercy, to call on others to seek the Lord, embrace the Redeemer, and set their seal to the covenant, v. 8; John i. 42, 45; Rev. xxii. 17.

20. Reliance or trust is an essential ingredient in faith, v. 8. Without this, faith is as a fable. No more seasonable prayer is ever offered in distress than this: "Lord, increase our faith." Calvin: "Our own unbelief is the only impediment which prevents God from satisfying us largely and bountifully with abundance of all good things."

21. Everything in Scripture makes clear the necessity of inward purity, personal holiness in all the servants of God. In other places they are called by many names of endearment and of tenderness; but often as here they are called saints, v. 9. The church of Rome enrols the names of dead men and women in the calendar for various days in the year and calls them saints' days. But Moses, and David, and Solomon, and Daniel, and Paul speak of all God's children as his saints. So let it be. They are called to be saints.

22. The provision made for all that fear God is very rich. There is no want to them; i. e., they want no good thing. This is ever true of them, vv. 9, 10. Calvin: "Sooner shall the lions perish with hunger and want, than God will disappoint of their necessary food the righteous and sincere, who, content with his blessing alone, seek their food only at his hand." Tholuck: "We shall feel no want though we be in want." The covenant extends the promised aid of God much further than to mere bodily and temporal wants, embracing the whole catalogue of benefits, 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22; Rom. viii. 32; Matt. v. 3-12.

23. He, who relies on his native power and vigor, his talents or his political influence, and especially if want of virtue shall unite with temptation to lead him to rapacity and wrong, shall sooner or later find that like the young lions, he has quite failed of a needed supply, v. 10.

24. Teachers ought to be kind, and address their pupils as if they were their children or sons, v. 11. Oh that all teachers knew the meaning of this: "Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart." The tone of severity and the language of harshness ill become instructors.

25. We ought to condescend to men of low estate, to youth and children, and to persons of feeble understanding, v. 11. The old seldom remember what they are taught. The middle aged are often too busy to listen to their teachers. But the young, even the very young, may hear, and learn, and remember, and live. Henry: "Though a man of war, and anointed to be king, David did not think it below him to teach children; though now he had his head so full of cares, and his hands of business, yet he could find heart and time to give good counsel to young people."

26. The young are specially bound to set their hearts to learn, particularly when older people propose to give them the lessons of experience and wisdom on the most weighty matters, v. 11. "David was a famous musician, a statesman, a soldier; but he does not say to the children, 'I will teach you to play on the harp, or to handle the sword or spear, or to draw the bow, or, I will teach you the maxims of state policy;' but I will teach you the fear of the Lord, which is better than all the arts and sciences, better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices." If teachers would do great good, let them select weighty topics, use plain words, and speak in a kind manner.

27. The young, no less than others, should be taught that all is not gold that glitters, all is not piety that passes under that name. The nature and evidences of true piety should be clearly stated to all, and to none more than to beginners, vv. 12-15.

28. No marvel the righteous never regret the choice they have made, nor utterly forsake the way of God, for all their experience is on the side of God, of truth, and righteousness, v. 12. The godly life of the righteous here shall be followed by one infinitely glorious hereafter.

29. Cannot something be done in family government, in social and ecclesiastical arrangements, in private and public teaching, to arrest the dire evils arising from the wicked abuses of the power of speech? v. 13. Parents consider! Neighbors consider! Pastors consider! Wise men consider! Earth is sometimes so much like hell as to make one doubt whether on the whole existence here is desirable.

30. A truly virtuous and pious character has both negative and positive good traits. It departs from evil; it does good, v. 14.

31. No philosopher, moralist or prophet has ever put too high a positive value on the inestimable blessing of being permitted and enabled to lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty, v. 14. Oh that all men loved peace and hated strife, 1 Cor. xiii. 4-7; 2 Cor. xiii. 11. If Christians, we serve the God of peace. But one thing on earth is worse than a life of contention; that is a life of wickedness. Yet if we are forced to contend, God will not condemn us, but will sustain us. Calvin: "David means that in our own personal affairs we should be meek and condescending, and endeavor, as far as in us lies, to maintain peace, though its maintenance should prove to us a source of much trouble and inconvenience."

32. The providence of God, which we should devoutly study, has two aspects. One smiles on the righteous; the other frowns on the wicked, vv. 15, 16; Ex. xiv. 19, 20.

33. We have Scriptural authority for esteeming a good name above riches; but what a delusion the wicked are under when they pursue fame as a great good. The memory of the wicked shall rot. God will cut off their remembrance from the earth, v. 16. A youth passing a bank of sand, with his staff wrote the word "Fame." Returning from school on the evening of the same day, he saw that already the winds had driven the sands over it and covered it up. In later life he referred to it as having taught him a good lesson, and led him to desire above all things to have his name written in the book of life.

34. The apostle Peter makes a practical use of vv. 12-16, which has not yet been formally noticed. He says the truths here taught should moderate our grief and calm our minds, making us compassionate, pitiful, courteous, giving blessing for cursing, etc., 1 Pet. iii. 8-12. Very fairly do they teach as much, and some of them point to the highest sanctions.

35. Ever since man became a sinner, true religion has had in it the element of penitence, v. 18; Ps. li. 17; Isa. lvii. 15. Let us often inquire whether we have this penitence. It is far different from remorse. It is a great error of some that they so little cultivate a penitent state of mind.

36. The Christian religion is the only form of doctrine on earth that candidly admits the full extent of human wo; and at the same time makes adequate provision for the support of the pious sufferer, and for his full and final deliverance from all that can harass the mind, v. 19. "Through much tribulation we must enter into the kingdom of God." Tholuck: "Were the pious freed from every trouble and affliction, motives to piety would become impure, faith would grow faint, prayer cease, and carnal security abound." Afflictions are proofs of love. "Stripes are the marks of sonship." All our troubles are as nothing compared with what we deserve, with what the righteous of other days have suffered, with what our Saviour suffered, with the grace granted to sustain us, or with the everlasting bliss that awaits us. So thought Paul, 2 Cor. iv. 17. Luther: "Although the bones and members of the saints are, above all others, cruelly scattered and broken, burnt in the fire, and left to rot in the graves; yet, even though they be thus sown in ignominy, they shall be raised in glory: they shall be quickened again with all their limbs and bodies; and all their bones shall be restored; and the just shall shine like the sun in the kingdom of their Father."

37. Even in this life the deliverances of God's people are often amazing, v. 19. Witness that of the prophet in 2 Kings vi. 18-23. Behold the mercies showed to Peter in prison, when about to be beheaded, Acts xii. 3-11. "It is recorded of that holy man Bernard Gilpin, called the Apostle of the North, that in the time of the Marian persecutions, he was apprehended by Bonner's messengers and carried off to London—and to the stake. 'But mark,' says his biographer, 'mark the providence of God!' In his way to London he broke his leg, which stopped for a time his journey. The persons in whose custody he was, took occasion to retort upon him a remark he had frequently made, 'that nothing happens to us but what is intended for our good,' and asked him whether he thought the breaking of his leg was so intended, to which he meekly answered, he made no doubt it was: and so it proved in the strictest sense, for before he was able to travel, Queen Mary died, and he was set at liberty."

38. While we cannot make this whole Psalm Messianic, yet it is delightful to see what a welcome theme the coming Saviour is to all the prophets, and how without the least formal notice they introduce him into their sacred compositions as here, v. 20.

39. There is no telling what evil shall bring to a miserable end the career of a sinner. It may be the sword of an enemy or of himself, the sting of conscience or of a bee, an evil natural or an evil moral, v. 21. Sin is always the procuring cause of death. It is sometimes the very means of terminating a wicked life.

40. If the only sin charged to the wicked in a gospel land were their enmity to good men, their destruction would be most just and terrible, v. 21.

41. It is always a safe rule for determining the final destiny of the sinner that it shall be in all respects the opposite of that of the saint. One shall be desolate. The other shall not be desolate, vv. 21, 22. One shall be condemned. The other shall not come into condemnation. One shall be held guilty. The other shall be held righteous. God is against the one. God is with the other.

42. The redemption of God's people shall at last be complete. God has undertaken that work, v. 22. He never puts his hands to the plough and looks back. The Lord is of one mind, and none can turn him.

43. Fearful desolation is based in guilt, vv. 21, 22. Sin is damning so as nothing else is. We are not hurt till our souls are hurt. Henry: "No man is desolate, but he whom God has forsaken, nor is any man undone till he is in hell."

PSALM XXXV.

A Psalm of David.

1 Plead my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me.

2 Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for mine help.

3 Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me: say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

4 Let them be confounded and put to shame that seek after my soul: let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt.

5 Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the LORD chase them.

6 Let their way be dark and slippery: and let the angel of the LORD persecute them.

7 For without cause have they hid for me their net in a pit, which without cause they have digged for my soul.

8 Let destruction come upon him at unawares; and let his net that he hath hid catch himself: into that very destruction let him fall.

9 And my soul shall be joyful in the LORD: it shall rejoice in his salvation.

10 All my bones shall say, LORD, who is like unto thee, which deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him, yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him?

11 False witnesses did rise up; they laid to my charge things that I knew not.

12 They rewarded me evil for good to the spoiling of my soul.

13 But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth: I humbled my soul with fasting; and my prayer returned into mine own bosom.

14 I behaved myself as though he had been my friend or brother: I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother.

15 But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered themselves together: yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not; they did tear me, and ceased not:

16 With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth.

17 Lord, how long wilt thou look on? rescue my soul from their destructions, my darling from the lions.

18 I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among much people.

19 Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me: neither let them wink with the eye that hate me without a cause.

20 For they speak not peace: but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land.

21 Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it.

22 This thou hast seen, O LORD: keep not silence: O Lord, be not far from me.

23 Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even unto my cause, my God and my Lord.

24 Judge me, O LORD my God, according to thy righteousness; and let them not rejoice over me.

25 Let them not say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it: let them not say, We have swallowed him up.

26 Let them be ashamed and brought to confusion together that rejoice at mine hurt: let them be clothed with shame and dishonour that magnify themselves against me.

27 Let them shout for joy, and be glad, that favour my righteous cause: yea, let them say continually, Let the LORD be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.

28 And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xi. David is the author of this ode. Both Scott and Clarke date it B. C. 1061. If it had a historic occasion, it is probably that mentioned in 1 Sam. xxiv. 9-15, where David uses the very ideas with which he begins this Psalm: "The Lord therefore be judge, and judge between me and thee, and see, and plead my cause, and deliver me out of thine hand." But the same language was as well suited to any one of many occasions. The Syriac suggests that it was written on occasion of the attack of the Idumeans. The Arabic says it is a prophecy concerning the incarnation, and concerning those things which the people did to Jeremiah. Our Saviour quoted a part of v. 19, in application to himself, John xv. 25. Of course those, who adopt Hutchinson's rule noticed in Ps. xxxiv. 20, regard this as wholly Messianic. Fry: "This Psalm is evidently a prayer of the Mediator." It is admitted that David was in many respects a type of Christ. Men hated them both without a cause. While Hutchinson's rule is justly rejected, there seems to be no safe method of interpreting this poem without making David in much of it a figure of the suffering and triumphing Redeemer. So say Scott, Morison, Bouchier, Cobbin and others. In this Psalm we have three names of the Most High: Jehovah LORD, Adonai Lord and Elohim God, on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4; iii. 2.

1. Plead my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me. In several versions, as in the Hebrew, the words rendered plead and strive are forms of the same verb and of precisely the same signification. Morison: "The word rendered plead, denotes the act of contending, as a barrister would contend for his client in a court of justice." Alexander: "The original verb is one specifically used to denote judicial contest." The word rendered my cause is not in the first verse, but is properly supplied from verse 23, where it is found. It is a word kindred to plead. The object of the Psalmist is to commit his cause to God as Advocate, Judge, Avenger. He adds: Fight against them that fight against me. Here too the verbs are forms of the same root in the Hebrew, Chaldee and many others besides the English. Fight, eat, devour, Ps. cxli. 4; Prov. iv. 17; xxiii. 1, 6; Deut. xxxii. 24. David's enemies proposed to eat him up. His prayer is that the Lord would be on his side and do all that his case required, especially in view of the false accusations and deadly persecutions of his enemies.

2. Take hold of shield and buckler. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac and Vulgate: Take hold of arms and shield; church of England: Lay hand upon the shield and buckler; Chaldee and many others virtually agree with the English. He prays, Make ready for immediate and decisive action. The battle is now raging. Thy powerful aid is now required. For some account of the armor called shield, see on Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10; of that called buckler, see on Ps. v. 12. And stand up for mine help. This was just what David needed. The above armor was for protection and defence.

3. Draw out also the spear. Spear, a weapon of assault, always in our version so rendered, or javelin; but several ancient versions here have sword. The verb here found, when used in connection with sword, signifies to unsheath. In connection with spear, it may signify to bring forth from any place of deposit. And stop the way against them that persecute me. The language describes the act of a host coming to the rescue of their comrades, when about to be overpowered. He asks that Jehovah would arrest the further progress of his persecutors by opposing them himself. Hengstenberg: Set a barrier against my persecutors. Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation. Unto my soul, i. e., unto my heart and affections. See on Ps. iii. 2. I am thy salvation, the cause and author of thy deliverance.

4. Let them be confounded and put to shame that seek after my soul. This and several other verses of this Psalm contain forms of speech, on the right construction of which see Introduction, § 6. In this instance the language is used respecting the incorrigible foes of God, whose final success must impair confidence in the divine righteousness and faithfulness. Either God's friends or foes must be defeated. The contest was for life. Enemies were deadly. Confounded, as in Ps. vi. 10; xxii. 5; xxv. 2, 3, 20; xxxi. 1, 17. We have not before had the word rendered put to shame; but it occurs hereafter several times, and is also rendered blush, ashamed, confounded, put to confusion. Confusion and shame would necessarily follow the defeat of their devices. Let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt. Turned back, repulsed, driven back, Ps. xl. 14; or fail through weakness of resolution, as in many places it imports. Shame and confusion are remarkably united in signification. Brought to confusion, also rendered shamed, put to shame. All the verbs of this verse in Hebrew are in the future. Hammond is strongly in favor of so rendering them. Fry prefers the present. But the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander accord with our version. And the form of the verbs in the next two verses, which continue the discourse here begun, would argue for the optative form throughout.

5. Let them be as chaff before the wind. Chaff, in our version so uniformly. We had the same figure in Ps. i. 4. It is often found. Many versions have chaff; but the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, church of England and Jebb read dust. The method of winnowing grain in Judea made the figure of chaff intelligible and striking. And let the angel of the LORD chase them. On the angel of the LORD, see on Ps. xxxiv. 7. The language is very terrible. Chase, in our version elsewhere, thrust at, overthrow, cast out, cast down, drive. The original is a participle which Alexander renders smiting. Hengstenberg thinks it means to thrust or knock down. Men are undone when God lets loose his destroying angel among them. This makes a full end of their nefarious purposes.

6. Let their way be dark and slippery. For dark and slippery the Chaldee has darkness and mist; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Calvin, darkness and slipperiness; Arabic, sliding and dark; Syriac, obscure and slipperinesses. It adds strength to the expression that in Hebrew the words are nouns. The way is that on which they retreat. The imagery is not essentially different from that of Jer. xiii. 16; stumbling on the dark mountains. And let the angel of the LORD persecute them. A slippery way, a dark night and a swift and mighty destroyer in pursuit are the terrible images presented in the verse. In defending the righteous angels must often discomfit and even destroy their foes. God may send wicked angels to do the work of destruction; but there is no evidence that the angel of the LORD ever means a devil.

7. For without cause have they hid for me their net in a pit, which without cause they have digged for my soul. On pits and nets see on Ps. ix. 15. Compare also Ps. x. 9; xxv. 15; xxxi. 4. If our version is correct, it would seem that the net was sometimes hidden in the pit, and the two devices were united. David's foes never once dealt honestly and fairly with him. This was one reason why he had a right to expect God to be on his side. The Lord loves truth, candor, fairness. The other reason, why David hoped and prayed for the help of the Lord, was that the opposition to him was causeless and unreasonable. He had done nothing to provoke their murderous wrath. In killing Goliath, he had saved Saul and his army from contempt, if not from destruction. He had been anointed by Samuel, but God had sent the prophet after him. He had not aspired to the throne. In no case had David wronged Saul or his associates. Yet they sought his soul, i. e., his life. Such wickedness must have an end.

8. Let destruction come upon him at unawares. Destruction, in Pr. i. 27, and elsewhere, desolation. Calvin has confusion, or ruin. At unawares: margin, which he knoweth not; literally, [which] he shall not know. No wicked man is ever prepared for overthrow. Its suddenness is a part of its dreadfulness, Pr. i. 27; Isa. xlvii. 11; 1 Thess. v. 3. And let his net that he hath hid catch himself: into that very destruction let him fall. Come, catch and fall are in the Hebrew all in the future. Sinners deceive none so much as themselves. They sow the seeds of all their own miseries. They plant all the thorns that pierce them. They weave and spread all the nets, which catch them. Look at Haman, Judas and all whose history is fully given. The ruin of sinners has in it appalling elements.

9. And my soul shall be joyful in the LORD. On be joyful see on Ps. ix. 14; xiii. 4, 5. There is no better rendering. Fry weakens the force of the clause in its connection by putting the verb in the present tense. We are joyful in the Lord not only when we are pleased with his whole character, but also with his relations to us. David's rejoicing was hearty. It engaged the affections of his soul. It shall rejoice in his salvation, i. e., in the deliverance he has effected or shall effect for me. David knew nothing of the baseness of ascribing to fortune, to his own wit, or to any creature the safety secured to him by God. Some put the verb in the optative; but is not David rather declaring that when deliverance shall come, it will not be wasted on an ingrate? This more clearly seems to be the sense, when we look at verse

10. All my bones shall say, LORD, who is like unto thee, which deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him, yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him. Hengstenberg: "The bones denote the innermost nature." Alexander: "The bones, the frame, the person, are here put for the whole man." Morison: "As the bones are the strongest parts of the human frame, the Psalmist here, in anticipation of deliverance, proposes to serve and glorify God with all his strength." Calvin and Scott use similar language. Paul puts the body for the entire nature, Rom. xii. 1. In this verse the word poor occurs twice. See on Ps. ix. 12, 18; x. 12, 17; xxii. 26. Ainsworth renders it poor, afflicted; Alexander, sufferer. Needy, elsewhere rendered poor; once beggar, 1 Sam. ii. 8. The first of these words commonly designates those who are poor in spirit; the latter, those who are poor in estate. For such a one God works deliverance from him that is too strong, or mighty, or hard for him; even from him that *spoil*eth, strippeth, or preyeth upon him. The interrogative form of this verse contains a challenge.

11. False witnesses did rise up. The word rendered false is a noun, which is elsewhere rendered violence, wrong, cruelty, injustice. We met it in Ps. vii. 16; xxvii. 12. It points to the fierce and injurious character of the witnesses, which rose up. The word occurs more than fifty times in the Hebrew Bible and is not elsewhere rendered false. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate read unjust; Calvin, violent; Hengstenberg, malicious; Ainsworth, witnesses of cruel wrong. David adds: They laid to my charge things that I knew not. The word, rendered laid to charge, might be rendered asked, desired, inquired, requested, required, demanded. The mode of examining persons charged with crime by proposing to them interrogatories is probably alluded to. So that the common version gives the true sense. The Chaldee: They ask me things, which I knew not. This is closely or virtually followed by the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Ainsworth, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander. They question me of things that I knew not. In contests between saints and sinners, the wicked act as if they thought that the multiplication of charges was equal to their proof. If anything could establish the feebleness of the cause of the wicked, it is that the whole kingdom of Satan is built on wrong, violence and falsehood.

12. They rewarded me evil for good. Saul confessed that this was so, 1 Sam. xxiv. 17. Rewarded, rendered, repaid, requited, recompensed. The Hebrew, Arabic, Syriac and Jebb have the verb in the future; Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Fry and Alexander, in the present; Chaldee, Septuagint and kindred versions, Ainsworth and Hengstenberg, in the preterite. David's foes were unscrupulous. They were ready, says he, for the spoiling of my soul, which either means the taking of his life, or the loss, destruction, discomfort, bereavement of his soul. In Isa. xlvii. 8, 9, the word is rendered loss of children. Diodati; "The Hebrew signifieth a privation of all help, comfort, joy and assistance."

13. But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth. Sackcloth was the usual covering of those who were deeply afflicted. It was never put on for trifles. The death of a son, the death of a great man, a dreadful dearth, or some sad event furnished the occasion of wearing sackcloth, Gen. xxxvii. 34; 2 Sam. iii. 31; Joel i. 13. David showed his love for those who were now his foes by having put on the ensigns of grief when they had been seriously sick. Yea, more he says, I humbled my soul with fasting. Sackcloth and fasting were fitly united, Dan. ix. 3. In these ways men humbled and chastened their souls. To fasting he added intercession: And my prayer returned into mine own bosom. A large number of translations have the verb in the preterite as here. Others have it shall return, or shall be turned. What is it for a prayer to return to the bosom of the suppliant? Some think the phrase equivalent to praying continually, as if the petition, being offered from the heart, at once returned to the heart, and was again offered. Although this gives a good sense, it is not the true sense. Others think that it means that his prayer returned to him without effect on those who slighted and despised it. But this cannot be the sense. His prayer was heard. They did recover. Their sickness was healed. Hengstenberg thinks we get the true conception by considering the posture of Elias in prayer, 1 Kings xviii. 42. "He who prays with his head down, appears to bring the prayer back, as it were, to the bosom from which it proceeded." Boothroyd: "When the Orientals pray seriously in grief they hide their face in their bosom: and to this custom the Psalmist here alludes. Rabbi Levi, Dathe and others explain it in like manner." If the verb return be read in the future then it may express a hope or a prophecy that good shall yet come to him from those pure and benevolent prayers. Perhaps a still better sense is had by putting the verb into the imperative, Let my prayer return into my own bosom, q. d., I am so sure that I heartily wished them well, that I now say, Let my prayer return on me. If I wished them any ill, let that ill come on me; but if I wished them good, let that good come to me. This accords with the import of the phrase, recompensing into the bosom found elsewhere, Ps. lxxix. 12; Isa. lxxv. 6, 7; Jer. xxxii. 18; Luke vi. 38.

14. I behaved myself as though he had been my friend or brother. The supplied words are well chosen. But the rendering needlessly changes the plural to the singular. If it read: I behaved myself as though my friend or brother were sick, this difficulty would be avoided, and the sense be preserved. Several versions coincide with the English. For behaved, some prefer went, went on, went along; Chaldee, walked.

Our version surely gives the sense. I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother. Our version is sustained by the Chaldee, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Edwards, Ainsworth, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander. To sackcloth some added dust and ashes. He mourned heavily or greatly. In the afflictions of those who were now his enemies, David gave all the usual signs of strong grief.

15. But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered themselves together. The noun may be rendered either adversity or halting. If halting, yet it is admitted to be used figuratively, and in the sense of adversity. Sometimes the anguish of a sufferer melts even the hard-hearted. It was not so with David's foes. Yea, the objects gathered themselves together against me. Objects variously rendered beaten, smitten, stricken, ungodly, evil men, scourges, rabble, revilers, smiters, base, vile or wicked persons, cripples; and yet those, who thus vary the rendering, seem generally to understand the same as is taught by our version. The beaten, stricken, or smitten were those who had been publicly punished, or who had merited such ignominy. Evil, ungodly, base or wicked are all interpretations having the same bearing. Rabble, the lowest class of men. Revilers, who smite with the tongue. Alexander: "When I limped, cripples mocked at me; i. e., those who were themselves contemptible, treated me with contempt." No word is better than objects. Patrick has "The very scum of the people." David adds: And I knew it not. Some have it, Whom I knew not. If this is right, it points to the obscure character of some who had risen up against him. The man of Uz had like trials, Job xxx. 1-10. If we follow the common version, the sense is that these people had carried on their assaults on David's character and interests in a clandestine manner. They did tear me, or rend, or cut, i. e., with their calumnies and slanders. And ceased not. Hengstenberg: And are not silent; Alexander: And were not silent. The Hebrew is in the preterite. According to other renderings of the same verb in our version, we might read rested not, did not forbear, were not still, held not their peace.

16. With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth. Perhaps very few passages are more idiomatic or have been more variously rendered. Chaldee: With scornful and derisive words of flattery, they gnashed with their teeth against me; Calvin: "Among perfidious jesters at feasts, they gnash upon me with their teeth; Ainsworth: With hypocrites, scoffers for a cake of bread, gnashing their teeth against me; church of England: With the flatterers were busy mockers, who gnashed upon me with their teeth; Hengstenberg: The vile, who mock for bread, gnash against me with their teeth; Alexander: With worthless mockers for bread—gnashing with their teeth. Hypocritical, in our version always so rendered or hypocrite. Others render it profane, vile, worthless, flatterers. Hammond thinks that from the Hebrew word comes our English word knave. Mockers in feasts, are mockers for bread, cake-mockers, who make sport for a living, or to curry favor with rich ungodly men, who were willing to have them at their table, if they would play the buffoon at the expense of David and his cause. Patrick calls them trencher-buffoons. A modern infidel says that "ridicule is the test of truth;" another, that "a bon-mot is better than an argument." A profane jest is much more congenial to a wicked mind than any serious attempt at reasoning. This derision is full of deadly malice. They gnash their teeth, thus exhibiting their rage. Their behaviour, like that of wild beasts around the fold or the barnyard, shows what they would do if they were within.

17. LORD, how long wilt thou look on? i. e., how long wilt thou see these things and not give deliverance? Some versions have it, When wilt thou see? i. e., take up my case and consider it? or, When wilt thou look upon me? Though the general sense thus gained is the same as that given in the common version, yet the English version is more true to the Hebrew. Common trials make weak faith soon cry out, How long? But great trials will make even strong faith do the same. Rescue my soul from their destructions, my darling from the lions. For destructions, some read tumults, desolations, ruins. The deliverance sought is from the complete destruction, which these bitter foes were plotting. Darling, see on Ps. xxii. 20. Lions, men as fierce as lions, having no more mercy than lions. Such a rescue as is here sought would not be ungratefully forgotten:

18. I will give thee thanks in the great congregation. Congregation, as in Ps. xxii. 22, 25. The sense is that thanks should be given in the most public manner, calling on the assembly of God's true worshippers to unite in it. I will praise thee among much people. Much people, the great congregation of the first clause. For much some have mighty. In our version the word is everywhere else rendered strong or mighty; but an assembly is often mighty in numbers and in the range of its interests, when its inherent power is small.

19. Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me. Enemies, usually so rendered, see Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10; xvii. 9. Wrongfully, some prefer with falsity, falsely, lying, without cause, or deceitfully; often in our version wrongfully, Ps. xxxviii. 19; lxix. 4; cxix. 86. The rejoicing here noticed is that of merciless and relentless foes, who would exult at his downfall. Neither let them wink with the eye that hate me without a cause. Diodati: "[Wink] a gesture of a malicious scoffer." Alexander: "Winking is here referred to as a gesture of mutual congratulation among accomplices in guilt." See Pr. vi. 13; x. 10. He prays that his foes may have no cause to exult over him. The last clause of this verse is quoted in application to Christ, John xv. 25; and the language of this and some preceding verses remarkably coincides with portions of Psalm xxii. David is led first to speak of himself, and is then "carried beyond himself by the spirit of prophecy to use language applicable to far more important transactions."

20. For they speak not peace. Without reason the Septuagint and kindred versions have, They indeed spoke peaceable things. The Chaldee and Syriac agree with our version. David says his foes are persistent in their enmity; they have no idea of abating their ferocity; in their consultations they never propose to let him alone. Strange is human malignity, directed against the saints. It never tires. Even to propose peace to persecutors often makes them increasingly violent, Ps. cxx. 7. By incorrigibleness they make it certain and necessary that either themselves or God's people shall be prostrated. When such an issue is made, it is easy to tell who will fall and who will triumph. They not only decline all terms of reconciliation, but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land. This is well rendered. The variations from it are unimportant or erroneous. The people of God are quiet and love peace, Gen. xiii. 7-9; Jas. iii. 18. The wicked love disturbance. They scatter arrows, firebrands and death:

21. Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, as brawlers and persons of lawless speech are in the habit of doing; and said, Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it. There is considerable difficulty in rendering idiomatically the derisive and exultant exclamations of one language into another. The word aha expresses the scorn of one who thought his triumph was or soon would be complete. The Septuagint and kindred versions render it, Well done, well done; church of England, Fie on thee, fie on thee; Hengstenberg, There, there. We have the same in Job xxxix. 25, Ha, ha. Alexander: "It seems to be a natural expression of joyful surprise." So they add, we have seen it, i. e., we see his cause already begin to fail; or we are so sure that it will fail that we may say we see it.

22. This thou hast seen, O LORD. It is for a joy to the righteous, that Jehovah is a spectator of every contest, and has perfect knowledge of the behaviour of each of the contestants. Nor is he an uninterested beholder of the strife between Cain and Abel. If there is a right, God takes sides with that. The contrast is between God's sight of David's state and the sight his enemies had of him. The wicked see and God sees; but O how differently. David has warrant to pray: Keep not silence, i. e., speak out as a Judge and settle this conflict; bring forth my righteousness, as the noon-day; let the events of thy providence soon determine who is right. O LORD, be not far from me. See Ps. xxii. 11, 19; xxxviii. 21; lxxi. 12, where we have just the same. The meaning is that as one, who is afar off can give no prompt and effectual aid, he beseeches God to draw nigh and give decisive help.

23. Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment. Stir up, often so, also often awake, Ps. vii. 6; xlv. 23; Cant. iv. 16; Isa. li. 9. Awake, commonly so rendered, once arise. To my judgment, i. e., so as to give a decision in my favor. This is further explained thus: Even unto my cause, my God and my Lord. In verse 1, David had prayed: Plead my cause. That is virtually what he asks here, but in another form. It is as if he had said: Take up my cause, address thyself to my cause, I am sure what thy decision will be, if thou shalt but attend to it. He continues:

24. Judge me, O LORD, my God, according to thy righteousness. A good cause, once heard and decided in the court of heaven, always triumphs. If Jehovah settles a case, he who has the right will never complain of the decision, for it is always in righteousness, justice, right. And let them not rejoice [exult or triumph] over me. It is a great trial to be afflicted. But in adversity insults from God's enemies are among the very sorest temptations.

25. Let them not say in their hearts [much less with their lips] Ah, so we would have it. Patrick: "Let them have no occasion to think within themselves they shall prevail; saying to their souls, So now all goes well; cheer up, we shall have our desires." Let them not say, We have swallowed him up. To swallow up is utterly to destroy, to devour. The more bold and voracious they were, the more does the Psalmist plead that they may be defeated, not merely for his own safety, but in illustration of the rectitude of God's government.

26. Let them be ashamed and brought to confusion together that rejoice at mine hurt. In v. 4 of this Psalm the first word of this verse is rendered, Let them be confounded. Brought to confusion, the same so rendered in v. 4. The malignity of these men appeared in this, that they rejoiced at the hurt of one who deserved well at their hands. Hurt, as in v. 4; in v. 12, evil. Let them be clothed with shame and dishonor that magnify themselves against me. Chaldee: Who are magnified above me; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Who speak great things against me; Arabic: Who make great their speech against me; Syriac: Who lift themselves up against me; church of England: That boast themselves against me; Ainsworth: That magnify against me; Venema: Who have turned themselves against me. But Calvin, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and Hengstenberg agree with the common version. His foes should be clothed, dressed, covered, arrayed, apparelled with shame and disgrace. The verbs of this verse, which in English are in the imperative, are in Hebrew in the future.

27. Let them shout for joy, and be glad, that favor my righteous cause. The first verb is in our version rendered shout, sing, cry out, rejoice, triumph; the second, rejoice, be joyful, make merry, be glad. Favor, desire, delight in. Just below in this same verse it is rendered hath pleasure in. These verbs and the two verbs next following are all in the future. Yea, let them say continually, Let the LORD be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant. Magnified, the same verb as in v. 26, but in a different form. Prosperity, in v. 20 and commonly peace. In Isa. ix. 6 we have Prince of Peace, where the same word is used.

28. And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long. Speak of, utter, declare, talk of. God's righteousness is his rectitude, or justice.

Deliverance effected by the Lord would be worthy of praise all the day long, or continually.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The Lord is the Advocate of his people. He pleads their cause, v. 1. Its merits will be made to appear. Here a defence is often denied them. When allowed, it is often feeble. But the infinite Advocate will bring forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noonday. There will be a final and perfect eclaireissement of all human affairs, contests and disputes.

2. It may well reconcile us to trials involving our good name, our legal rights, and even our lives to read this Psalm. David was a "holy man, alike eminent for his beneficence and inoffensiveness towards all men, and, by his courtesy and meekness, had merited, both in public and private, the esteem and favor of all;" yet he was maligned, hated, vilified; yea, he was hunted like a wild beast. His good name was torn all to pieces.

3. The Lord is Judge, vv. 1, 24. He is the Judge of all the earth. He is known by the judgments which he executeth. To the pious it is and ever shall be for a joy that there is a tribunal above all the assizes of earth, Ecc. v. 8. A large part of the findings of courts and the sentences of judges on earth will be reversed in the last day.

4. The Lord is a man of war. When necessary he grasps not only the shield and buckler, but also the spear, and goes forth conquering and to conquer, vv. 1-3. Blessed be his name, he fights the battles of the saints. None can resist him. He is the only being in the universe who can do as well with few as with many, with feeble as with mighty instruments.

5. It is a great comfort to have a lively sense of God's favor, when he speaks to our souls, v. 3. We ought to be thankful for the promises, for faith to trust the promises, and still more for a lively sense of their sweetness. If assurance were more sought, it would be oftener found.

6. We may well leave foes in God's hand. He will arrest their mad career, stopping their way, v. 3. He can do this in a thousand ways. Even Saul of Tarsus was arrested, when he least thought of it.

7. When God says, I am thy salvation, it is folly to look further, v. 3. We ought never to ascribe to creatures what belongs to God in our successes.

8. The defeat and overthrow of the finally and incorrigibly wicked will be inconceivably dreadful, vv. 4, 5, 6. No tongue can describe it. Eye has not seen it, ear has not heard it, heart has not conceived it. Their doom will be perfectly just, fearfully distressing, and absolutely total. When they shall begin to slide their way will be so slippery that they will never stop. It will be from darkness into the blackness of darkness. Nor will their destruction be difficult. It is easy for the wind to carry off the chaff and the dust from the threshing-floor.

9. Not only do angels fight for the saints, but they fight against the wicked, vv. 5, 6. Whatever provision men may make against visible foes, they can do nothing against these invisible warriors who chase and persecute those that fight against God's people. If men will war against God, they must expect his angels to war against them. If they would have the angels on their side, let them come over to God's side.

10. There is nothing in the principles or practices of true piety to justify the rage of the wicked against the sons of God. Their hatred is without cause, vv. 7, 19.

11. If others practise the arts of deception, let us set an example of candor and simplicity, v. 7. The more deceitful others are, the more careful should we be to avoid all appearance of artifice. If uprightness and fairness cannot save our cause or credit, they will at least save our conscience, and that is better.

12. With all their cunning the wicked are great fools, v. 7. They are willingly ignorant of some things, without which they cannot act wisely. The king of Syria could not understand how all his plots against Israel failed, 2 Kings vi. 8-12. Dickson: "Though the enemies of the godly do plot secret devices against them, yet not so secret but God can give warning of it, and make it an errand for the godly to pray to him to disappoint the plot."

13. It is for a wonder that the wicked do not confidentially expect an overthrow, when they know there is no fairness in their contest with truth and righteousness. Take from them their nets and pits, their lies and scoffs, and what have they left? v. 7. If they believed the cause of the righteous no better than their own, they would leap for joy. Neither with David, nor with Christ had they at any time a reasonable prospect of success.

14. Sinners are so blind and stupid as to be caught in their own snares, v. 8. In this respect one generation is no wiser than that which went before. Calvin: "It never for a moment occurs to them as at all possible that their stratagems and craft, their wicked practices, and all the snares which they lay for the good and the simple, turn to the destruction of themselves who have devised them."

15. Wondrous is that providence, which brings on the wicked punishment in kind, v. 8. They sought the ruin of another; and they ruined themselves. Morison: "It not unfrequently happens, that when a man is preparing sorrows for his fellow-creatures, he is only, in reality, framing a weapon for his own chastisement, and whetting the edge of those miseries which shall afflict his own soul!"

16. When the wicked perish, there is shouting, v. 9. The wicked, who felt the iron heel of tyranny, are glad to be rid of such a curse. And the righteous adore him, who has put an end to the cruelties of their oppressors.

17. It is a blessed comfort and support to the righteous that they really need nothing, but that it will be for the divine glory to supply it; so that in a most important and encouraging sense their cause is God's cause, and so must succeed, v. 9.

18. How miserable must be the state of the man, who cannot rejoice in all the deliverances God works for those who trust in him, v. 9.

19. Our whole nature should be enlisted on the Lord's side, v. 10. God righteously claims heart, soul, mind and strength; and the truly pious cheerfully give him all. Their bones praise him. Calvin: "Men, in general, praise God in such a manner that he scarcely obtains the tenth part of his due."

20. When God works, he does marvellous things. His deliverances are wonderful. There is none like him in counsel, in deeds and mighty acts, and in glorious excellence, v. 10.

21. As all God's merciful interpositions demand humble and thankful acknowledgment, so the prospect of coming deliverances may well bring from us the humble promise of the highest services, when the rescue shall have been vouchsafed to us. Dickson: "It is a sort of engaging God to deliver, when the heart of the believer engageth itself to glorify God after the delivery."

22. In Jehovah the poor and needy have a protector, who is more than a match for all their oppressors and tormentors, v. 10. He is the Friend of the friendless; the Father of the fatherless; the hope of the despondent; the strength of the weak. It is his office and his delight to take up neglected causes and raise up those that are bowed down.

23. Let none be sore distressed because false witnesses rise up against him, v. 11. Compare Matt. v. 11, 12. It is a sort of compliment to a good man to be slandered.

His enemies must speak evil against him falsely or not at all. He is then in the line of safe precedents. Blessed is he, who can, like the Master, say to accusers, Which of you convinceth me of sin? John viii. 46. The prince of this world had nothing in Christ. His foes had a deal of trouble in getting witnesses, who could tell a tolerably coherent story against him. Matt. xxvi. 59, 60. Even then the wicked, vacillating judge, who sat in his case, was compelled by his conscience repeatedly to say to his accusers: I find no fault in him, Luke xxiii. 4; John xviii. 38; xix. 4, 6.

24. In the time of evil report and of false accusation, it is an unspeakable blessing to have a good conscience, v. 11.

25. Tholuck: "Oppression and violence are never more painful than when they proceed from those who have experienced the proofs of our love," v. 12. Ps. lv. 12.

26. Nothing more clearly proves the dreadful wickedness of ungodly men than their reversal of every great law of God. One is, Render good for evil; but they reward evil for good, v. 12.

27. Fasting was a proper mode of humiliation under the law, v. 13. Moses prescribed no stated fast except that on the great day of atonement, Lev. xxiii. 27-32. But God's people were left each man to judge for himself when fasting was called for by special personal or public calamities; except that now and then by an inspired prophet men were called to this duty. It is not certain, though it is probable that the patriarchs fasted. Under the Gospel the law of fasting fixes no time for this duty. It leaves it wholly to the judgment of God's people from age to age. Probably no religious duty has been more perverted both in ancient and modern times. Isa. lviii. 3-12; Matt. vi. 16-18. Fasts are of two kinds, total and partial. In the former we abstain from all food; in the latter from pleasant food. Under the gospel fasting is lawful, Luke v. 35; Acts xiii. 2, 3.

28. Praying for enemies and seeking their good was a duty, and among the best men a practice under the law as it is under the gospel, vv. 13, 14. Christ commanded and did the same. Great numbers of the martyrs prayed for their murderers. Christ gave no new law for loving enemies; he simply rescued the old law from perversion and neglect. David and Christ thus prayed. "The type was amiable, the anti-type divine." Hearty prayer for wicked foes, earnestly asking on them the blessings we seek for ourselves, is good evidence of a new heart.

29. Without any piety in the world, how much would earth resemble hell, vv. 15, 16.

30. Divine delays prove divine forbearance, and, if they answer no other end, this alone may justify them, v. 17. Compare 2 Pet. iii. 9, 15.

31. It is admitted that public mercies call for public thanks; but in some cases even personal mercies call for public thanks, v. 18. Our religion should not be ostentatious, but it ought not to be clandestine.

32. To ask that the wicked may not prevail against us and insult us is to beseech God to exercise his glorious attributes in a manner suited to beget godly fear and firm confidence, v. 19.

33. When we consider the fondness of wicked men for strife and contention, it is a wonder that the world is as quiet as it is, v. 20.

34. There are no new arts employed by wicked men against God's saints and ministers. The favorite resort of every age is contempt. This is very old, vv. 21, 25.

35. Meanness and wickedness walk arm in arm. Nothing is baser than insulting an innocent man fallen under reproach. Yet David's foes did this, v. 21.

36. It is a great mercy that God knows the whole state of every case, and watches the progress of every wrong inflicted on those, who trust in his name, v. 22.

37. Dickson: "The hardest condition that can befall a believer, is a tolerable case and condition, if God draw near to his soul," v. 22.

38. With submission to God we may urgently ask him no longer to delay his appearance for our relief, vv. 22, 23.

39. The last resort of the saints in all their trials is the righteousness of God, v. 24. This never fails them.

40. The hearts of wicked men make all their wars against God and godliness to be deadly. They would swallow up and devour the saints, if they could, v. 25. In eighteen centuries they have put to death fifty millions of them.

41. The more the wicked magnify themselves against the saints, the greater in the end will be their shame and confusion, v. 26.

42. The righteous have cause for all their joys. God himself sustains them in their highest exultations, v. 27. They are not glad in a thing of nought, when they rejoice in the Lord. It is not idle vaunting to boast in God.

43. It is no less the purpose than the hope of all the saints to spend their whole future existence in praising and extolling God, v. 28.

44. As God saved David from the hand of all his foes, so shall he save all his chosen from their sins and adversaries. He who put David on the throne of Israel and Jesus on the throne in glory, will assuredly exalt all his people to an everlasting kingdom.

PSALM XXXVI.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David the servant of the LORD.

1 The transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes.

2 For he flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

3 The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit: he hath left off to be wise, and to do good.

4 He deviseth mischief upon his bed; he setteth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil.

5 Thy mercy, O LORD, is in the heavens; and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds.

6 Thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep: O LORD, thou preservest man and beast.

7 How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.

8 They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures.

9 For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light.

10 Oh continue thy loving-kindness unto them that know thee; and thy righteousness to the upright in heart.

11 Let not the foot of pride come against me, and let not the hand of the wicked remove me.

12 There are the workers of iniquity fallen: they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise.

THE several clauses of the title are explained in titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. xviii. The words, the servant of the LORD, are by some regarded as a claim of speaking by God's authority. Others think it is a setting of God's authority directly over against the wicked speeches of the ungodly here noticed. This would be a sufficient reason; but the same is not done in Ps. xiv. liii. where the profane are represented as boldly uttering vile sentiments. David is the author of this Psalm. A few have expressed a counter opinion, but without good cause. We cannot determine whether it had any historic occasion. The Syriac and Arabic refer it to some period in the Sauline persecutions. Scott dates it B. C., 1062; Clarke thinks it was written during the Babylonish captivity. It is a composition of rare excellence. Luther: "This is a Psalm containing a very necessary doctrine;" Tholuck: "It is a lofty Psalm of supplication;" Clarke: "It is one of the finest Psalms in the whole collection." Others bear like testimony. In it we find these names of the Most High, Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. On El, see v. 6.

1. The transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes. Musculus: "This verse is obscure and variously rendered." The classes of various renderings of the first clause are such as these: Montanus: The oracle of wickedness, to the ungodly, is in the inmost of his heart; Boothroyd: The oracle of transgression, to the wicked, is within,—even his own heart; Lowth: The wicked man, according to the wickedness in his heart, saith, There is no fear of God before mine eyes. This requires a change of the Hebrew text. Many versions, so far as intelligible, coincide with the sense gained from our version. Some think that saith points to oracular authority. Transgression, also sin, trespass. Wicked; in Ps. i. ungodly; often as here. Within my heart, i. e., in my inward part, as in Ps. v. 9; or to my inward thought, as in Ps. xlix. 11. Perhaps the first clause means: "The trespass of the ungodly, as clearly as the oracles of God, makes known to me in my heart so as to affect me." This gives a good sense, agrees with the context, has no unanswerable objection to it and requires but a legitimate use of personification. The latter clause is, with the exception of Lowth, uniformly rendered. These views coincide with those of the mass of commentators. See Calvin, Pool, Henry, Scott and others. Diodati: "Through the experience I have of his wicked life, I do discover and conclude within myself that he hath forsaken all manner of piety and fear of God;" Alexander: "Depravity itself bore witness against the wicked, in the Psalmist's mind, that there was no fear of God before his eyes." "Not having the fear of God before his eyes," has become inwoven into proceedings in criminal courts. When a man has no fear of God, he is prepared for any crime.

2. For he flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful. In rendering this verse, there are many variations, most of which claim no attention. The following are given; Montanus: For he has smoothed over in his own eyes, with respect to the finding out of his iniquity to hate it; Ainsworth: For he flattereth himself in his own eyes, to find his iniquity which he ought to hate; Edwards: Though he smootheth over his iniquity to himself in his own eyes, yet it must at last be found out and make him detestable; Green: But though he flattereth himself in his own sight, his iniquity must be found out and make him odious. To flatter [or smooth over as to] himself is better than to read, flatter God, as Tholuck does. No rendering is better than our version. That the verbs of the last clause may be taken as passive many assert. For examples see Josh. ii. 5; Esther vi. 6; Ps. xxxii. 9; li. 6. Is his iniquity hateful to himself, or to his neighbors? The latter best accords with the preceding clause and with fact. Many a vile man is self-complacent long after his sins have made him odious to all around him. This is the view of Calvin and others. Scott: "The wicked man not only disguises his crimes or intentions from others; but, through the excess of self-love, he becomes his own flatterer, calls his vices by soft names or mistakes them for virtues; and deems his conduct justifiable, perhaps meritorious, when in fact it is a hateful compound of impiety, injustice and malevolence, and will very soon be proved to be so." How rarely do we find, even in the cells of convicts, a man who regards his sentence just, or himself vile. Martin

Bucer: "As the wicked have no regard for God, so they exceedingly please and flatter themselves."

3. The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit. Iniquity, as in Ps. v. 5; vi. 8; also rendered vanity, wickedness, sorrow, affliction; in verse 4, mischief. Deceit, as in Ps. v. 6; x. 7; in Ps. xxxiv. 13, guile; in Gen. xxvii. 35, subtilty. It is not surprising that he adds concerning such a man: He hath left off to be wise, and to do good. Chaldee: He hath ceased to understand, (so) that he might do good; Syriac: Nor does he wish to do good; Alexander: He has ceased to act wisely, to act well. Each of these renderings speaks a truth, but none of them is better than the authorized version.

4. He deviseth mischief upon his bed. Mischief, in verse 3, iniquity. The good man on his bed meditates on God and good things; the wicked, on things of vanity and impiety. Compare Ps. xciv. 11; Gen. vi. 5. A wicked man carries with him a wicked heart, even to bed, yea, to the sanctuary. The result is: He setteth himself in a way that is not good. Setteth, Chaldee, remaineth; Arabic, stood; Alexander, will take his stand. He, who allowedly lives in one known sin, is on the high way to all iniquity. Sin is in its nature stubborn, wilful, perverse. So that, He abhorreth not evil. Abhorreth, refuseth, rejecteth, despiseth, contemneth, Job xlii. 6; Ps. xv. 4; lxxviii. 59. There is no stronger Hebrew verb for expressing aversion. The wicked neither dreads nor detests iniquity. How then should he avoid it? It is always courting him, pressing upon him, seducing him. Bad as he is, he is constantly growing worse, Jer. ix. 3; 2 Tim. iii. 13.

5. Thy mercy, O LORD, is in the heavens. Mercy, as in Ps. v. 7; xvii. 7. In the heavens, i. e., exalted, excellent, rising high, abundant, very great. And as God has goodness, loving-kindness, mercy as one of his infinite perfections, so has he unfailing fidelity to all his promises: and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds. The Hebrew noun is elsewhere once rendered faith, Hab. ii. 4; once stability, Isa. xxxiii. 6; frequently, truth, Ps. lxxxix. 49; xvi. 13; xeviii. 3; but most commonly faithfulness. God's veracity cannot fail. It knows no limits, Lam. iii. 23. It rises high, reaching to the clouds, which are quite beyond our grasp. His faithfulness is infinite. Arnd: "In all tribulations, let them be ever so high, so deep, so broad and long, God's truth and grace are still greater and higher." The transition in this and subsequent verses from the subject of vv. 1-4 is very happy. There the prophet had given the unscrupulous, self-conceited, deceitful, cruel, unrighteous character of the wicked; here he holds up to our faith the glorious character of God:

6. Thy righteousness is like the great mountains. Righteousness, as in Ps. v. 8; xi. 7; xxiv. 5. Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Vulgate: Thy righteousness is as the mountains of God. This is followed by Calvin, Venema, Marloratus, Ainsworth, Brent, Fabritius, Jebb, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The Syriac has it: Thy righteousness is as the mountains, O God. For great Fry has mighty; Chaldee and church of England, strong; Piscator and Edwards agree with our version. This diversity arises from the fact that the word rendered great is El, in many places rendered God. This does not indeed vary the sense. It is a Hebrew form of expression. The mountains of God are great mountains. We have the same word applied to a river, in Ps. lxxv. 9; to cedars, in Ps. lxxx. 10; to trees, in Ps. civ. 16. In Psalms lxxv. civ. our version follows the Hebrew; but in Ps. lxxx. 10 we have goodly. Our version misleads no one, because it gives the meaning and is therefore in the best sense a translation. There are two senses in which God's righteousness resembles the mighty mountains; first, in stability, secondly, in height or vastness, Ps. lxxi. 19. It shall endure forever. It is infinite. The next clause fitly follows: Thy judgments are a great deep. Parallel to this is Rom. xi. 33, "How unsearchable are his judgments."

Judgments, see on Ps. x. 5; xix. 9; God's decisions, whether given in his word or in providence. Here the reference seems to be to his ways in providence. Chaldee: Thy judgments are deep like a great abyss. Lowth reads a vast abyss; Ainsworth, a great depth; Hengstenberg, a great flood; Tholuck, like great seas. Immeasurableness, infinitude seems to be the primary idea intended. From this naturally follows their incomprehensibleness, and so their mysteriousness. All God's decisions have a scope far beyond our perception. They flow from eternal righteousness. They are final and unimpeachable, because they are good and are the judgments of God. O LORD, thou preservest man and beast. God's righteous ways in providence produce all the happiness there is on earth, among brutes or men. Each living thing is an unanswerable proof of the goodness of providence. Beasts and birds are often mentioned as sharing the providential goodness of God. The argument is that if God takes care of them, much more will he provide for men. And if he is kind to all men, even very kind to them, much more will he be unspeakably gracious to the righteous, who put their trust in him.

7. How excellent is thy lovingkindness, O God! Lovingkindness, so also in v. 10; in v. 5, mercy. Excellent, in Ps. xlv. 9, honorable; in Ps. cxvi. 15, precious. Therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings. For therefore some have but; some, and; and some omit it altogether; but the best have therefore, or accordingly. This most perfectly shows the connection. Children of men; Chaldee, Men; many versions, Sons of men; Venema and Ainsworth, Sons of Adam; Alexander, Sons of man. The imagery here presented, the shadow of wings, is either drawn from the wings of the cherubim overshadowing the ark of the covenant, or from the wings of a fowl protecting her young. The former view seems to have been taken by the Chaldee, and is favored by many modern translations. Many others, no less respectable, adopt the latter view. The verse (Deut. xxxii. 11) adduced by Bishop Hare, does not refer to the protection of young eagles in the nest, but to training them to fly, after the nest is broken up. The passages generally supposed to be parallel are Ps. xvii. 8; lvii. 1; lxi. 4; lxiii. 7; xci. 1. All of these may be interpreted either way. But Ps. xci. 4, and Matt. xxiii. 37, clearly point to the latter mode of exposition. All the confidence reposed by the humble of earth in the Almighty, is justified by his manifested excellence—his precious lovingkindness.

8. They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house. For abundantly satisfied, some suggest inebriated, plenteously moistened, watered, drenched. But none of these are good. Some read drink, be refreshed, be most richly filled, be satiated. These are good, but not better than the common version. The figure points to guests entertained at a feast in God's house. Fatness abounded in feasts, Job xxxvi. 16; Ps. lxiii. 5; Isa. lv. 2; Jer. xxxi. 14. We ought not to limit the significance of this promise to any one class of blessings. Clearly both the words and the analogy of faith embrace all good things, temporal and eternal. The parallelism is preserved in the next clause: And thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures. Pleasures; also rendered delights. Clarke, Anderson, Hengstenberg and Alexander think the Hebrew points to Gen. ii. 10. The word rendered pleasures is the plural of Eden. The abundance of excellent things secured to the righteous is often taught by the figure of a river, Ps. xlv. 4; Zech. xiv. 8; John iv. 10; Rev. xxii. 1. God will bring his people to the river, and cause them to drink, and they shall thirst no more. All this he can easily do.

9. For with thee is the fountain of life. The fatness and river of pleasures of the preceding verse are here explained by the word life, which points to the sum of bliss and of all good things. Calvin: "There is not a drop of life to be found without God." Compare Acts xvii. 28; Rom. vi. 23. Life and light agree: In thy light shall we see light. Chaldee: In the brightness of thy glory shall we see light. The common version is literal. Alexander: "It is only by the light of God's countenance that man can see any good. It is only in God's favor that he can be happy. The only bliss attainable or desirable is that which is bestowed by God and resides in him." We are by nature blinded, benighted, lost in darkness, yea, we are darkness itself, so that while "the light shineth in darkness, the darkness comprehendeth it not." John i. 5; Eph. v. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 9. There are no richer promises than those found in Isa. lx. 20; Rev. xxii. 5; and they both respect light. He who relishes God's blessings, desires that they may last:

10. Oh continue thy lovingkindness unto them that know thee. Lovingkindness, as in vv. 5, 7. Those that know God are the truly pious, the knowledge of God being an essential part of real godliness. Continue, elsewhere draw out, prolong, Ex. xii. 21; Ps. lxxxv. 5; Isa. xiii. 22; Ezek. xii. 25, 28. Hengstenberg: "With God there is never a new beginning, but only a continuation; if he continues to act as he has done, he helps us." David and all the saints knew and confessed that they should need goodness, mercy, lovingkindness to the end of life. We shall need it at the day of judgment, 2 Tim. i. 18. He adds; And [prolong] thy righteousness to the upright in heart. Righteousness, as in v. 6. See also Ps. v. 8. The upright are the same as those who savingly know God. See on Ps. vii. 10. God's servants are in heart honest, sincere, truthful. They are not deceivers. Calvin: "The light of faith must necessarily dispose us to uprightness of heart."

11. Let not the foot of pride come against me. Trials brought on us by insolent men are among the severest of a good man's life. He has no heart to return insolence for insolence. He sees and abhors the injustice dealt out to him. A good man may well ask to be saved from such a trial. The next clause is parallel: And let not the hand of the wicked remove me. In the former clause we have the foot, and in this the hand for the person. The prophet is praying against being in the power of bad men. The transition from the plural in preceding verses to the singular in this shows that the Psalm relates to matters common to all good men. He asks that the wicked may not remove him, i. e., not be able to make him a wanderer. In Gen. iv. 12, 14, the participle is rendered vagabond. Montanus: "He shall not cause me to wander;" Alexander: "The last verb is causative and strictly means to put to flight, cause to wander, or send into exile."

12. There are the workers of iniquity fallen. His prayer was hardly offered till it was answered, or till he was assured it should be answered. He saw the foot of pride and the hand of violence approaching, and cried for deliverance; and lo! they are already fallen. The first word, rendered there, justifies this construction. Mudge: "It represents strongly before the eye the downfall of the wicked. Upon the very spot where they practise their treachery, they receive their downfall." Iniquity, as in vv. 3, 4. The unregenerate are always the workers of iniquity. When the wicked fall, they are undone. They are cast down, and shall not be able to rise, Ps. xviii. 38. It is far different with the righteous, Ps. xxxvii. 24; Pr. xxiv. 16; Micah vii. 8.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Wicked men are very blind and foolish, else they would learn their own characters from their own lives. Discerning people see through them. Their character is no secret, v. 1. Those, who hypocritically profess religion, are not exceptions. "You know a servant in the present day by the livery he wears; and so, if you see a sinner doing Satan's works, and hear him using Satan's language, and going here and there at Satan's bidding," you know that he is Satan's servant, 1 John iii. 8.

2. It is a great mercy when God so shows us the wickedness of others as to let us see the odiousness of their sins and the danger of their course, v. 1. Tholuck: "There are moments in our life, when the dimness and mystery of the course of the world suddenly dissolve, and the world, seen in the light of faith, assumes a new appearance."

3. Total depravity is not too strong a term to describe human wickedness. The sinner has no fear of God, v. 1. Where that is wanting, how can there be any piety? And if there is no piety, there must be total want of right affections, and that is the very essence of depravity.

4. Professors of religion may judge of their state by ascertaining whether they do truly fear God, and how much they fear him. If they have no fear, they have no grace. If their fear is very imperfect, so is their whole Christian character.

5. Self-flattery and self-deception seem to be born with sin; and, if not resisted, will certainly prove our ruin, v. 2. Not a word of ingenuous confession escaped the lips of either Adam or Eve, when called to account. The very men, who were plotting the death of Christ, said, "Who goeth about to kill thee?" Compare Isa. xxviii. 15.

6. The progress of sin is very fearful, v. 2. Conscience, peace, hope, character, self-respect, health all go by a "paulatim process," until the poor soul is ready for ruin; and even then God sometimes seems to arrest the natural course of things for a short season, till at last some slight event terminates the earthly career, and the soul drops into the lake of fire.

7. We cannot too often or too earnestly ask God to make us honest with ourselves, that we may not by self-flattery fall into the condemnation of the wicked, v. 2.

8. It is possible to sin so boldly and atrociously as to become detestable, v. 2. Even vile and wicked men are often struck with horror at some crimes. To the wicked all sin will ere long appear more mischievous and ruinous, than to good men it now appears.

9. While the righteous cannot too tenderly pity, nor too earnestly pray for poor sinful men, they cannot too profoundly abhor their ways and characters, v. 2. If even a sinner may see the odiousness of some transgressions, surely those, who are born from above, ought to hate all sin, wherever seen, and ought to hate it intensely, Ps. cxxxix. 21, 22.

10. We ought always to be alarmed when we find ourselves pleading for wickedness, or excusing it in ourselves or others, v. 3.

11. If nothing else evinced the character of bad men, their speech proves their hearts evil, v. 3. Reader, would you know by what rule your destiny will at last be determined, read Matt. xii. 37.

12. A great part of the sin of men consists in omission, "in leaving off to be wise and to do good," v. 3. Compare Dan. v. 23. "Lord, forgive my sins of omission." Not only are sins of omission sins, but they are the high way to all sins.

13. Diligence in doing evil is a mark of deep depravity, v. 4.

14. When all the sinful desires, vain thoughts, evil words and wicked deeds of men shall be made known, angels and men will confess the justice of the sentence, which shuts the sinner out of paradise. The mischief he has devised upon his bed would itself justify damnation, v. 4. Compare Ecc. xii. 14. Morison: "Could the nightly thoughts and practices of the wicked be laid open to the eye of man, as they are to the eye of God, what a scene of moral guilt and pollution would they disclose!"

15. The contrast between saints and sinners is great, vv. 1-4. Modest and retiring as a good man may be, his deportment says to those, who have spiritual discernment, The fear of God is before his eyes. Instead of flattering himself, he judges himself, condemns himself, abhors himself and repents in dust and ashes. The law of kindness and of truth is in his mouth. He seeks and finds wisdom from above. He does good as he has opportunity. The cause he understands not he seeks out. He is firm as a rock, when he knows he is right. He abhors evil. In all these respects the saint and sinner radically differ.

16. Sinners have set themselves to do evil, v. 4. They are always doing it. They sleep not except they have done some mischief. Even dying sinners seem commonly to prefer to be lost rather than to obey the Gospel.

17. He that does not abhor evil is in a bad way. Yet where is the unrenewed man, that can even persuade himself that he has a strong dislike to everything forbidden or condemned in God's word?

18. With pleasure does the devout mind turn away from the contemplation of the vile character of the wicked as here delineated, to that of the glorious character of God, in vv. 5-9! The sublimest tracks of thought ever pursued, and those yielding the richest harvest of comfort and edification, are found in the existence, attributes, providence, worship and glories of Jehovah. Here we have themes at once awful and pleasing, dreadful and refreshing.

19. In our thoughts, prayers and preaching we may safely follow the Scriptures and give a delightful prominence to the mercy, the lovingkindness of the Lord, speaking of that first and most frequently, vv. 5, 7, 10. God will not show mercy at the expense of justice; but God is love, and has infinite delight in exercising his loving nature, and in filling heaven with its monuments, and he has sworn that he has no pleasure in the death of sinners.

20. God is also faithful, v. 5. His faithfulness is unto all generations. It is great, unto the clouds. Therefore the laws of nature are stable; an humble sinner never perished; and a believer in extremity is as safe as one in no unusual peril.

21. Nor let us forget that justice, as it is amiable in any ruler, is peculiarly so in the Governor of the universe, v. 6. In him it has infinite scope. It is like the great mountains. There is an ample field for the exercise of God's righteousness, respecting his people.

22. Nor should we avert our attention from God's judgments, though they are often incomprehensible, v. 6. They furnish much food for pious contemplation, and they are "stupendous and unfathomable as the waters of the great deep." The Noachic Deluge and the destruction of the cities of the plain were two of the most terrific of God's judgments. Evidences of the former are found on every mountain. Of the latter the Dead Sea stands an irrefragable proof. What two events in history have been more useful to keep the world in awe, to remind Christians that the Lord is God, and to assure all the saints that when the worst comes on the wicked, God makes a difference between those, who serve him, and those, who serve him not? He, who is rightly affected with God's terrible judgments, will revere all his decisions.

23. God's providence embraces absolutely all things, v. 6. Man and beast, all causes and effects, all creatures celestial, terrestrial and infernal, all events, all things are controlled by the Almighty.

24. We shall never be able to find terms by which to express all God's love to his people, v. 7. Some ignorance is better than some knowledge. I had rather hear the exclamation, How excellent! than the cry, I know it all.

25. The more we trust in God, the more evidence we have that we rightly esteem his excellent character, v. 7.

26. If a man would let his soul delight itself in fatness, if he would drink and thirst no more, let him embrace the truth and covenant of God. Then he shall have food indeed; and he shall drink of the river of God's pleasures, v. 8. Compare Jer.

xxxi. 25. Making souls and satisfying them are prerogatives of God.

27. There can never be a failure of good things to those whom God loves, for "with him is the fountain of life," v. 9. If the fountain is with him, the streams can never be cut off from those who are in his bosom. Is not that clear? All other good is but a drop. With God is the ocean.

28. Clarke: "No man can illuminate his own soul: all understanding must come from heaven," v. 9.

29. If God will go on with the saints as he has begun, all will be well. They can ask no more, v. 10. He has already given them his Son, his Spirit, himself, his word, his oath, and his covenant established on the best of promises. He will finish his work on the scale on which he began it.

30. Knowledge and uprightness are essential properties of a gracious character, v. 10. One is as important as the other. "Ye worship ye know not what" is a sentence fatal to any hopes of salvation. And a crooked way did never point to a new heart.

31. It is a great mercy to have exemption from the scorn, cruelty and violence of the proud and wicked! v. 11. If those who are now often murmuring with their lot, were but for a few weeks subjected to the tyranny of Saul and Doeg, or to the ingratitude and baseness of Absalom, or to the refined cruelties of Charles II., or to the brutality and vengeance of Jeffries and Claverhouse, how would their views be altered.

32. Dickson: "It is the Lord only who can divert proud persecutors, that they hurt not his children; and it is the Lord only who can keep his children in the course of faith and obedience, when the wicked employ their power against them," v. 11.

33. The overthrow of the wicked will be beyond expression fearful. They will never recover, they will never begin to recover, they will never hope to recover from their dreadful fall, v. 12. Tholuck: "The present prosperity of the wicked can only be regarded as a term of the long-suffering of God, which gives them the opportunity, by repentance, to escape the final judgment of God." And if they should not count that long-suffering salvation, who can conceive the horrors of their state?

34. The church is safe, vv. 5-12.

PSALM XXXVII.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.
- 2 For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb.
- 3 Trust in the LORD, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.
- 4 Delight thyself also in the LORD; and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart.
- 5 Commit thy way unto the LORD; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass.
- 6 And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday.
- 7 Rest in the LORD, and wait patiently for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.
- 8 Cease from anger, and forsake wrath: fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.
- 9 For evil doers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth.
- 10 For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be.
- 11 But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.
- 12 The wicked plotteth against the just, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth.
- 13 The Lord shall laugh at him: for he seeth that his day is coming.
- 14 The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the poor and needy, and to slay such as be of upright conversation.

- 15 Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bows shall be broken.
 16 A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked.
 17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but the LORD upholdeth the righteous.
 18 The LORD knoweth the days of the upright: and their inheritance shall be for ever.
 19 They shall not be ashamed in the evil time: and in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.
 20 But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the LORD shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away.
 21 The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.
 22 For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off.
 23 The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way.
 24 Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the LORD upholdeth him with his hand.
 25 I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.
 26 He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed.
 27 Depart from evil, and do good; and dwell for evermore.
 28 For the LORD loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off.
 29 The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever.
 30 The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment.
 31 The law of his God is in his heart; none of his steps shall slide.
 32 The wicked watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him.
 33 The LORD will not leave him in his hand, nor condemn him when he is judged.
 34 Wait on the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.
 35 I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.
 36 Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.
 37 Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace.
 38 But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off.
 39 But the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD: he is their strength in the time of trouble.
 40 And the LORD shall help them, and deliver them: he shall deliver them from the wicked, and save them, because they trust in him.

IT is remarkable that the title of this long and precious Psalm should in the Hebrew consist of a single word, the name of its author. See on titles of Psalms iii. xi.

This is the third alphabetical Psalm. But the alphabetical arrangement is irregular, and even imperfect. The sixteenth letter of the alphabet is wholly omitted. One letter has three verses assigned to it. Three letters have but one verse each. The rest have two verses each. On this subject see Introduction, § 13, and on Ps. xxv. There is nothing to justify a belief that David did not compose this Psalm. The title is conclusive. Hengstenberg: "The reasons, which have been brought against the Davidic origin of this Psalm, are of no weight." The most prominent theme of this and of Psalms xlix. lxxiii. seems to be the mysteriousness of providence in allowing to the wicked so much apparent prosperity. The Psalm abounds in proverbial wisdom. It is full of weighty doctrine expressed in few and well-chosen words. Horne: "The Psalm is rather a collection of divine aphorisms on the same subject, than a continued and connected discourse." Hengstenberg says it is an "unquestionable fact, that the Psalm forms the basis of a series of declarations in the Proverbs of Solomon." However this may be, it is full of "many excellent cautions and counsels." Delaney supposes this ode written for the comfort of Mephibosheth under the calumny of Ziba. Alexander: "The whole Psalm seems to have reference to David's own experience in the case of Saul, Nabal, Absalom, Ahithophel, and others." This is very much the view of Luther and Hengstenberg. Dodd: "This Psalm was made by David in his old age." Scott dates it B. C. 1017, three years before David's death. It excels in giving us line upon line. A good rule for instructing the young, the feeble, or the tempted is, A little at a time and often repeated. Things of the same import are here said again and again, yet with a pleasing diversity of expression. Amyrald compares the sentences of this Psalm to "so many precious stones or pearls strung together upon one thread to form a necklace." Luther: "The sum of this Psalm is,—Suffer; that is, learn patience. Every evil must be overcome by bearing it with patience. Cast thy cares upon the Lord. Do not murmur; be not angry; wish no ill to the wicked. Leave the management and government of all to God: he is a righteous Judge." Few will agree with Horsley, that "the Messiah, if not exclusively, is yet principally the subject of this Psalm." See Introduction, § 8. We have here three names of the Most High, Jehovah LORD, Adonai Lord and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4; iii. 2.

1. Fret not thyself because of evildoers. The Chaldée: Be not moved against the malicious so that thou become like them; Piscator and Fabritius: Be not inflamed with anger because of evil-doers; Marlortus: Be not troubled on account of the malicious; Edwards: Be not inflamed with indignation against evil-doers; Hengstenberg: Inflame not thyself against the miscreants. In the authorized version the verb is never rendered, Fret thyself, except in one form, and then only here, in vv. 1, 7, 8, and in Prov. xxiv. 19, probably copied hence. A very good rendering would be, Be not incensed, Be not displeased, Isa. xli. 11; xlv. 24; 1 Chron. xiii. 11; Hab. iii. 8. The sins but not the prosperity of bad men should grieve the righteous. The subject of remark is the estate, not the character of evildoers. Grieving at their success naturally leads to other evil feelings: Neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity. The Chaldee: Neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity that thou mayest be joined with them. Most other versions very much coincide with the English. Fretting leads to hatred, and envy to malice; and these sinful feelings indulged make men evildoers. The tendency of bad passions to make us like the worst of men is often declared, v. 8; Prov. iii. 31; xiv. 17; xxii. 24, 25; xxix. 22. The great preservative against all envy and malice is the fear of the Lord, Prov. xxiii. 17. This first verse is a very strong proof of the divine origin of the Psalm. None but inspired writers insist on purity of heart. The evil tendency of fretting at the perverseness of bad men is well illustrated in the case of David respecting Nabal, as recorded in 1 Sam. xxv. 4–38.

2. For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb. Often and admirably in Scripture is the frail nature of man compared to growing herbs, 2 Kings xix. 26; Ps. xc. 5; xcii. 7; ciii. 15; Isa. xxxvii. 27; xl. 6, 7; Jas. i. 10; 1 Pet. i. 24. Ten days after David turned aside from slaying Nabal, that miserable man died. Just as a great number of good men were about to be martyred, bloody Mary went to her account. Arnd: "When grass has stood its time, it will be cut down. So, when the ungodly have accomplished their end by their prosperity, God sends one against them, who cuts them off; as may be seen in Saul and Ahab, who, as soon as they were ripe, were swept away, by an enemy sent on purpose by God. And when the flowers and green herbs have stood and bloomed their time, they fall of themselves and wither away. So is it with all the ungodly amid their temporal prosperity. And then they are such flowers, as, when once fallen, revive no more, but forever corrupt and waste, and blossom not again. Ah! why should we then be filled with anger at them, and begrudge them their short-lived good? We should rather pity their blindness." For cut down Alexander reads mown. Wither, as in Ps. i. 3, most commonly fade, as in Ps. xviii. 45; Isa. xl. 7, 8. None ever envied the temporal greatness of one, who, he knew, would be a dead man in one hour.

3. Trust in the LORD, and do good. Chaldee: Confide in the word of the Lord and do good; Syriac: Hope in God, and do good. Other renderings very nearly agree with the common version. Trust, as in Ps. iv. 5; ix. 10; in Ps. xxii. 9, hope.

For do good the church of England has be doing good. This is better, signifying that life should consist of continued acts of beneficence to man and of piety towards God. The call upon these tempted souls to exercise faith in God was most seasonable. Without this confidence in God the great mass of men will ever trust in uncertain riches, or in something as worthless. True faith acts well its part. It delights to do good. So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. Perhaps the following renderings may aid the reader: Calvin and Jebb: Dwell in the land, and be fed in truth; Brent: Dwell in the land, and seek sustenance honestly; Venema: Dwell in the land and nourish constancy; Edwards: So shalt thou dwell in the land and live securely; Tholuck: Dwell in the land, and be honest; Hengstenberg: Inhabit the land, and feed on faithfulness. In Hebrew the verbs are in the imperative. But see Introduction, § 6. Here the future is best, especially in the last verb. Verily, a noun rendered faithfully in 2 Kings xii. 15; xxii. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12; once, truly in Pr. xii. 22. Either of these renderings gives a good sense. Alexander thinks the chief emphasis of the last clause "lies in representing the veracity of God, or the certain fulfilment of his promise, as the very food by which the believer is sustained, and his hope nourished." Others seem no less confident that yet other interpretations are sound. But none of them are safer or better than that suggested by the common version. Perhaps the most plausible view different from that is that which supposes that the people are here exhorted to abide in their own land, and not become dispersed among surrounding nations, inasmuch as God would at home supply their necessary wants. By the land we are probably not to understand the earth, as Fry does; but the land of Canaan, which "was considered as the sum of earthly and the type of heavenly felicity: to be provided for in the Lord's land, and there to dwell under his protection, near his ordinances, and among his people, was all that the genuine Israelite could desire."

4. Delight thyself also in the LORD. Syriac: Hope in the Lord. Other versions, ancient and modern, remarkably concur in giving the sense gathered from the English text. Delight, as in v. 11; Job xxvii. 10; Isa. lv. 2. Take refined pleasure, or, Let your most exquisite delight be in the existence, names, titles, attributes, works, providence, word and ordinances of God. There is an absurdity in calling on men to be delighted with vanities. But when Jehovah is presented as the sea of love and enjoyment, we may well ask the weary to bathe and be refreshed. Whoso thus delights himself in the Lord will have holy wishes, pleasing to the Most High: And he [Jehovah] shall give thee the desires of thine heart. Desires; requests, petitions, demands, counsels, askings. The most enlarged and noble longings of pious hearts have been fulfilled. Moses had a great desire to see God's glory; and the Lord showed him as much as he could bear. Solomon had a quenchless thirst after knowledge and wisdom, and Jehovah made him the wisest of mere men. The reigning desires of eminently pious people are that they may glorify God on earth, grow in knowledge and grace, holiness and usefulness, comfort and courage; and in heaven enjoy God, have rest and glory, complete salvation and endless felicity. All these things shall be given them, Ps. x. 17; xxi. 2; cxlv. 19. We shall have the petitions that we ask of him, 1 John v. 15; Ps. xx. 5.

5. Commit thy way unto the LORD. Syriac: Direct thy way before the Lord; the other ancient versions give to the verb the sense of discover, disclose, reveal, or manifest; Ainsworth: Turn confidently thy way upon Jehovah. But Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Venema, Amesius, Brent, Gesenius, Hammond, Hengstenberg and Alexander all prefer rendering it, Roll [or devolve] on Jehovah thy way [or ways.] See on Ps. xxii. 8. The verb is often rendered roll as in Gen. xxix. 3, 8; Josh. v. 9; x. 18; 1 Sam. xiv. 33; Isa. ix. 5. Several other versions agree with the English text and have Commit, etc. In Pr. xvi. 3: Commit thy works unto the Lord; literally, Roll thy works on Jehovah. Our ways are our works, enterprises, undertakings. Diodati: "Thy businesses, actions, and all the passages and chances of thy life." The first clause of the verse is explained by the second: Trust also in him. Trust, as in v. 3. And he shall bring it to pass. If God favor an enterprise, it will not fail. If he build the house, it will stand. The error against which we are here warned is reliance on our own strength or wisdom. The encouragement here given to renounce all self-confidence and to look to God alone, is that he will graciously undertake our case, bear our burdens, and accomplish for us that which we could never bring to pass. David had a beautiful illustration of the truth here urged, in his coming into full and peaceable possession of the throne.

6. And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday. This has special reference to the calumnies and misrepresentations under which good men often suffer, especially when carrying on any work for God's glory. It was well illustrated in the history of Nehemiah in rebuilding the holy city. Calvin's paraphrase is: "We may be often grievously oppressed, and God may not seem to approve our innocence, yet this vicissitude should no more disturb our minds than the darkness of the night which covers the earth; for then the expectation of the light of day sustains our hopes." Patrick thinks the illustration is drawn from murky weather followed by clear shining: "If thou shouldst be accused as a man of evil designs; let not that trouble thee neither: for though thy fame may be obscured for a time by calumnies and slanders, as the sun is by mists and clouds; yet as that scatters them all at last, so shall thy integrity appear, and shine as bright as the sun at noonday." In the end all the righteous will be satisfied with the vindication of their characters, and the reward of their deeds. Hengstenberg cites Job xi. 17; Isa. lviii. 8; Mic. vii. 9, as illustrating the nature of the blessing promised in the light and the noonday.

7. Rest in the LORD. The verb is that from which our word dumb is probably derived. Many read, Be silent, be still, hold still, acquiesce. It is in various forms rendered rest, cease, stand still, tarry, wait, be still, forbear, hold one's peace, keep silence, be silent, quiet one's self, Josh. x. 12, 13. We have a good illustration in Lev. x. 3. Two of Aaron's sons, being ministers of the sanctuary, were for their sins by God's judgment terribly destroyed, And Aaron held his peace. The sins forbidden in this clause are murmuring, complaining, and charging God foolishly. Men may be silent through sulkiness and stubbornness. But what is here required is in the LORD, in Jehovah, by reason of faith and trust in him and from love to him. And wait patiently for him. No better rendering has been proposed. We are warned against hastiness of spirit, and exhorted to cheerful standing in our lot, calmly expecting deliverance at the right time, God's time. Fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass. Fret, see on v. 1. Wicked devices; in Ps. x. 2, 4, devices, thoughts; in Ps. xxi. 11, mischievous device. Calvin has Wickedness; church of England, Evil counsels; Alexander, Plots. Well did David heed this rule. Often was Saul in his power, yet he would not hurt him, but left his whole cause with God, expecting him to send deliverance.

8. Cease from anger. Other renderings substantially coincide; only some for anger have wrath. The common version sometimes elsewhere has wrath, Ps. ii. 5. See also Ps. vi. 1; xxx. 5. And forsake wrath. Wrath, also rendered rage, fury, hot displeasure; applied to the venom of serpents, it is rendered poison. Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil. Fret, as in vv. 1, 7. We cannot indulge any kind or degree of fretful, angry or wrathful feeling at the prosperity of the wicked without doing evil.

Such indulgence, just so far as it goes, makes us like them, and of them. Luther: "And what avails such rage. It makes the matter no better, nay, only sinks you deeper in the ditch. Thou hast prevented God, so that thou hast lost his grace and favor, and art become like evildoers, and wilt perish with them."

9. For evildoers shall be cut off. Evildoers, as in v. 1. Cut off, in another form so rendered in vv. 28, 38. See also Ps. xii. 3; xxxiv. 16. There is no better rendering. It is a terrible form of describing the ruin of the enemies of God. Calvin: "He intimates that they shall flourish fresh and green till the time of their destruction shall arrive." But those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth. Wait, from the same verb as in Ps. xxv. 3, 5. It signifies waiting for God, tarrying at our post till he appears. The earth in vv. 3, 29, 34, land; in vv. 11, 22, earth. Those who here render it land, refer it to the land of Canaan, which was regarded as the best of all lands, and a type and pledge of better things in the world to come. We need not limit the sense. Calvin: "He means that they shall live in such a manner as that the blessing of God shall follow them, even to the grave." The same blessing was pledged anew by Christ, Matt. v. 5.

10. For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be. The verb is properly supplied. For shall not be, the church of England reads shall be clean gone. Now for a time things look dark, and providences are mysterious. But let the saints wait even a little while, and God will show that he is righteous by bringing to an end the prosperity of the wicked. Yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be. Possibly it should read, and he shall not be. But the common version gives a very good sense. The very land he occupied as a home, and the title to which was unimpeachable, is no longer his place. It has passed into other hands. Nothing of all he had on earth is his. He is as poor as the most miserable abject that subsisted on alms. The rich and the poor lie down together.

11. But the meek shall inherit the earth. Meek, poor, humble, lowly, as in Ps. ix. 12, 18. Inherit the earth; see on vv. 3, 8. The humble all live as long as is most for their good. As a class they vastly outlive the wicked. Then too they have God's blessing always abiding upon them: And [they] shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace. While the world is in an uproar concerning things that are vain and fleeting, the meek are quietly passing through earth to heaven. Their bosoms are not rent with angry passions. They have peace of conscience and peace with God. All this is but the prelude to the perfect rest and peace above, where the wicked cease from troubling, where providence will never frown, where ineffable smiles from the Redeemer's face satisfy the longings of every mind; see v. 37. Peace, commonly so rendered, also welfare, health, prosperity, Gen. xliii. 27; 2 Sam. xx. 9; Ps. xxxv. 27; lxxiii. 3.

12. The wicked plotteth against the just. The opposition of the wicked towards the righteous is far too systematic, uniform and cunning to pass for accidental or unpremeditated. It is all plotted, thought out, devised and purposed. Were the conduct of the wicked without plan, it would sometimes happen to be on the side of righteousness. The wicked goes further, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth. Gnasheth, always so rendered, see on Ps. xxxv. 16. But his craft shall be defeated; and his malice shall be in vain.

13. The Lord shall laugh at him. Duly considered, no words of Scripture should make a more awful impression. When men act so vilely that the infinitely loving and merciful God shall have them in derision, can their case be worse? See on Ps. ii. 4. For he seeth that his day is coming; i. e., God sees that the day for punishing the wicked is coming. Ainsworth: "Day is often used for the time of punishment." In proof he cites Job xviii. 20; Ps. cxxxvii. 7; Isa. ix. 4; Jer. xii. 3; Hos. i. 11.

How soon the day of wrath will be here God sees; and by faith God's servants see the same.

14. The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow. That is, they have made every hostile preparation. Drawn out, literally opened, or loosed, i. e., from its scabbard. Bent, for the force of this word see on Ps. vii. 12; xi. 2. The bow was a cross-bow, and it was bent by putting one foot upon the middle and then drawing back the string. All this was done, not for show, or parade; but to cast down the poor and needy. The ruin of the good man is seriously intended. The wickedness of the hostility of the ungodly is greatly heightened by the character of those, against whom they war, viz: the poor, afflicted, lowly, humble, see Ps. ix. 12, 18. His war is also against the needy, also rendered poor, beggar. See Ps. ix. 18; xxxv. 10. The lowliness and afflictions of good men, one would think, might awaken the relents of their enemies. And to slay such as be of upright conversation. Conversation, conduct, behaviour, life. Alexander has way, "a common figure for the course of life." Slay, or kill, applied to the slaughtering of sheep, or oxen, or of any beasts for food, not for sacrifice; or to the destruction of human beings in war and by violence. But divine justice, divine honor and divine faithfulness forbid that such wicked persecutions of innocent men should last long, or pass unpunished.

15. Their sword shall enter into their own heart; and their bows shall be broken. These are the weapons mentioned in v. 14. Now they are rendered powerless by being broken and by destroying those who wielded them. It is a marvel that the wicked continue to indulge the hope of ever having any valuable successes. In due time everything is against them. Especially do their own weapons and devices destroy them. If all this is so, then it is clear that

16. A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked. Church of England: A small thing that the righteous hath is better than great riches of the ungodly. Many, rendered great in Ps. xix. 11, 13; xxxi. 19; xxxvi. 6, and often. Riches, the original is that from which our word mammon is supposed to be derived. Ainsworth has it, "plenteous mammon." This verse some think has its parallel in Pr. xv. 16; and nearly its parallel in Pr. xvi. 8. Riches, sometimes rendered tumult, noise, 1 Sam. iv. 14; xiv. 19; 2 Sam. xviii. 29; Am. v. 23. Hence some think there is reference to the turmoil attending large possessions. In some cases this may be; but the word is used to express a multitude of anything, as of rain, etc. Clarke: "This is a solid maxim. Whatever a good man has, has God's blessing in it; even the blessings of the wicked are cursed."

17. For the arms of the wicked shall be broken. To break the arms is to render helpless and to put into anguish: "I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand. . . He shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man." Ezek. xxx. 22, 24. We had the same form of speech in Ps. x. 15. See also Job xxii. 9; 1 Sam. ii. 31. While the wicked are thus left in a state most grievous to them, it is far different with the people of God: But the LORD upholdeth the righteous. Upholdeth, as in v. 24 and often, elsewhere sustaineth, beareth up; Edwards and Fry, supporteth; but these give the same sense. The righteous are in themselves as weak as water. But the Lord sustains his servants, girding them with omnipotence, so that they wax valiant in fight and never utterly fall, for God holds them up. They are mighty through God.

18. The LORD knoweth the days of the upright. Ainsworth: Jehovah knoweth the days of perfect men; Edwards: Jehovah watches over the days of the upright; Fry: Jehovah ordaineth the days of the upright; Hengstenberg: The Lord knows the days of the pious. Knoweth, see on Ps. i. 6. The good providence of God orders all the affairs of his saints during their whole life. He sees their trials and sorrows. He knows how much aid and grace they need, and has vast storehouses of mercy at his command. It is added: And their inheritance shall be for ever. This clearly points to "an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven." In heaven are no vicissitudes. To those, who believe, all this is sure. Upright, elsewhere undefiled, complete, perfect, without blemish. See on Ps. xv. 2.

19. They shall not be ashamed in the evil time. Ashamed, see Ps. vi. 10; xxxv. 4, 26. The evil time is the time of calamity or adversity, when the wicked are confounded. All along God's people expected their religion to stand them in stead when the day of trial should come, and they were not disappointed. Their afflictions were as great as those of the wicked; often they were greater; but then their supports were transcendent, and that made the difference. And in the days of famine they shall be satisfied. They know that God doeth all things well; that he makes no mistakes; that man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God; that if they have but little, God's blessing is on that; and that they shall have as much food and everything else as infinite wisdom, boundless mercy and everlasting faithfulness shall judge to be on the whole best. So they shall be filled with comfort and peace; see Ps. xvii. 15; Isa. xxxiii. 16. God's goodness to the poor saints has been celebrated in the church in all ages.

20. But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the LORD shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume, into smoke shall they consume away. Although most of this verse is variously rendered, yet every translation points to utter destruction. John Rogers' translation: And when the enemies of the Lorde are in their floures, they shall consume, yee even as the smoke shall they consume away. For fat Calvin has preciousness; Ainsworth, precious fat; Hengstenberg, joy. Tholuck for fat of lambs has "the pride of the pastures." When the fat of the sacrifice was burned, its smoke soon vanished away, and nothing was left. This does not represent a more complete extinction than that described in v. 10. The figure of this clause was very striking to a Jew. The English version gives the sense as well as any other. The fat, because used in burnt offerings, was properly called the preciousness, or best part of the victim.

21. The wicked borroweth, and payeth not again. Borroweth, properly so rendered here, though another form of the same word is lendeth in v. 26. It properly signifies an act of mutual dealing, either borrowing or lending according to its form and connection; see Deut. xxviii. 12, 44; Isa. xxiv. 2; Pr. xix. 17. One of the blessings promised to the obedient Israelites was that they should be able to lend, and should not need to borrow, Deut. xv. 6; xxviii. 12; and one of the curses denounced on them, if they should prove refractory, was that they should be forced to borrow and not be able to lend, Deut. xxviii. 44. The vices of the wicked, his impiety, his extravagance at length bring him to want. Perhaps he turns rogue and does not pay when he can. The humiliation, to which he is subjected, is extreme. At length he falls so low that he is neither able nor willing to meet his engagements. Far different is it with the good man: But the righteous sheweth mercy and giveth. He has a compassionate nature, and God so far gratifies his benevolent heart as to afford him the means of giving. He may have but little to give. But he gives it with a good will. One reason why we should be diligent in an honest calling, and earnestly pray for a divine blessing on our labors, is that we may have something to give to the needy, Eph. iv. 28.

22. For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth, see on vv. 3, 11. And they that be cursed of him shall be cut off, see on v. 9; also vv. 28, 38, where we have the same verb in another form. Blessed and cursed; no words are more opposite.

Ainsworth and some others read his blessed ones, and his cursed ones; but our version is better because it gives in our idiom the true sense of the original.

23. The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way. The word good is supplied because it is supposed to give the true mind of the Spirit. Those, who would reject it both from the text and from the interpretation, maintain that the first clause contains a general proposition, like those in Pr. xvi. 9; xx. 24; Jer. x. 23; Acts xvii. 28. Against this some urge that the word rendered man virtually signifies a good man. It is not Adam, Ish nor Enosh, but another word, which at times is doubtless emphatic, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 1; Job xxxiv. 7; Lam. iii. 1; Zech. xiii. 7. Jebb contends that it "always signifies some excellence of mind or body, among the more ancient Hebrew writers." For "good man" Ainsworth reads "the man;" Edwards, "the upright." Doubtless the word is indeed sometimes but not always emphatic. The last clause of the verse surely describes the same man, whether by it we understand that the man delights in the Lord's way, or, as is preferable, that the Lord delights in the man's way. Green connects the clauses more closely than our version: The steps of a man are firmly fixed by the Lord, when he delighteth in his way. Instead of ordered we have the authority of the common version in other places for reading, if we choose, prepared, fastened, set fast, directed, confirmed, fashioned, fixed, established. In all these respects God's agency in the affairs of the upright can be relied on; because he approves the way, the life, the course of his people and delights in it, Ps. i. 6. Calvin: "As God sees that the faithful act conscientiously, and do not turn aside from the way which he has appointed, he blesses their efforts."

24. Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down. Some versions, varying from this, are striking. Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: When he shall fall, he shall not be dashed in pieces; church of England: Though he fall, he shall not be cast away; Ainsworth: When he shall fall, he shall not be cast off; Edwards: Though he fall, he will not be left on the ground; Hengstenberg: If he falls, he will not be laid prostrate. The last verb is that used by the erring prophet, when he says, Cast me forth into the sea, Jon. i. 12. Alexander: "The contrast of a mere fall and a permanent prostration is intended to express that between occasional misfortune and utter ruin." Clarke: "Neither the Text nor any of the versions intimate that a falling into sin is meant, but a falling into trouble, difficulty," etc. Calvin says nearly the same, and thinks 2 Cor. iv. 9 parallel. The reason why a saint is not utterly prostrated is thus given: For the Lord upholdeth him with his hand. Luther's paraphrase is just: "Let it be so, that the righteous falls; he still cannot remain lying thus and be cast away; he must be up again though all the world doubts of it. For God catches him by the hand, and raises him again."

25. I have been young, and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread. The proposed alterations in the rendering are not good, unless the following, in Morison, be such: I have been young and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken; nor his seed forsaken, though begging bread. Most of the difficulties attending this passage have probably arisen from overlooking the fact that David here asserts no universal proposition, but simply gives the result of his long observation. In his Commentary on the place Clarke gives a like testimony. I have heard the late Dr. Leonard Woods say, that he never saw but one exception. This shows that such cases are rare, and that the general plan of God is to preserve his people and their virtuous posterity from abject want. Yet Lazarus was a beggar, and may have been the child of pious parents. But at last he went from famishing want to Abraham's bosom. There are in Scripture many general principles stated, which are not universally true, though they are commonly so, and the exceptions to them are rare. The rendering quoted from Morison is very natural and quite relieves the whole passage of serious difficulty, as it admits that cases may arise where poverty and disease will compel some virtuous people to ask for bread, but even then they are not forsaken by God. If anything beyond the prophet's own observation and the implied general principle of God's government be insisted on as here taught, we must supply before the word forsaken some such word as wholly, finally, or utterly. Words are to be known by their connections, and this word forsaken is near the word cast down which our translators thought had the force of utterly cast down.

26. He is ever merciful and lendeth. Merciful, in v. 21, the same participle is rendered sheweth mercy; elsewhere hath pity, or hath mercy. Lendeth, see above, on v. 21. He is of a kindly disposition, and God gives him the ability to oblige others, and he does it. Nor is he any loser thereby, Ps. xli. 2, 3; Pr. xi. 25. Nor are his children the poorer for all this pious alms-giving: And his seed is blessed. It is a great mercy to be descended from such a man. His good name is to his posterity a better inheritance than great riches. Many wish them well for their father's sake. His example was of great service in forming their principles and habits. Moreover, God's blessing rests on the worldly estate left by such a man, and nothing but a wicked rejection of their father's God will deprive offspring of great mercies. Ainsworth: And his seed are in the blessing; Edwards: And his seed is a blessing; Calvin: And his seed is for blessing; Alexander: And his seed (is) for a blessing. The last author thinks the form of expression is borrowed from Gen. xii. 2. Ever is a better translation than all the day. The latter is literal, the former gives the sense.

27. Depart from evil and do good. See Ps. xxxiv. 14, where precisely the same words are found. Do good, see on v. 3. And dwell for evermore, i. e., Thou shalt to eternity have the blessings typified by a residence in the land of Canaan. See vv. 3, 9, 11, 18, 22. All this is sure and cannot fail, 28. For the LORD loveth judgment, i. e., he loveth justice in exercise. He loves to make and execute righteous decisions; and these are always in the end for the support and salvation of good men. See v. 6. See on the same phrase in Ps. xxxiii. 5. And forsaketh not his saints. Forsaketh, see on v. 25. Saints, frequently so rendered, also holy, godly, good, Ps. iv. 3; lxxxvi. 2; Mic. vii. 2. Here a better rendering perhaps is merciful, 2 Sam. xxii. 26; Jer. iii. 12. See on Ps. xviii. 25. They are preserved for ever. Preserved, kept. See on Ps. xii. 7; xvi. 1. God's people are surrounded by walls of fire, by a heavenly host, by the infinite care of God. They are kept as the apple of God's eye, Ps. xvii. 8. The verb in Hebrew is in the past tense. But the seed of the wicked shall be cut off. Cut off, as in vv. 9, 22, 38. The frequent repetition of this threatening here, in the pentateuch and in the later prophets is impressive. Berleberg Bible: "If such perdition does not always meet the bodily eye or sense, still everything is only contributing to their deeper ruin. For the destruction of their poor souls is certainly much more dreadful before God." There is another alarming thought in this clause, viz., that though God may suspend his punishments for a long time, even so that a guilty man may seem quite to escape them, yet his children after him will feel the curse and plague of his transgressions. This is clearly a doctrine of the Scriptures, Num. xiv. 18; Ex. xx. 5; Deut. v. 9. Achan "perished not alone." Ahab was hardly dead till his offspring were killed by the myrmidons he had trained to cruelty and murder. Belshazzar had hardly passed to his long account, when the cry was heard, "Prepare slaughter for his children." Compare Isa. xiv. 20.

29. The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever. See on vv. 3, 9, 11, 18, 22, 27. They shall ever continue in possession of those good things typified by an inheritance in Canaan; those good things, of which God's temporal blessings are but pledges and earnest. Having described the blessedness of the good man, the prophet next describes his character in three particulars.

30. The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment. Good discourse, including a sacred regard to truth, justice, charity, purity and piety, is an essential characteristic of a righteous man. Wisdom, a word rendered with remarkable uniformity. It is in Scripture used to express the great gift of God to Solomon, 1 Kings ii. iii. iv. v. vii. x. xi. It often occurs in the writings of Solomon. We have not before met it in the Psalms. Its primary meaning seems to have been skill, or cunning, in the sense of that old English word. But it sometimes signifies sound and extensive learning. It often denotes moral excellence, piety. Here it points to that knowledge of sacred things, which is derived from God's word, from the indwelling of his Spirit, and from a blessed religious experience. Cruden's paraphrase is, "When the discourses of other men are either wicked or vain, his are pious and profitable; they flow from, and are so many evidences of WISDOM, and have a tendency to make others spiritually wise." By judgment in this verse we may understand the knowledge and discernment of right and wrong, of good and evil, in morals and religion, including justice and equity to man, and God's kind and holy government of the world.

31. The law of his God is in his heart. Often in Scripture does a like phrase describe unfeigned piety. See on Ps. i. 2. Writing or putting the law in the heart is an Old Testament mode of pointing to regeneration, Jer. xxxi. 33. The language of this clause expresses love to God's law. The affections go out towards it. From this love necessarily flows prompt, cheerful, humble and universal obedience. He who thus loves the law is stable and steadfast. None of his steps shall slide. Other versions for slide have totter, stagger, slip, be moved, be supplanted, falter. Alexander: His steps shall not swerve [or waver] from the straight path. Thus shall the righteous hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands wax stronger and stronger. In these particulars all hypocrites and self-deceivers are deficient; and the outbreaching sinner has no claims whatever to such characteristics. On the contrary, his words are wrong; his heart is wrong; his life is wrong.

32. The wicked watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him. Watcheth, to be taken here in a bad sense, that of spying, watching with jealousy, envy or hatred. Hengstenberg renders it lurks for. The wicked is at heart a murderer. All he wants is a good opportunity, a promise of impunity, and a plausible pretext to kill the righteous; for God, who knows his heart, says he seeketh to slay him. No sinner ever loved a saint. To do that is infallible evidence of conversion, 1 John iii. 14. But, except so far as God permits, the malice of the wicked against the pious is impotent.

33. The LORD will not leave him in his hand. The good man seems often to be in the power of the wicked; but he is not left there. God will deliver him as he did David from Saul, or Peter from Herod; or, if no other way of escape from the malice of enemies shall be provided, God will open the gates of paradise, and take his ransomed home to glory as he did Stephen and all the martyrs. God will not desert a good man to his foes, Nor condemn him when he is judged. Compare Rom. viii. 1, 33, 34. The prophet may here refer to the final judgment. The wicked may grow to such effrontery as in the next world to demand the condemnation of those whom they hated here. It gives an inferior but a good sense to suppose the prophet to be here representing God as the actual though invisible Judge of the earth, listening to the accusations of the wicked, and the complaints and pleas of the righteous, and refusing to condemn the innocent. The idea of God as actual and supreme Judge of the whole earth is very ancient, Gen. xviii. 25. In judging between those women, who were disputing about the child, for a time Solomon seemed to be equally indifferent to both.

But in the end he secured all the rights of the loving mother. So for a season God may keep silence; but in due time his hand will take hold on judgment. See on v. 6.

34. Wait on the LORD. See on v. 9. And keep his way. Keep, in v. 37 mark, elsewhere preserve. See on Ps. xii. 7; xvi. 1. God's way is the path he marks out to us in his word and providence. Tarry for God, expect him, do your duty even in the humblest condition and state, And he shall exalt thee to inherit the land. See on vv. 3, 9, 12, 18, 22, 27, 29. When the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it. Cut off, as in vv. 9, 22, 28, 38. In this life or the next his people shall know that Jehovah is just and righteous altogether.

35. I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.

36. Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found. The word here rendered in great power, is by the Chaldee, Marloratus and Fabritius rendered strong; by the Septuagint and kindred versions, highly exalted; by Musculus, great and terrible; by Ainsworth, daunting terrible; by Green, formidable to all around him; by Bythner, formidable; by Hengstenberg, insolent; by Venema, violent; by Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Alexander, terrible. A wicked man in power is terrible. The bay-tree is the laurel of the Mediterranean. It is an ever-green. Crowns for victors were made of it. It is celebrated of old. Calvin, church of England, Fry and others read bay-tree. The old Saxon, the French and Ainsworth, green self-growing laurel; Marloratus, green laurel. But Bythner says he knows no reason for rendering it laurel. And Anderson quotes the illustrated commentary: "For the reading of bay-tree, we are not aware of any authority, except the very feeble one which is offered by some of the older of the more modern versions in Great Britain and on the Continent." The Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Houbigant, Boothroyd and Geddes read, As the cedars of Lebanon; Hengstenberg, Like a tree green and deep rooted; Chaldee, Jerome, Bucer, Piscator, Fabritius, Diodati, Bythner, Venema, Amesius, Mudge, Gesenius, Waterland and Alexander give indigenous or native, meaning perhaps, as Green expresses it, a flourishing tree in its native soil. He passed away, in v. 36. With our version agree Calvin, Fabritius, Piscator, Marloratus, Edwards, Hengstenberg and Alexander. But the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Syriac, Vulgate, church of England, Houbigant, Green, Jebb and Fry all read, I passed by. The common version is best sustained by the text. Hengstenberg: "Undoubtedly in this verse David had the image of Saul swimming before his eyes." Clarke: "Does not this refer to Nebuchadnezzar and to the vision he had of the great tree, which was in the midst of the earth, the head of which reached up to heaven? Dan. iv. 10." But 1. David never prophesied of that Babylonish monarch, though he certainly wrote this Psalm; 2. The stump of that tree was left, and it rose again, but this tree was never found again. Scott speaks more safely: "Thus Saul, Doeg and Ahithophel, in David's time had flourished, and thus they had vanished."

37. Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright. Mark, observe, take heed. See on v. 34; Ps. xvi. 1; xvii. 8. Perfect and upright explain each other. They are synonymous. Perfect, in Gen. xxv. 27, plain; in Prov. xxix. 10, upright; in Cant. v. 2; vi. 9, undefiled. Upright also righteous; see on Ps. vii. 10. For the end of that man is peace. A saint has God's blessing on him in life and in death, and you may see it, if you will. The obvious sense is the best. Saints and sinners at the last fare very differently. The righteous has peace;

38. But the transgressors shall be destroyed together. Transgressors and destroyed, well rendered. Together, as in Ps. ii. 2; xiv. 3. See on Ps. xxxiii. 15. Those who have sinned in common shall perish in common. Korah and his company fared alike. The end of the wicked shall be cut off. Jebb: The end of the wicked is that they are cut off. This gives a good sense. But the common version is as good. The wicked are driven away, their end is cut off. They are never prepared for their last, great, solemn change. Their end is not peaceful, nor desirable.

39. But the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD. Their safety and deliverance are from the Lord, and so are marked, decisive, complete; not partial, nor doubtful. Calvin: "The sum of the whole is, that whatever may happen, the righteous shall be saved, because they are in the hand of God, and can never be forgotten by him." He is their strength in the time of trouble. Strength, rock, strong rock, fortress, strong-hold. See on Ps. xxvii. 1; xxviii. 8; xxxi. 3. Trouble, rendered distress, anguish, adversity, tribulation, affliction. See on Ps. ix. 9. Well does the prophet add:

40. And the Lord shall help them, and deliver them. He shall help them as much as they need. He shall so help them as finally to deliver them from all evils and from all enemies. He shall deliver them from the wicked, and save them. He shall save them completely and finally. He shall do this, for by his nature and by his word he is bound to do it; Because they trust in him. God cannot deny himself, and so he cannot but save all who have at his bidding confided in him.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We should never deny that God's providence is mysterious. Not only do mercies and judgments often seem to fall without discrimination on saints and sinners; but many a time the wicked seem to have much prosperity, while the righteous are greatly afflicted. Let us not deny the facts; but let us not be perplexed by them. All will be clear in due time.

2. We cannot too carefully watch against the insidious attacks of evil tempers. Even a little indulgence in irritability will torment us and displease God. We may not even fret. So earnest is the prophet on this point that he thrice warns us, vv. 1, 7, 8. Bouchier: "We do not perhaps lay much stress on fretfulness as evil: we look upon it more as an unhappy temper of mind, bringing indeed its own punishment with it, but involving no vast amount of evil. . . Yet fretfulness, unchecked and allowed to have its way undisturbed, will eventually undermine and corrode all that is valuable and estimable and lovely in the character." Fretting leads to

3. Envy, v. 1. When one becomes emulous of the prosperity of others, and sickens at their success, then he is nigh unto ruin. There is no worse passion than envy. It is foolish and cruel. All prosperous sinners are like oxen fattening for the slaughter.

4. The prosperity of the wicked affords no just cause for the least disquiet. However great, it is short-lived and is just cause of pity, not of alarm or ill-will, vv. 2, 9, 10, 13, 20, 34, 35, 36, 38. We brought nothing into this world and it is certain we can carry nothing out. Morison: "Both the name and the place of the wicked shall be blotted out and forgotten. Yet a little while and he is gone; his vain pomp and glory are levelled in the dust; and a future generation shall search in vain for the place of his abode: he shall have no memorial but such as his crime and infamy have procured for him."

5. It is impossible to live well or die well, to profit by God's word or providences, unless we trust in the Lord, vv. 3, 5.

6. Negative virtue is not enough; we must do good, vv. 3, 27. He who regards his condition safe, because he does not lie, or steal, or murder, or practise any of the vices, and yet has not grace to perfect holiness and work out his salvation with fear and trembling, is deceived.

7. Great as are the trials of God's people, their temporal wants are supplied, and oftentimes in a marvellous manner, v. 3. After all his afflictions, who in the main passes through this world in a more quiet and desirable way than the child of God?

8. True religion calls into lively exercise the highest and most refined affections of our nature, and presents suitable objects for them to settle upon. We may well and wholly delight ourselves in the Lord and in the fulness of his blessings, vv. 4, 8. Nor is such piety unrequited. Morison: "When we learn greatly to delight in the Lord, he will grant unto us the desire of our souls. The heart that delights in God will learn to relish and approve all his appointments; for he that prays from the heart, 'Thy will be done,' can never fail to realize the blessing he implores." God gratifies the desires of the saints, for he has awakened them, and he approves them.

9. True piety relies on God, and rolls its burden on the Lord, v. 5. What could we do without such a resource? They who rely most are the best and the happiest Christians.

10. He who makes God his refuge, has a right to expect that his lawful undertakings will be finally crowned with more than ordinary success, although for a time things may look dark, v. 5.

11. It is always safe to leave a good cause and our good name in the hands of God, v. 6. Henry: "If we take care to keep a good conscience, we may leave it to God to take care of our good name." Reproach is terrible. It broke the heart of the Son of man. But the just shall at last be delivered from it. Morison: "By ten thousand agencies God can extricate his servants from unmerited contempt and can bring forth their integrity as the morning light."

12. True repose is had only when our hearts are hushed on the bosom of Jehovah and rest in him, v. 7. The right place for the brood in time of cold or storm is under the wings of the hen. The right place for the lambs in chilly weather is the shepherd's bosom.

13. Nicolson thus sums up the duties taught in vv. 3-8. "Desert not thy station. Enjoy quietly what thou hast at present. Be pleased with God's way. Labor in an honest vocation, and leave the rest to him. Acquiesce in his will and in the dispensations of his providence; wait patiently for him. His time is best."

14. Patient waiting on God must be a very important duty, and one to which we are but little inclined; it is so often enjoined in Scripture, vv. 7, 9, 34.

15. Fretting and envy naturally lead to the display of the worst passions, even outrageous anger, and terrible wrath, against which we cannot be too guarded, v. 8.

16. The portion of God's people is an inheritance, vv. 9, 11, 22, 27, 29, 34. Their great interests shall never be disturbed, v. 18. Because they are sons, they are heirs. Because they are heirs of God, their inheritance shall be everlasting.

17. The plots and rage of the wicked are sure signs that their cause is bad, and must come to nought under the government of a just God, vv. 12, 14, 32. God has set his face against all wicked devices.

18. Consequently every thing, which the wicked do, does and must turn against them, v. 15. The nature of all sin is to recoil on its author.

19. The overthrow of the wicked must be inconceivably dreadful, else inspiration would not use so alarming language respecting it, v. 13. Can a more fearful representation be made than that the infinitely loving Jehovah shall laugh at the miseries of his guilty foes? O sinner! Stop and think! Stop and think!

20. That, which conclusively determines the character and destiny of the righteous is their pious walk, their holy living, their upright conversation, v. 14. Nothing can set aside the evidence of a holy life. It is better than a revelation from heaven.

21. Dickson: "When the wicked are most near to do a mischief, then is a mischief most near unto them; their sword shall enter into their own heart," v. 15.

22. Let the humble pious be content, v. 16. If they have not much, they have more than they deserve; they have as much as infinite love sees best for them; they have no account to give of what never was under their control; and they have God's blessing on what is theirs.

23. However for a time the wicked may seem to wax strong, yet their helplessness, when God forsakes them or fights against them, is utter. More pitiable objects have never been. Their arms are broken, v. 17.

24. The successes and conquests of God's people depend upon the nature and will of God; and so they cannot fail, vv. 17, 24. There is an adequate cause for all the good that happens to the righteous.

25. God's approval and blessing will make any life happy and any course desirable, v. 18. Wonderfully does he order, choose, arrange and moderate our trials; and deliver us from them. Most seasonably and tenderly does he reveal our mercies to us.

26. Rightly considered the peace and happiness of God's people in times of trial, when all others are overpowered, show the unspeakable excellence of their principles, and give us good ground of confidence in their final and eternal triumph, v. 19.

27. It is as certain as God's word can make it that, sore as are the afflictions of the saints, yet the great harvest of misery is among sinners, v. 20.

28. The pious and benevolent affections of the righteous have room for exercise even here, v. 21. Hereafter they shall have enlargement: for all that is truly good in man's estate will grow better.

29. Dickson: "The blessing of God on the godly maketh the odds betwixt them and the wicked, for it is to them as good as the inheritance of the whole earth; but God's curse rooteth the wicked man out of the earth," v. 22.

30. The kind providence of God over the righteous is to them ample protection against all that could do them real harm, v. 23. The arrangements, which God makes, will all come out right in the end.

31. The reverses of the saints are temporary, v. 24.

32. Let old people make it their business to tell what they have seen of God's wonders in providence and in grace, v. 25. They cannot be better employed than in thus commending the loving-kindness of the Lord to the rising generation.

33. Good men are never hard-hearted and cruel, v. 26. Whatever they may have been before conversion, the grace of God makes the lion the fit companion of the lamb, and the bear, of the calf. Saul of Tarsus, renewed, was as tender as a nurse.

34. One of the best inheritances parents can lay up for their children is in deeds of alms and of liberality, v. 26. Horne: "So far is charity from impoverishing, that what is given away, like vapors emitted by the earth, returns in showers of blessings into the bosom of the person who gave it; and his offspring is not the worse, but infinitely the better for it."

35. A broad and enduring foundation of quietness and assurance is laid, for all right-minded persons, in the spotless and infinitely excellent character of God, v. 28. All hopes based on anything contrary to this must fail us at last.

36. Dickson: "The Lord may well exercise his children with trouble, yet he will not withdraw himself from them in trouble, but will stay with them and bear them company, and save them to the uttermost," v. 28.

37. If men have not the due fear of God, yet they might reasonably be restrained from many courses of wickedness by remembering the sad effects of transgression upon their posterity, v. 28.

38. No staid behaviour, no secret emotions, no sanctimoniousness of character can prove any man to be a child of God, if his speech is loose, foolish, vain, slanderous or wicked, v. 30. See Matt. xii. 37.

39. True religion has its seat in the heart. Genuine purity is internal, v. 31.

40. True religion is steadfast, v. 31. The fickle and unstable have no part in the inheritance of the saints.

41. Whenever men find themselves resorting to sly and cunning behaviour, they may rest assured that they are already in the territory of the wicked one, v. 32.

42. It is certain that the final judgment is approaching, v. 33. It is as certain that all the redeemed will be well pleased with the awards of the last day.

43. The path of duty, however steep and thorny, always terminates in the land of peace and blessedness, v. 34.

44. Death and what is beyond it will show who is wise and who is a fool, vv. 37, 38.

45. It is for a rejoicing to the righteous that their salvation and all that leads to it, and all the steps and parts of it are of the Lord, v. 39. The debt, the infinite debt of love they owe is to him, whom they shall ever love to adore.

46. Dickson: "So long as God is pleased to let righteous men's trouble continue, he will now and then comfort them, and enable them to bear their trouble when comfort is suspended."

47. Scott: "It is of vast importance to understand the present and future condition of the righteous and the wicked, that we may know what to choose and to expect."

48. Luther: "O shame on our faithlessness, mistrust, and vile unbelief, that we do not believe such rich, powerful, consolatory declarations of God, and take up so readily with little grounds of offence, whenever we but hear the wicked speeches of the ungodly. Help, O God, that we may once attain to the right faith. Amen."

PSALM XXXVIII.

A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

- 1 O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath: neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.
- 2 For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore.
- 3 There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin.
- 4 For mine iniquities are gone over mine head: as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.
- 5 My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness.
- 6 I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long.
- 7 For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh.
- 8 I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.
- 9 Lord, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee.
- 10 My heart panteth, my strength faileth me: as for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me.
- 11 My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore; and my kinsmen stand afar off.
- 12 They also that seek after my life lay snares for me; and they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things, and imagine deceits all the day long.
- 13 But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth.
- 14 Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs.
- 15 For in thee, O LORD, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O Lord my God.
- 16 For I said, Hear me, lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: when my foot slippeth, they magnify themselves against me.
- 17 For I am ready to halt, and my sorrow is continually before me.
- 18 For I will declare mine iniquity; I will be sorry for my sin.
- 19 But mine enemies are lively, and they are strong: and they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied.
- 20 They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries; because I follow the thing that good is.
- 21 Forsake me not, O LORD: O my God, be not far from me.
- 22 Make haste to help me, O Lord my salvation.

THE title correctly ascribes this Psalm to David. The contents well agree with this. We know nothing of the particular circumstances under which it was written, except that its author was in deep distress. Hengstenberg: "Of any particular occasion there is found no trace in the Psalm." Some have thought otherwise; but they have not well sustained their opinions. The title has claimed considerable attention. On the first part see on title of Ps. iii. The latter part occurs nowhere but here and in Psalm lxx. The Hebrew is well rendered in our version, though there is no objection to the renderings of others: For remembrance; To commemorate; To call to mind; To remind. But who is to be reminded? Hengstenberg: "The person who is to be put in remembrance, by the Psalm, is not, as is generally supposed, the Psalmist himself, or the whole church, but God, who seemed to have forgotten the Psalmist." With him agrees Alexander. Calvin: "The title indicates that David composed this Psalm as a memorial for himself, as well as others, lest he should too soon forget the chastisement by which God had afflicted him." Morison is of the opinion that "this Psalm was composed by David as a memorial of the deep sorrow of mind, when his spirit was burdened with the remembrance of some grievous offence against God." May it not have been as a remembrancer to God, and also a memorial to himself? It is not likely that any part of the title has reference to the music with which the Psalm was to be sung. The ancient versions, without authority, add much to the title. There is nothing in the Psalm respecting the Sabbath. Nor is there apparently either thanksgiving or prophecy. Nor has the Psalm any peculiar adaptedness to David's circumstances before Achish. Yet it may be "for a good memorial to Israel." It also contains a good "form of confession for us."

This is commonly counted as the third of the seven Psalms called penitential, see observations on Psalm vi. Anderson notes the "curious fact, that when Galileo was sentenced to be confined in the dungeons of the Inquisition for an indefinite period, for having maintained the Copernican system, he was enjoined to repeat as a penance these seven penitential Psalms every week for three years; by which it was doubtless intended to extort some sort of confession from him of his guilt, and an acknowledgment of the justice of his sentence."

A question, affecting the interpretation of several verses of this Psalm, is, Whether any part of David's affliction here mentioned was bodily disease? Some are confident that he several times speaks of such affliction, particularly in vv. 3, 5, 7. While we have no historical account of David's suffering from disease, yet we have no right to suppose that he was always exempt from it. But we have no reason for supposing as some that David ever had leprosy. It is also true that some of the language used would fitly describe bodily disease; but, figuratively used, it as fitly describes mental distresses. It is probably to be so taken. Tholuck: "It appears from Genesis iv. 23; Isa. i. 5, 6; liii. 5, that disease, wounds, and sores were used to denote every kind of suffering and pain." In this Psalm we have three names of the Almighty: Jehovah LORD, Adonai Lord and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4; iii. 2.

1. O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath: neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. In our version we have these very words in Ps. vi. 1. In the Hebrew, though the resemblance between the two verses is close, the words are not wholly identical. Yet this bears the same interpretation as that. For his urgent prayer he assigns his reason in verse

2. For thine arrows stick fast in me. For stick fast in me some read fall furiously on me; are fastened in me; go down in me; are entered deep into me; press sore on me; are sunk into me. None of these better gives the sense than our version; although it might be more literal to read have entered deep into me. As arrows were used in war, and, when shot from powerful bows, were very tormenting and destructive, so they were fit emblems of God's chastisements. The figure is ancient, Job vi. 4; Deut. xxxii. 23. It is applicable to any sharp distress inflicted by God. Scott: "Acute pains, anguish of spirit, and sharp sufferings of any kind are spoken of under the figure of barbed arrows, which fasten and rankle in the flesh, and cannot be extracted without the most exquisite torture." And thy hand presseth me sore. Chaldee: And the wound of thy hand remains upon me; Arabic: And the deeds of thy hand have been hard upon me; Calvin and Venema: And thy hand has come down upon me. This clause is parallel to the first. Alexander: "The verbs of the two clauses are active and passive forms from the same root." It is both an affliction and a comfort to a good man to see the hand of God in all his troubles—an affliction, inasmuch as it shows us how vile we must be to need such sore corrections from the loving One:—a comfort, because we may be assured that mercy shall order everything. Blessed are they who "turn unto him that smiteth them, and seek the LORD of hosts," Isa. ix. 13.

3. There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger. For soundness in other versions we find health, rest, wholeness, sound place, salvation. His afflictions had reached a measure beyond his strength. He was perfectly miserable. God's anger was crushing him. Neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin, q. d., I feel in my entire nature the terrible effects of thy displeasure against my sins.

4. For mine iniquities are gone over mine head. Are gone over, the same verb in the same form as in Ps. xlii. 7. It expresses the multitude and greatness of his sins in his present apprehension of them, and in the evils he was suffering for them. On him billows were rolling and torrents were pouring. As an heavy burden they are too heavy for me. His sense of his sins was sinking him down. His sufferings for his sins were crushing him like a heavy load beyond his strength.

5. My wounds stink, and are corrupt because of my foolishness. All sin is foolishness; the greater the sin, the greater the madness; and sooner or later the boldest shall confess their want of wisdom in transgressing. This folly however is such that it in no wise abates aught of their guilt. Sin and folly are in the Bible convertible terms. He, that sows to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption. If the thousandth part of the natural fruit of wickedness should appear, there is not a sinner in the world, who would not cry for deliverance.

6. I am troubled. The Chaldee, Calvin and Fry: I am bent; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: I am become miserable; Arabic: I am afflicted; Syriac: I feared greatly; Ainsworth: I am crooked; Edwards: I am greatly distorted and hurt; Venema, Amesius and Jebb: I am distorted; Morison: I am withered; Hammond: I was bowed down; Hengstenberg: I am beside myself; Alexander: I have writhed. The margin has wearied. Hengstenberg thinks the phrase equivalent to: 'I am crazy;' but 'I writhed in agony,' better expresses the sense. I am bowed down greatly. Pain of body tends to draw the extremities together. This may be the basis of the figure. In times of great distress the ancient Hebrews often sat down on the ground with their heads covered and bowed between their knees. The allusion may be to this. The sense is, I am greatly distressed and abased. I go mourning all the day long. The literal for mourning would be black; but our version properly gives the sense, not only here, but in Job xxx. 28; Ps. xlii. 9; xliii. 2. The black, however, in ancient mourning was not in the color of the apparel, but in dust and ashes, the unwashed state of the sad one. All the day long, equivalent to continually.

7. For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease. The variations in the rendering are putting for loins, heels, reins, flanks, mind. Loins is best; also for loathsome disease, tremor, burning, vileness, parching, inflammations. The Chaldee has illusions. Some think this clause determines that bodily disease had certainly seized on David. Yet even they do or might admit that the chief reference is to the soul, defiled by sin, which is an old, hereditary, perpetual, universal, complicated, loathsome, mortal, and, so far as all human means are concerned, an incurable disease. He adds: And there is no soundness in my flesh. On same words see on v. 3. His case was most pitiable and deplorable, calling for divine interposition. He had become vile in his own esteem, and all for his sin.

8. I am feeble and sore broken. Feeble, faint, weakened, afflicted, disquieted, humbled. So some. Sore broken, exceedingly humbled, exceedingly out of heart, sore smitten, sunk to the last degree, exceedingly bruised. So some. In Ps. li. 17, contrite; several times, broken. David was like a man full of bruises. He was exceedingly out of heart. I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart. The verb here used occurs more than twenty times in the Hebrew Bible, and in the common version is always rendered roar. See on Ps. xxii. 1, 13. It expresses the loudest and strongest cry of distress, coming from the disquietness, tumult, murmur, groaning, roaring of his heart. His anguish was not of his bodily frame, but of his heart. Calvin: "The uncontrollable emotions of his heart forced him to cry out."

9. Lord, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee. The appeal is to God's omniscience. This cuts off the necessity of multiplying words; it gives relief to a pious mind to rest in the assurance of divine notice; and it implies a confidence that God will hear the groaning, and grant the desire of his servant. Alexander paraphrases the verse thus: "Thou knowest, O Lord, what I ask and what I need, the depth of my necessities and the intensity of my desires." The Psalmist does not as yet see any answer to his prayer, or any sign of coming relief, yet he leaves all with God.

10. My heart panteth. Ainsworth, Jebb and Alexander also have panteth. Others use such words as throbs, is troubled, flutters, is in a violent agitation. The verb describes a depressed state of mind, full of anxiety. Distress affected both body and mind: My strength faileth me. Several ancient and many modern versions follow the Hebrew, and give the verb in the past tense, my strength has left me, or has failed me. Perhaps this is best, signifying that his ability to do anything was quite gone. As for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me. The Chaldee reads and punctuates the verse thus: My strength has failed me, and the light of my eyes: And even they themselves [my eyes] are not with me. This follows the Hebrew literally, and is probably the best mode of dividing and rendering the clauses. Many in the main agree with the Chaldee; others with the English. We have seen in Ps. vi. 8, how sorrow sinks the eyes. But the loss of the light complained of, doubtless meant more than a partial or threatened loss of vision. It was a general failure of comfort.

11. My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore; and my kinsmen stand afar off. The Chaldee: My friends and my neighbors stood opposite to my wound; and my near relatives stood far away; Calvin: My friends and my companions stand away from my sore; and my kinsfolk stand afar off; Ainsworth: My lovers and my nearest friends stand from before my stroke, and my neighbors stand afar off; Horsley: My friends and my companions come into my presence, and stop short, and the nearest of my kindred stand aloof; Hengstenberg: My lovers and my friends stand over against my stroke, and my neighbors stand afar off. Hammond thinks the behaviour of David's friends is like that described in Luke x. 31, 32. By sore, stroke, wound, grief, trouble, or plague, is doubtless to be understood David's present affliction, whatever it may have been. Standing aloof implies a knowledge of his distress with a lack of proper affection for him, or of tender sympathy with him under the belief that God was against him.

12. They also that seek after my life lay snares for me. The enemies of truth and righteousness have never been fair and candid. The hatred, which the wicked bear to the righteous is deadly. They seek after his life. They lay snares. The Chaldee, church of England, Calvin, Ainsworth, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander agree with the English version. And they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things. Instead of mischievous things, the Chaldee has a lie; Syriac, falsehood; Calvin, treachery; Ainsworth, woful evils; Venema, enormous things; Amesius, grievous things; Edwards, nothing but what is corrupt; Hengstenberg, mischief; Alexander, mischiefs. Lying, slandering and misrepresentation constitute a part of warfare carried on by the wicked in all ages. And [they] imagine deceits all the day long. The imagination of the wicked is racked to find out some new method of opposing righteousness. This is done, not once in a long time, not occasionally, but incessantly — all the day long. The human mind has never been under so high excitement as in opposing God's plans and people and Son. On this and the preceding verse Calvin says: "The purport of what is stated is, that while his friends cowardly sit still and will do nothing to aid him, his enemies vigorously bestir themselves, and seek by every means to destroy him." Surely if God shall ever give help, here is a fit occasion for so doing.

13. But I, as a deaf man, heard not; I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth. Two things often unite to make the suffering child of God behave like a deaf mute. One is the unreasonableness and violence of enemies, by which he is overwhelmed, seeing no possible good resulting from an attempt to gain a hearing from them. The other is that God most surely and speedily undertakes the cause of those, who quietly and patiently leave all in his hands. The scope of the verse shows that on the score of urgency and meekness David's case loudly called for divine interposition.

14. Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs. The prominence, given to the duty of pious silence in these two verses, is by no means unsustained in other parts of God's word, Lev. x. 3; Ps. xxxix. 1, 2; Isa. liii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 62, 63; John xix. 9. For reproofs some read answers, or replies, or disproofs, or confutations, or retorts. Either of these words is better than reproofs.

15. For in thee, O LORD, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O LORD, my God. The confidence here expressed was founded in the character of God, and might well induce the Psalmist to be quiet and to leave his cause in hands that could not fail to manage all things well. In the usual Hebrew text of this verse we have the three names of God, Jehovah, Adonai and Elohim. But Clarke and Anderson both say that in one hundred and two of Kennicott's and De Rosse's MSS. the original of the second word rendered Lord is not Adonai but Jehovah. An error in the text is possible, but not probable. No doctrine, or duty, or encouragement is affected by reading it either way.

16. For I said, Hear me, lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: when my foot slippeth, they magnify themselves against me. It is clear that something is to be here supplied. The words thrown in by our translators are natural. Hengstenberg suggests these: It is matter of concern, or, It is to be feared; Ainsworth, It is to be feared. He correctly says the original is an unperfect speech through passion. The language of powerful emotion is apt to be broken and elliptical. The plea is that God would not by forsaking him deliver him to the taunts and insults of his foes. Anticipating a failure they gave a shout, and magnified themselves against him. He further urges his plea by stating that his case was critical, that he could not without some relief hold out much longer.

17. For I am ready to halt. The Chaldee: I am ready to die; Horsley: Truly I am ready to make a false step; Hengstenberg: For I am given over to suffering.

The English version is followed by many, and itself closely follows the Hebrew. There is no better rendering than ready to halt. It gives a poor sense to refer the matter to bodily lameness. We have other places to sustain us in the figurative use of halting. Indeed in Ps. xxxv. 15, the word here rendered halting is rendered adversity. See Jer. xx. 10. The parallel clause quite corresponds to this explanation: And my sorrow is continually before me. The meaning is that his mind constantly dwelt on his affliction.

18. For I will declare mine iniquity, I will be sorry for my sin. That which made David's griefs so great was sin. This is the sting of all afflictions. Confession of sin and sorrow for it are clearly called for in the case of all transgression. Nothing could be more proper. There is often a strange power in affliction to remind us of our ill deserts. While David was thus crushed by sorrow and by a sense of sin, it was far otherwise with his foes.

19. But mine enemies are lively, and they are strong: and they that hate me are multiplied. Many, strong and lively enemies arrayed against one feeble, sorrowing man, forsaken by all, who might be expected to cleave to him! This is the picture of woe.

20. They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries; because I follow the thing that good is. The depravity here described is but a little removed from the very last stages of corruption. If men are quite given over to hating others for their goodness, a few more steps in the downward road will land them in hell. To do good for evil is common among saints. To do good for good is common among publicans. But to do evil for good is the mark of a devil. Calvin: "It must be admitted, that those are froward and wicked in the extreme, nay, even of a devilish disposition, who hold uprightness in such abhorrence that they deliberately make war upon those who follow after it."

21. Forsake me not, O LORD: O my God be not far from me. This is a very appropriate prayer for one in great trouble. It is in substance used several times, and uniformly when some distress was imminent, Ps. x. 1; xxii. 1; xxxv. 22. "A present God is all our strength."

22. Make haste to help me, O Lord my salvation. Pressing dangers demand speedy assistance. It is clear that David was not in despair, or he would not have used the last word in the Psalm. Calvin considers the last two verses together, and says that in them, "David briefly states the chief point which he desired, and the sum of his whole prayer; namely, that whereas he was forsaken of men, and grievously afflicted, God would receive him and raise him up again."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The title, which sets forth the design of this Psalm, points to the propriety of setting up solemn memorials of the trying scenes through which we have passed. Hezekiah did so, Isa. xxxviii. Jeremiah forgot not his affliction and his misery, Lam. iii. 20.

2. Calvin: David "was also mindful of his own high calling; for, as he was appointed master and teacher over the whole church, it was necessary that whatever he had learned in particular by divine teaching should be made known, and appropriated to the use of all, that all might profit thereby."

3. Or if it is God that is to be reminded by the Psalm, then in prayer we are God's remembrancers, and we are continually to bring to his notice our wants, and sorrows, and the help we need.

4. We should not think strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try us. Dickson: "It is consistent with God's fatherly love, and our sonship, to taste of fatherly wrath against our sins," v. 1.

5. Yet any man may well deprecate the divine wrath, v. 1. God's hot displeasure is terrible. Whoever has felt it will wish never to feel it again. One drop of the divine anger falling into the conscience of man makes him turn pale and tremble and die away.

6. If troubles come, we may well plead that they be made as light as possible, and that they be tempered with mercy, and not sent in vengeance, v. 1. We may well ask God to remember that we are dust. Our spirits would soon fail before his fierce anger.

7. If God's chastisements of his people make them cry out as they often do (see vv. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 10;) what must be the doom of sinners when God's hand shall take hold of vengeance? This kind of reasoning is often and properly resorted to by inspired men, Luke xxiii. 31; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.

8. That which chiefly embitters affliction, and gives it its dreadful sting, is sin, v. 3. Yet a just sense of our ill desert is necessary to make us submissive in our trials. Calvin: "If we would render to God the praise which is due to him, let us learn by the example of David to connect our sins with his wrath." This view, by its very justness, would overwhelm us, if we had no hope in a Redeemer, if we could flee to no atoning blood. When suffering is intolerable, a sense of its righteousness but increases our anguish. But in Christ there is hope for the guiltiest.

9. In many things our estimates are extravagant; but we never over-estimate the evil of sin, v. 4. It is as corrupting as it is damning. It covers the soul with plague-spots, with the leprosy, Isa. i. 5, 6.

10. A very little of the natural fruit of our evil doings would show us the folly and madness of transgression, v. 5. Every prison, every gibbet, every pillory, and the varied and multiplied miseries of the vicious are but signs of what is coming. In the next world a villany, which on earth was every way successful, will appear to be as foolish as the crime that was promptly detected and condignly punished.

11. When God frowns and lets loose his messengers of wrath, the stoutest heart is full of anguish and terror. Those who make a mock at sin will yet find themselves roaring by reason of the disquietness of their hearts, v. 8. Here the wicked are often able by self-flattery, by the aid of mirthful company, by strong drink and by a wilful blindness, greatly to smother their torments of conscience and quiet their apprehensions. But this cannot last always.

12. To him who is upright with God, it is an unspeakable comfort that the Almighty knows his whole case, understands all his sorrows and desires, and perceives what relief and support are best, v. 9.

13. Hengstenberg: "The ninth verse has for all sufferers the import of an impressive admonition, not to seek help from God for pretended or imaginary sufferings, and in their complaints not to go beyond the measure which the occasion itself warrants. The help of God, the omniscient, directs itself, not according to the greatness of the lamentation, but according to the greatness of the suffering."

14. He who knows not how to seek relief in prayer, is destitute of one of the most important secrets ever made known to man; for "it is not wrestling with trouble within ourselves, nor venting our grief as natural men, which can give us ease, but pouring out our heart before the Lord, which must do it. All my desire is before thee."

15. It is no new thing for good men to see their old friends and near relatives withdrawing their sympathy and support from them, vv. 10, 11. The leaves cling close enough while they can draw sap and nourishment from the tree and its branches; but when the frosts of adversity come, they soon fall off.

16. If we find men deceitful, we may know that, however righteous our cause may be, they will upon any strong temptation turn against us; and we may be as sure that when men are without cause our enemies, we may never expect fair dealing at their hands. No hatred is harder to overcome than that which is based in a wrong done to another, v. 12.

17. Good men should not be in the slightest degree moved by finding false charges brought against them, v. 12. Tholuck: "We are entitled to hope for the aid of the Lord, according as the accusations of our adversaries are unfounded, and every attempt of remonstrating against their obduracy and cunning is useless, and according as the sufferer (as does David) absolutely commits the justice of his cause to God as his best Advocate."

18. We may carry the worst possible case of distress to God, and confidently tell it all to him, v. 12. Calvin: "If we are altogether destitute of human aid and assistance, if our friends fail us in the time of need, and if others seek our ruin, and breathe out nothing but destruction against us, let us remember that it is not in vain for us to lay these things in prayer before God, whose province it is to succor those who are in misery, to take under his protection those who are perfidiously forsaken and betrayed, to restrain the wicked, and not only to withstand their violence, but also to anticipate their deceitful counsels and to frustrate their designs."

19. Silence is sometimes right, vv. 13, 14. He that reproves a scorner gets to himself a blot. He that gives that which is holy unto the dogs, may expect them to turn again and rend him. The more his victims answered him, the more Jeffreys raved. It is no small part of wisdom to know when to speak and when to be silent. Tholuck: "Experience confirms it, that if we have to deal with any crafty and embittered foes, resigned suffering is more likely to benefit than a zealous apprehension of our good cause."

20. In this dark world where sorrow so abounds, there is no substitute for trust and hope in God, v. 15. Sometimes providences are adverse, friends become cold and even unkind, enemies plot our ruin, then our feet well nigh slip. In a thousand cases what can we do but look to God?

21. It is not wrong for us to wish to do right and to be sustained in our course that we may avoid the insults and reproaches of wicked men, v. 16. Calvin: "It is indeed true, that there is nothing which wounds those of an ingenuous disposition of mind more than when wicked and ungodly men recompense them in a manner so dishonorable and unjust; but when they reflect upon this consolatory consideration, that God is no less offended with such ingratitude than those to whom the injury is done, they have no reason to be troubled beyond measure."

22. One of our best protections against any sin or failure is the candid confession of our own weakness and liability to err, v. 17.

23. We may boldly come and tell God all our sorrows, v. 17. This is true not only of all our great afflictions, but of our minor grievances. When John the Baptist was beheaded, his disciples came and "told Jesus."

24. Good resolutions are good things, v. 18. When kept, they lead to the highest attainments men ever make.

25. We cannot too often or too humbly confess to God and bewail our sins, v. 18. On this subject the error lies in reluctance, not in freedom; in restraint, not in excess.

26. It is a marvel that any man escapes ruin, the dangers which beset even the best being many and terrible, v. 19. None but God could have brought David, through all his troubles, to the throne of Israel. None but God could take a poor tempted soul, through all its trials, to the kingdom of heaven.

27. The necessity for punishing sin and dealing with the wicked in the way of eternal damnation will at last be as clear as their doom will be righteous, v. 20. They could not be saved, because they perverted everything. They even rendered evil for good both to God and man.

28. Let us cry to God, come what will, vv. 21, 22. Appearances may be all against us, but God can change appearances. Dickson: "We must not limit the Lord to give us comfort and deliverance when we think we have greatest need of it, but must leave our prayer at his feet."

29. At last all Israel shall be saved, for Jehovah is salvation to every soul that trusts in him, v. 22. "The bond of the covenant is able to bear the weight of the believer's heaviest burden."

PSALM XXXIX.

To the chief Musician, even to Jeduthun, A Psalm of David.

1 I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue: I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me.

2 I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.

3 My heart was hot within me; while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue,

4 LORD, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am.

5 Behold, thou hast made my days as a handbreadth; and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Selah.

6 Surely every man walketh in a vain shew: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.

7 And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee.

8 Deliver me from all my transgressions: make me not the reproach of the foolish.

9 I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it.

10 Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thine hand.

11 When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah.

12 Hear my prayer, O LORD, and give ear unto my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.

13 Oh spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

TO the chief Musician, and A Psalm of David are phrases explained on titles of Psalms iii. iv. Respecting Jeduthun, or, as the Hebrew has it, Jedithun, we know but little. There is no evidence that he is the same as Ethan. The name occurs several times in the historic books of Scripture, 1 Chron. xvi. 38, 41, 42; xxv. 1, 3, 6; 2 Chron. v. 12; xxix. 14; Neh. xi. 17. It is also in the title of Psalm lxxvii. The name, which signifies one who gives praise, was most appropriate to a leader of a band of trained singers and players on instruments. The descendants of this man are noticed long after the death of David. There is not the slightest evidence that Jeduthun points to the tune or the instrument used in singing this song. David wrote this Psalm. So says the title. There is nothing to set aside this opinion. It is held by the great mass of commentators. Theodoret and some others suppose it was written on occasion of Absalom's rebellion. But it as well suits many another trying time in David's life. Good and sound men are not agreed on the question, Does David in this Psalm express sinful impatience? Calvin, Diodati, Pool, Henry, Gill, Scott, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander think he does. In this opinion they are all decided, but not all equally strong. On the other hand Luther, Patrick, Mudge, Edwards, Clarke, Morison, Slade and others see nothing rash or impatient in any part of this poem. And the church of England has actually adopted vv. 4-13 into her burial service. That the latter is the correct view is nearly certain. 1. Every verse and clause admit of a good sense without any straining of the signification of words. 2. The great mass of pious people almost uniformly regard this Psalm as containing language fit to be used by us in our devotions. Commonly that is the true sense of God's word, which in a fair translation is conveyed to the minds of plain pious persons. Versions of this Psalm are sung throughout the Christian world without a suspicion on the part of the worshippers that they are rehearsing sentiments of impatience and wickedness. 3. An examination of the passages referred to in the margin will show that the clauses deemed objectionable have their parallels in Scriptures not suspected of impiety. 4. It is but sheer justice to any writer to give such a construction to his language as will afford a good sense, if this can be done without violating any of the laws of language. This is very clear in all moral writings, where the whole scope of the author is evidently to promote piety towards God. Morison numbers this among the penitential Psalms; but it is not generally so considered. In it are two names of God, Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4. On Selah, see Introduction, § 15.

1. I said, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue. The first word expresses a settled purpose. Pool: I fully resolved; Venema: I firmly resolved and prescribed to myself this law. Take heed, i. e., guard, watch, keep. Ways, the course of the life. Sin not with my tongue. In no way are men more apt to sin. In nothing is it more difficult to avoid sinning. "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body. . . The tongue can no man tame," Jas. iii. 3, 8. Many so sin with the tongue that in eternity they will wish that they had been born dumb, yea, that they had never been born at all. I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me. Keep, rendered take heed to in the first clause. The bridle was for restraint and guidance. Here the latter is the main idea. Because the bridle of old times was more like a muzzle or halter than the bridle now in use, some would here read muzzle. But the muzzle was also used to restrain animals from feeding; so that the common rendering here is best. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Arabic have it set a watch or set a guard, instead of keep with a bridle. While the wicked is before me. David's silence seems to have been entire at such times. Before the wicked he did not accuse his foes, nor vindicate himself, nor render railing for railing, nor express his perplexities respecting providence, nor even utter his pious sentiments. His practice and instruction may have led Solomon to give the rule which we find in Prov. ix. 7, 8.

2. I was dumb with silence; i. e., he was as silent as if he could not speak at all; or as if he were a dumb man. Ainsworth: I was dumb with stillness; Hengstenberg: I grew dumb; Calvin: I was dumb in silence. I held my peace, even from good. The Chaldee: From the words of the law. Hengstenberg's rendering is not good: I was silent, not for good. He thinks the sense is that keeping silence did him harm. Edwards gives the true sense: I refrained from speaking what was good. Yet consciousness of having not sinned with the mouth nor charged God foolishly does not hinder grief. And my sorrow was stirred. Septuagint: My grief was renewed; Edwards: My pain was irritated. We ought not to speak unless we can say something good. But if our strength is small, our best resolutions will fail under the weight of increasing woes. A deep sense of our weakness, watchfulness over ourselves and reliance on God alone constitute the sum of our wisdom. But though bound to a wise silence before men, we may always pour out our cries to God. Nay, the greater our sorrow the more need of prayer to him, who made the world.

3. My heart was hot within me. David's state of mind was one of deep excitement. Was hot, the same verb is rendered waxed warm in 2 Kings iv. 34, and have heat in Eccle. iv. 11. David here says he had ardent emotions, burning thoughts. The Chaldee: My heart boiled within my body; Septuagint and Edwards: My heart grew hot within me. This phrase is explained by the next: While I was musing the fire burned. There is no more reason for supposing that the words was hot and burned describe a sinful state of mind than that the disciples at Emmaus are confessing their criminality when they say: "Did not our hearts burn within us, while he talked with us by the way?" These words express earnest thought attended with strong emotion. Piety often makes exquisite feeling silent for a season. But at length utterance is gained: Then spake I with my tongue. What he said is found in the following verses.

4. LORD, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am. We have the parallel in Ps. xc. 12. The last clause is variously given. Chaldee: That I may know when I shall fail from the world; Calvin: That I may understand how long I may live; margin: That I may know what time I have here; church of England: That I may be certified how long I have to live. For frail, others read brief, short lived, etc. He prays, not that God would make a revelation to him of the time of his approaching death, but that he would give him such a just estimate of his frailty that he might be a better and wiser man. Poets have long sung of the brevity of life. Euripides speaks of the "little work of life;" Homer, of "men living a little while and then coming to an end;" and Horace, "Be mindful of how short a life thou art." It is mentioned as a proof of wisdom in the father of Alexander the great, that he required himself to be aroused every morning with the cry: "Philip, thou art mortal."

5. Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand breadth. Instead of an hand breadth, the Chaldee has swift; Arabic, short; Vulgate and Doway, measurable. The hand breadth or span of the ancients was the breadth of the four fingers, and not of the extended thumb also. So Hesychius followed by Diodati, Ainsworth and Hammond. And mine age is as nothing before thee. Before thee, in thy sight. See Ps. lxxviii. 12. For age, Ainsworth has worldly time; Jebb, short life; Fry, time. Hengstenberg: My life is as non-existence before thee. By many figures, the Bible teaches the brevity of life. Verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Arabic: Yea, whatever pertains to a living man is vain; Syriac: All men tarry but as a vapor; Horsley: Also everything is vanity;—even every man with all his pride; Chaldee: Moreover all things are counted as nothing, but all the righteous shall live in life eternal. If the whole life and end of man are earthly, then he is nothing but vanity. On vanity, see on Ps. xxxi. 6. Parallel passages are 1 Cor. vii. 31; James iv. 14.

6. Surely every man walketh in a vain shew. For vain shew, the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Montanus, Piscator, Cocceius, Ainsworth, Venema, Amesius, Hengstenberg and Alexander have image; church of England, vain shadow; Jebb, shadow; Edwards, phantom. The interpretations given to the word are such as these: a false resemblance, a wandering shadow, an imaginary life, an ideal scene, a delusion. Dathe renders it, Surely every man pursues a shadow. When in the Bristol election, his competitor died, Burke said, "What shadows we are, and what shadows we pursue." Surely they are disquieted in vain. See men compassing land and sea; toiling and travelling day and night; their hurried gait and anxious look showing that they are ill at ease; but all is in vain. Now and then one rises high, but sits down on some peak to shiver in bleak loneliness. If he gains wealth, his abundance will not suffer him to sleep. All is vanity. He heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them. The thief, the swindler, the extortioner may catch all. His heirs may be fools or spendthrifts. The ocean may engulf, or the fire consume all that he has made. To look to men and to things which perish is folly. In this cheerless state of things, have we no duty to perform? Is there no hope?

7. And now, LORD, what wait I for? Many render the Hebrew literally: What have I been expecting? It is the language of surrender of all hope of real good from sources so delusive. Yet he does not sink into despair, as Ahithophel did; but at once addresses himself to the Lord: My hope is in thee. Hengstenberg errs in making David in this verse complain of God. Now has much force, q. d., "I will no longer take sad views; I will encourage myself in the Lord my God; I will seek for happiness only in his love and service, expecting assistance as my necessities require."

8. Deliver me from all my transgressions. For deliver, other versions have free, set free, rescue; and for transgressions, wickedness, iniquities, failings, offences, trespasses. In sin are both guilt and pollution, liability to punishment and defilement. From both of these, good men seek deliverance, though forgiveness is here the prominent idea. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1; xxii. 20. The word all is not to be overlooked. If one sin remains unpardoned, or in possession of the dominion of the soul, salvation is not possible. Make me not the reproach of the foolish. Chaldee: Put not the reproach of the fool upon me; Syriac: Do not make me a reproach to foolish men; Hengstenberg: Let me not be a mockery to the fool. By fool Calvin understands the idle and debauched, a contemptible man, one who is utterly worthless and base; Diodati, the worldly man; Alexander, the impious unbeliever; Clarke, the godless and profane; Pool and Scott, the wicked. All agree that the fool is a bad man. To be the reproach of such is justly esteemed one of the greatest afflictions, Ps. xliv. 13, 14; lxxix. 4. Let me not fall into the hand of man.

9. I was dumb; I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it. See on vv. 1, 2; Ps. xxxviii. 13, 14. The quietness of an afflicted believer under the stroke of God is a duty taught in many ways, Lev. x. 3; 2 Sam. xvi. 10; Job i. 22; xl. 4, 5; Ps. cxxxi. 2. Murmuring is a great sin. But to pray is not to find fault. On this clause is founded that excellent treatise, "The Mute Christian." No man prays more frequently or fervently than he who is thus dumb.

10. Remove thy stroke away from me. For stroke several ancient versions read scourge or scourges. Several moderns prefer plague. This does not materially vary the meaning. David is pointing to the chastisement he was undergoing. He begs for its removal, confessing his weakness: I am consumed by the blow of thine hand. For consumed, some read fainted, failed, or wasted away. The meaning is, I am fast failing; help me before I sink.

11. When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth. The Chaldee: By chastisement for sin man is corrected: and his body is dissolved like a moth broken asunder. Several versions for moth read spider, referring to the history of that creature as destroying itself by spinning its web and laying its eggs and so disappearing. The church of England has it, Like as it were a moth fretting a garment; Ainsworth: Thou makest that which is to be desired of his, to melt away as a moth; Walford: Thou destroyest his goodliness as a moth destroyeth a garment; Hengstenberg: Thou dost consume, as by a moth, what he loves. Very few think that the Chaldee gives the correct view. Nearly all think that the reference is to the silent and secret destruction carried on in cloths by the moth; see Job xiii. 28; Isa. l. 9; Hos. v. 12. Calvin: "At first view the comparison of God to a moth may seem absurd; for what relation is there, it may be said, between a small moth-worm and the infinite majesty of God? I answer, That David has with much propriety made use of this simile, that we may know that although God does not openly thunder from heaven against the reprobate, yet his secret curse ceases not to consume them away, just as the moth, though unperceived, wastes by its secret gnawing a piece of cloth or wood." But see Job iv. 19, where the moth itself seems to be the emblem of frailty. So it may be here. Either way we get a good sense. Surely every man is vanity. Selah. Chaldee: Truly every man is always nothing; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Surely every man is disquieted in vain; Syriac: And all men are as a vapor; Hengstenberg: Only vanity are all men. See on v. 5. It is impossible too often to remind men of their frailty.

12. Hear my prayer, O LORD, i. e., so hear as to answer. And give ear unto my cry. When a good judge gives ear, he who has a good cause and can state it is safe. The cry is the earnest prayer, proceeding from a distressed heart. Hold not thy peace at my tears. To a manner earnest in its tones, he added weeping in prayer. If he had not said a word God, who knows the meaning of a sigh, understands also the language of a tear. He then casts himself upon the Lord in language which has not previously occurred in the Psalms. For I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were. God who was the author of the law of Moses, had repeatedly enjoined kindness to strangers, Ex. xxii. 21; Lev. xix. 10, 33. Surely an appeal to the author of such a law cannot be in vain. The last clause probably refers to such acknowledgments as were made by Abraham and Jacob, Gen. xxiii. 4; xlvii. 9. But the words have a higher bearing. Cruden thinks stranger in this place is "one who uses this world as if he used it not, who does not think himself at home in this world, but has his mind and eye fixed on his country which is above." Paul gives the true exposition of such words: "They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. For they that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country. . . They desire a better country, even an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God." Compare 1 Chron. xxix. 15; Ps. cxix. 19. Tholuck: "Man traverses life like a pilgrim and a stranger, making but a short stay."

13. Oh spare me that I may recover strength, before I go hence and be no more. Hengstenberg notices the fact that "all the words of this closing verse occur in different places in the book of Job," Job vii. 8, 19, 21; x. 20, 21; xiv. 6. His inference that the author of that book lived as late as the author of this Psalm does not logically follow. The renderings of the first verb are very various: Stay me, stay from me, let me alone, forgive me, set me free, give me some respite, look away from me. Those who prefer the last form understand the Psalmist as asking God to avert his angry face. Our version agrees with the Arabic literally, and with several translations substantially. Instead of "recover strength," some prefer "be revived," "be refreshed," "refresh myself," "recover myself." Our version retains the idea, not the exact form, which would be "that I may be invigorated." The last words in the Hebrew are very brief and striking, literally, "Before I go [or walk] and be not."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Though some do vainly put a good resolution for a good deed, and do make it only to break it, and when broken do vainly make another just as worthless; yet he who expects to do right, must resolve to do right, v. 1.

2. As one of the most difficult duties is rightly to manage our speech, wise men of every age have been much concerned to govern their tongues with care, vv. 1, 2, 9. Calvin: "There is nothing more slippery or loose than the tongue." Quarles: "If thou desire to be held wise, be so wise as to hold thy tongue."

3. Excellent rules for governing our speech are found in many books. Read them. See the proverbs of Solomon and the best versions of this Psalm.

4. There are many circumstances in which we may wisely be silent, v. 2. Morison: "There are seasons when a good man must be blind to what he sees, deaf to what he hears, and dumb when temptation to speak is peculiarly strong." Towards God we should always be silent, unless we can say something to his honor, Jer. xx. 9; Lam. iii. 39. Towards man we should be silent when our speaking will not promote peace, or truth, or justice, or piety, or edification. Calvin: "David might have encountered the ungodly with a good defence of his own innocence, but he rather preferred to forego the prosecution of his righteous cause than indulge in any intemperate sorrow."

5. It is not wicked to be sad, v. 2. He, who laughs when he should weep, or is glad when he should be grieved, is at least a fool.

6. Extended reflection on any of the great matters relating to God's government of the world will awaken strong emotion. If our thoughts and hearts are right, the more we are aroused, the more will we be inclined to carry our cause before the Lord, v. 3.

7. Of all the petitions we ask of God none is more appropriate than begging for knowledge and instruction, not only as to God's glorious nature, will, ways and works; but also on our own destiny, responsibility, privileges and duties, and particularly our own sin, misery and frailty, v. 3.

8. Human life is a trifle. Nothing is more fleeting. If in this world man attains the highest ends of his existence, it is not possible to vindicate the divine government, vv. 3, 4, 5, 6, 11. When one of the greatest men died, an eloquent survivor said: "A pebble has fallen into a vast lake. The surface is somewhat rippled; but soon all will be smooth as ever." A large part of human wisdom consists in knowing and remembering that we are but shadows passing over the plain: and that the highest pursuits, which prepare us not for a better world are far below the desires of any good man. Paul mentions it as a great truth that in many ways concerned Christians: "The time is short," 1 Cor. vii. 29. When things are alike fleeting, uncertain, and filling us with care, surely we ought to grasp them with neither fondness nor eagerness. Because life is short "no sufferer needs to anticipate centuries of misery in this vain world. Because life is so short, those, who would save themselves and bless their generation, must be up and doing."

9. One of the most profitable ways of studying human life is to contrast it with the eternal ages of him who made the world. This David perhaps does in v. 5. "Mine age is as nothing before thee." Moses does this much more at length in the ninetieth Psalm, vv. 1-10.

10. In the darkest times that visit us, the great source of hope, and joy, and success still remains to all, who have any true piety, v. 7. God never dies, never retires behind clouds so dark that faith and hope and love cannot apprehend him.

11. Morison: "Of all the burdens which press upon a believer, sin is the heaviest," v. 8. The reason is that in its nature it is the greatest of all evils. So God has pronounced. So the renewed soul perceives. Whatever shows us the evil of sin is good for us. On that subject the best saints have the clearest views.

12. It is wise to seek relief from all our distresses by beginning with earnest cries for pardon and purification, v. 8.

13. It is perfectly right to ask exemption from the derisions of ungodly men, v. 8. Scorn is more than most men can bear without loss of temper or of comfort. It is horrible to have dogs turned loose on us.

14. Because our strength is small, it is wise, with submission to the sovereign will of God, to ask that any of our sufferings may be assuaged, any of our afflictions be made light, v. 10. We must indeed close all such prayers with the sentence, "Thy will be done." Still we may beseech the Lord thrice, seven times, very often and very earnestly, and if the thorn in the flesh be not taken away, we shall at least have grace to bear it, and that is better than freedom from sorrow.

15. Henry: "When we are under the correcting hand of God, our eye must be to God himself, and not to any other, for relief. He only that inflicts the stroke can remove it." Were this truth remembered, how much sin and misery would be avoided! When Israel sinned and chastisement came in the shape of war, instead of returning to God by repentance, in their unbelief they sent to Egypt or Assyria for horsemen. How much we resemble them in this folly.

16. God's stroke is terrible. It will consume any who are not mercifully spared and sustained, vv. 10, 11. It is not anywhere of record that man or angel has hardened himself against God and prospered.

17. In v. 12, David virtually asks for the same thing three times. In other Psalms he begs for the same blessing over and over again. True earnestness is importunate, though it is not wordy.

18. It is a blessed thing to be a pilgrim on any terms. Scott: "The Christian's sorrows are all sanctified; the gracious Lord will wipe away his tears, and answer all his prayers: he cannot but feel his afflictions; yet as a stranger and a pilgrim on earth, he hopes for a better and more enduring habitation in heaven, where his heart and his treasure are already. He expects weariness and ill-treatment by the way: but his stay here will not be long; and, walking with God by faith, he goes forward on his journey, undiverted from his course, and not much cast down by the ill accommodation or difficulties with which he meets." In heaven

There is no sorrow, nor any sighing,
Nor any sinning, nor any dying.

19. Cobbin: "There is nothing wrong in desiring to be spared that we may do God's work on earth, and be better prepared by his grace to enjoy the substantial and never-failing blessings of glory." "Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee." It is a sad thing to die, when our hearts are not in a state of nearness to God. "A good man would not wish to meet his Judge in a state of spiritual declension." Who would not desire to lay up some good provision for passing over Jordan? A parent may lawfully pray to live till the character of his offspring is formed. There is also something exceedingly mournful in dying in the midst of one's days. So thought Hezekiah. And it is truly grievous to be called away before the great enterprise of a man's life is accomplished; as if David had died before he was peaceably settled in the throne, or Solomon when the temple was yet unfinished. What made Moses' death so sad was first, that it was for a special sin, and secondly, he had not led the Israelites into the promised land—he had not finished what he began.

20. View death as we may, it is a solemn event. To him who dies daily it has no terrors. Some, like Paul, find themselves in a strait betwixt two, not knowing whether to abide here, or to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. To such dying is not alarming. But to the guilty, the worldly-minded, the backslider, and the lukewarm death is naturally terrible. Some one asked Leighton if he had been to hear a sermon. He answered: "I met a sermon, for I met a corpse; and rightly and profitably are funeral rites performed when the living lay it to heart." Bouchier: "The best preparation for our own funeral is to meditate seriously and prayerfully over another's grave, and take home with us the solemn truths it enforces."

PSALM XL.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 I waited patiently for the LORD; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.
- 2 He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.
- 3 And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD.
- 4 Blessed is that man that maketh the LORD his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies.
- 5 Many, O LORD my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.
- 6 Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required.
- 7 Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me,
- 8 I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart.
- 9 I have preached righteousness in the great congregation: lo, I have not refrained my lips, O LORD, thou knowest.
- 10 I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation.
- 11 Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O LORD: let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me.
- 12 For innumerable evils have compassed me about: mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of mine head: therefore my heart faileth me.
- 13 Be pleased, O LORD, to deliver me: O LORD, make haste to help me.
- 14 Let them be ashamed and confounded together that seek after my soul to destroy it; let them be driven backward and put to shame that wish me evil.
- 15 Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame that say unto me, Aha, aha.
- 16 Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: let such as love thy salvation say continually, The LORD be magnified.
- 17 But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me: thou art my help and my deliverer; make no tarrying, O my God.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. The Arabic says it treats of the church: Syriac: A Psalm of David according to the letter: when Shemaiah brought the names of those who minister in the house of the Lord. In a spiritual sense, it is a thanksgiving to God by his worshippers and church. The supposed reference is to the history recorded in 1 Chron. xxiv. 6. These additions to the title are purely conjectural. In the Hebrew the word David is placed before the word Psalm; whereas in previous Psalms it is just the reverse. But this transposition signifies nothing, though some have attached importance to it. Ainsworth would read it, A Psalm concerning David, and by David would understand Christ, referring to Jer. xxx. 9; Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Hos. iii. 5. But this is surely attaching too much importance to a transposition of words, which does not at all affect the sense, any more than when in English we say, David's Psalms instead of The Psalms of David. That David wrote this Psalm is clear. Hengstenberg: "Scarcely even the semblance of an argument has been brought against David's being the author;" Clarke: "I am satisfied the Psalm was composed by David."

In interpreting this Psalm, the great question is, What is its relation to Christ? For general observations on this subject see Introduction, § 8, and preliminary remarks on Psalms xvi. xxii. If the views there given are sound, the judicious reader will easily see how we should interpret this composition. These things are clear:

1. Unquestionably this Psalm contains a prophecy of the Messiah. This is unanswerably established by Hengstenberg in his Christology, Vol. I.; and by almost innumerable authors ancient and modern, especially commentators on the Psalms and on the Epistle to the Hebrews. Sampson: "To the reverent believer in inspiration the sufficient proof is that an inspired author has ascribed the words of the Psalm to Christ."

2. There is not sufficient evidence that the whole Psalm, like Psalm xxii. is a prophecy, applying directly, solely and exclusively to Christ. Those, who maintain that it is, find themselves beset with difficulties on all hands, forcing them to interpretations that seem fanciful, and shocking to the feelings of the pious, maintaining that verse 12 contains the words of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is very freely admitted that the word there rendered iniquities may mean punishments, calamities, sufferings on account of sin; but ancient and modern translations are so uniform in rendering it iniquities, sins, wickednesses, that it looks like a mere device of interpretation to resort to such an explanation. The Scripture is careful not to call the sins, for which Messiah suffered, his, but always ours: "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon him; the LORD hath laid on him the iniquity of us all," Isa. liii. 5, 6.

3. It is not necessary to find or establish formal divisions in this Psalm, as some have done, in order to ascertain what was personal to David, and what pertained to Messiah. Kennicott divides it "into three distinct parts, the first ending with the fifth verse, the second with the first word of the twelfth verse, and the third reaching to the close of the Psalm." Other partitions have been suggested; but none so plausible as this; yet even this is plainly capricious.

4. This Psalm is best interpreted by classing it under the head of Typical-Messianic. This supposes David, the speaker, to be a type of Christ, and yet to utter things, which cannot but remotely, if at all, have a just application to the type, but are only or fully true of the antitype; yet that so much is literally true of the type as fitly to make him a figure of him that was to come. This mode of expounding other portions of Scripture is common with the best commentators. See on Ps. xvi. Morison: "I can never read this Psalm without some doubts whether it is altogether, in every part, prophetic." A large number of sound expositors agree with him. Even Cocceius admits that part of the words may be applied to Christ and part not so applied without any impropriety. Scott: "In this Psalm, David seems to have intended to speak of his own case; but the Holy Spirit led him to use language, which in its full meaning can be applied to none but the Lord Jesus himself." Clarke: "The sixth, seventh, and eighth verses contain a remarkable prophecy of the incarnation and sacrificial offering of Jesus Christ." With slight variations the last five verses of this Psalm compose Psalm lxx. Such repetitions are not unusual in the Scriptures. In this Psalm we have Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. I waited patiently for the LORD. In the Hebrew and nearly all the ancient versions, the first word is doubled: Waiting, I waited; Expecting, I expected; Hoping, I hoped. Ainsworth: "This doubling notes earnestness, constancy, patience." Our Lord used a like phrase: "With desire have I desired to eat this passover." Only in Luke xxii. 15 desire is a noun and desired a verb; whereas in this Psalm both words are verbs. Alexander thinks the repetition "is perhaps exclusive of all other means. 'I simply waited; I did nothing but wait.'" This form of expression probably had its origin with the Hebrews; but we find examples in the Greek Classics. We had the same verb in Ps. xxv. 3, 5, 21; xxxix. 7. It is commonly rendered wait, or look, in the sense of expect. Such pious behaviour could not be unrequited. Berleberg

Bible: "If we only wait in patience upon God, he will presently manifest himself." And he inclined unto me, and heard my cry. For inclined some read bended, bowed, was attentive. Either gives the true sense. The more a judge is interested in a suitor, the more he leans forward and listens to him. The Lord heard, i. e., so as to answer.

2. He brought me up also out of a horrible pit. For horrible pit the margin has pit of noise. This is literal and is approved by the Chaldee, Montanus, Musculus, Piscator, Cocceius, Jebb and Alexander. The Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate read pit of misery; Syriac, pit of woe; Arabic, pit of perdition; Calvin and Fry, roaring pit; Edwards, dreadful pit; Horsley, void pit; Hammond, a resounding pit; Ainsworth, the pit of sounding calamity; Hengstenberg, the roaring deep. The prophet designs to say that his condition had been like that of one in a pit or pool, where by some cause the waters, being greatly agitated, resounded from deep and horrible caverns. In this sad plight was he, when God brought him up, or drew him out, or rescued him. The pit did not contain clear waters, and God rescued him out of the miry clay. Chaldee, mire of filth; Syriac and Arabic, mud of corruption; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, the filth of dregs; Ainsworth, the mire of mud; Edwards, deep clay; Fry, overwhelming mire; Hengstenberg, the mud; Amesius, the filthy mud. The condition, from which he had been rescued, was one every way horrible. Such imagery as this was borrowed from what was actually known in countries familiar to the inspired writers. And set my feet upon a rock. The rock is a favorite emblem of inspired writers, see Ps. xix. 14; xxvii. 5. Here it is in contrast with miry clay. And established my goings. For established the Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate read directed; church of England and Jebb, ordered; Ainsworth, ordered steadily; Edwards, secured; Alexander, fixed; Ainsworth, set fast. Established is best.

3. And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God. Song, commonly so rendered; found in the title of Ps. xxx. Praise, in Hebrew the same, from which the book of Psalms, or Praises, takes its name. In the common version it is uniformly rendered praise, in the plural praises. The word new points to the novel occasion on which David was called to praise. Alexander supposes the terms used to be equivalent to fresh praise. Calvin: "He uses the word new in the sense of exquisite, not ordinary." A song is the consummation of a deliverance or victory. Such mercy and compassion could not be without effect: Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the Lord. Remarkable displays of God's power and wisdom in providence, even though they be very merciful to those for whom they are made, seem to have a great effect in producing a salutary awe in the minds of men, Ps. cxxx. 4; Isa. xli. 5; Acts ii. 43. This may be merely a fear producing restraint, or it may be a godly fear. Fear, it expresses any kind of dread, pious or natural. It often points to a gracious state of mind. We have the same phrase in Ps. lii. 6. The fear here spoken of was holy; it brought forth good fruits. It led men to trust in the Lord. There seems to be no reason for connecting this verse and the next by supplying the word saying.

4. Blessed is that man that maketh the LORD his trust. On the first word see on Ps. i. 1; literally, O the blessednesses. The blessings, coming on him who trusts in the Lord, are multiform, countless, endless, immeasurable. A good man trusts in the Lord, And respecteth not the proud. Respecteth, looketh or turneth to; in Ps. xxv. 16, Turn thee unto me. Our version gives the sense. Hengstenberg: "To turn one's self to any one is as much as to take up with his side, to go over to his party, to espouse his principles." To respect in the sense of this verse is the opposite of contemn in Ps. xv. 4. The proud are the insolent, or violent; here only. The pious man respecteth not these, Nor such as turn aside to lies. By lies we may understand not only falsehoods, but also idols, which are lying vanities; earthly things, which disappoint all who trust in them; men, who as a rock of confidence are a lie; or any fatal delusion or mistake respecting our religious hopes or views, especially perhaps such as spring from self-conceit. The Syriac has lying speech; Arabic, lying fables; Septuagint, lying madnesses.

5. Many, O LORD my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered. The Chaldee has the first clause thus: Many signs hast thou given, O Lord our God. Several other versions: Many admirable things hast thou done. Many, also great, see Ps. iii. 1; xix. 13; xxv. 11. Wonderful works, wonders, marvels, miracles, marvellous works, wondrous works, wondrous things, great wonders. See on Ps. ix. 1. There is nothing gained by separating many and wonderful works. For reckoned up in order Hammond prefers I cannot set in order, meaning I cannot recount, or enumerate. The Septuagint reads: There is none, that shall be likened unto thee; Hengstenberg: Nothing is to be compared to thee. The word does sometimes refer to comparing, likening, but even then we should include the idea of arranging or setting in order for the purpose of comparison. The common version is best. The last clause is variously given. Calvin: They are more than can be told; Hengstenberg: They are not to be numbered. All teach the same thing. There is nothing to justify us in exclusively applying the term wonderful works to the signs and wonders wrought by the hand of Moses and Aaron in Egypt, at the Red sea and in the wilderness; nor in exclusively applying the term thoughts to God's secret decrees on the one hand, or to his revealed will on the other. We should not causelessly limit Scriptural terms.

In the next three verses the Psalmist uses language, all of which is eminently applicable to Christ, and a part of which is applicable to none else. It is so applied by Paul in Heb. x. 5-9. When men are not inspired, we may subject all they say to free and fair criticism without any blame. But when men, moved by the Holy Ghost, announce heavenly doctrines, or expound the sacred writings, it is wicked to cavil. To the pious soul it is a source of unspeakable consolation to find a divinely authorized exposition of this Scripture. Paul quotes the Septuagint version, with slight alterations. For the purpose, which he had in view, the Septuagint rendering was as good as any. It had the advantage of being familiarly known. The great point, on which the Apostle was laying out his strength, was that all the sacrifices and offerings in preceding ages, were powerless, while Christ's offering was truly efficacious.

6. Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire. Sacrifice the same as in Ps. iv. 5; xxvii. 6. In Gen. xxxi. 54 where the text reads, "Jacob offered sacrifice," the margin has it, he "killed beasts." It denotes bloody offerings, in which the life of the animal was taken. Offering, in Gen. iv. 4, 5. We had it in Ps. xx. 3. In the law it is commonly rendered meat-offering, which was an oblation not of flesh, as the English word meat leads some to suppose, but of flour, or corn and wine and oil, etc. The same word is often rendered, gift, present. The fact that God does not desire such sacrifice and offering is declared in Ps. l. 8; li. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Isa. i. 11; Hos. vi. 6. The only sins, for which such sacrificial offerings seem to have been appointed under the law, were: 1, sins of ignorance; 2, sins against man, admitting of restitution; 3, sins against the precepts of the ceremonial law. But for murder, ungodliness, malice, hardness of heart, pride, unbelief, all classes of spiritual sins the law of Moses appointed no sacrifice. Even where God had positively ordained oblations, he preferred piety and mercy to them. They never had efficacy in removing the guilt of sin. They merely typified the sacrifice of Christ. They were shadows and not the very image of good things. As God did not rest in them, so neither did his true worshippers. In comparison of either piety or mercy they were as nothing, Compared with the finished work of Christ, God utterly rejected them, Isa. lxvi. 3. Mine ears hast thou opened. Opened, margin digged. This is literal. In Ps. vii. 15, He made [or digged] a pit; in Ps. xxii. 16, pierced; often digged, see Gen. xxvi. 25; Ps. lvii. 6; cxix. 85. We have similar language in Isa. l. 5: "The LORD God hath opened mine ear." This is immediately explained by the clauses: "And I was not rebellious, neither turned away back." In Job xxxvi. 10 we have a similar phrase: "He openeth also their ear to discipline." Doubtless there is an allusion, as many think, to Ex. xxi. 5, 6. See also Deut. xv. 16, 17. Jesus Christ took upon him the form of a servant. He was not rebellious. He did and he suffered all God's will. He was God's servant so as none else ever was. He voluntarily humbled himself to more service and to greater suffering than any other. Several versions render it, "Thou hast pierced or bored through my ears." The chief difficulty arises from the Septuagint version, which has: A body hast thou prepared me. One mode of solving this difficulty is by supposing that the text of the Septuagint has been altered. Hammond has an extended note summing up the chief points of evidence to show that this has probably been done. The Vulgate has ears not body. The ancient scholiasts, Eusebius Cæsariensis in the Catena of the Greek Fathers and their exposition of this place as set out by Corderius furnish the grounds, on which Hammond relies. But this can hardly be deemed satisfactory. The text of the copies of the Septuagint is very harmonious. Those who think it has been altered, make Paul himself the first to read body instead of ears, and suggest that the Septuagint text was altered to correspond with Paul's version. But this was hardly the case. The variation in the rendering was aside from Paul's main argument, and he had no motive for changing the text. As he found it, it was quite to his purpose. Sampson thinks the meaning of the phrase is: "Thou hast given me the form and the spirit of a servant." And Alexander paraphrases the whole verse thus: "Thou hast not required ceremonial services, but obedience, and hast pierced my ear, as a sign that I will hear thee and obey thee forever." However the authors of the Septuagint may have been led to render the clause as they did, their translation and the original do so far agree as to teach quite the same thing, viz.: that by the ordinance of God Christ solemnly became the servant of God. This is sufficient. Hengstenberg: "The thought is not altered by the Septuagint translation." Burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required. This is a repetition of the assertion in the first clause in terms different from the former, but denoting the want of efficacy in expiatory offerings for sin. Clarke: "It is remarkable that all the offerings and sacrifices which were of an atoning or cleansing nature, offered under the law, are here enumerated by the Psalmist and the apostle, to show that none of them, nor all of them, could take away sin; and that the grand sacrifice of Christ was that alone which could do it."

7. Then said I, Lo, I come. This clause is prophetic of two things: 1. The coming of Christ in the flesh and as the Saviour: 2. The readiness with which he came to his work. This last is more explicitly declared in the next verse. It is a fundamental truth that Christ came willingly, suffered willingly, and died willingly. Let pious souls remember this. In the volume of the book it is written of me. Some make this clause parenthetical. Perhaps they do so, because Paul does it. But that can hardly justify us inasmuch as he quoted the words for one purpose, which has been already stated, and not that he might expound each clause. He quoted all that bore on the point he was arguing. Volume, from a word which signifies to roll. The roll was anciently the invariable form of books among the Jews, until the days of our Saviour, Luke iv. 17. Even to this day they sometimes use that form. Often there were two rollers of wood near to each other. As one turned to unfold the law, the other received it. But oftentimes the parchment having received its form was not attached to wood. When the Septuagint uses head instead of volume, it employs a word which Suidas shows meant roll. Roll occurs often in Jeremiah, several times in Ezekiel, and once or twice in Zechariah, and is always rendered roll, except in Ps. xl. 7. Book, commonly so rendered; sometimes bill, letter, scroll. It is not very different from our word Scripture or writing. For it is written of me, some prefer it is prescribed to me. All this seems to rest very much on the supposition that these verses chiefly refer to David, and that the volume of the book is the pentateuch, and that the part specially referred to is Deut. xvii. where the duty of rulers is prescribed. But surely something more is taught. Even if it could be shown that the volume of the book meant the pentateuch, Christ is predicted there, John v. 46, 47. If the Old Testament generally is meant by the volume of the book, then Christ says: "Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me," John v. 39. In either of these ways we get a good sense, amply sustained by Scripture, Luke xxiv. 27; Acts iii. 18, 21, 24; xxvi. 22. There is therefore no necessity for supposing with Hammond that the Volume of the book refers to "the bill or roll of contract betwixt God the Father and the Son, wherein is supposed to be written the agreement preparatory to that great work of Christ's incarnation." This does indeed teach no erroneous doctrine; but all we know of the covenant of Redemption is revealed in Scripture. It is often referred to in the Old Testament, see Ps. ii.; cx.; Isa. xlix. So that still we are brought back to the old Testament Scriptures as the volume of the book referred to in this verse. To this view some object that little, if any of the Old Testament besides the pentateuch was written when this Psalm was composed, and so all or the chief parts of the Old Testament cannot be embraced. But this is sufficiently answered by stating that as verses 6-8 of this Psalm contain an undoubted "prophecy concerning Messiah, it may be carried down to that period in the Redeemer's history, in which the prophetic testimony concerning him was complete; and moreover, it may be observed, that the Apostle, in illustrating and applying this very prophecy, fixes the period of its reference to the time when Messiah 'cometh into the world,' (Heb. x. 5;) at which time Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms were all complete, and were collected into one uniform record." See Morison on this place, and McLean on Heb. x. 5-7.

8. I delight to do thy will, O my God. Christ's obedience to God's will in all things was perfect. His life was a wonderful illustration of the truth: "Love is the fulfilling of the law." The Father wholly approved of Christ's undertaking, and called him to it, Heb. v. 4, 5. He announced in an audible voice from heaven that he was well-pleased in Christ. By raising him from the dead and setting him at his own right hand, he showed his continued and immeasurable approval of all that the Son had done and suffered. None could do anything with more delight than Christ evinced in fulfilling the whole will of God. Not a flaw has man, or angel, or omniscience ever found in his character and obedience. Yea, thy law is within my heart. Such language denotes a prompt, cheerful, hearty spirit of obedience to the entire known will of God, Jer. xxxi. 33; Heb. viii. 10; Ps. i. 2. But there is no objection to giving to the will of God a more extended signification. Sampson: "The special will of God here is that by which he desires the salvation of his people through an adequate satisfaction to the divine law. Upon this condition alone can he will their salvation. Hence he rejects the offerings of bulls and goats, and demands that of Christ, as alone sufficient to the exigencies of the case." This language is not too strong. Paul's use of this prophecy fully justifies it, Heb. x. 10.

9. I have preached righteousness in the great congregation. Preached, announced, proclaimed, published, spread the tidings of. The righteousness is the righteousness of God, as we learn from the next verse. The great congregation points to great publicity. If this verse and the next have any fulfilment in David, it was in his making the most open and grateful mention of the Lord's dealings with him, in solemn and thankful acts of worship in the temple and before all Israel. But it is impossible to compare the declaration here made with that in Ps. xxii. 22, without seeing that there is a remarkable similarity between these Scriptures. There is no violence done in regarding verses 9, 10 of this Psalm as applicable to Christ. The intent of the three preceding verses has been determined by inspiration. These two may well be applied to the same glorious person. It is admitted that there is no natural pause in the sense till the beginning of verse 11. Lo, I have not refrained my lips, O LORD, thou knowest. No one could so truly say this as Christ himself. As he used no sinful words, so he indulged no sinful silence. He always spoke when he ought, and always said what he ought. Christ was incomparably the greatest preacher this world ever saw.

10. I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation. This verse is very much an amplification of the preceding. It treats of the same matter in the same forms, both negatively and positively. Five things are here said to have been published and made known: 1. God's righteousness, rectitude, equity, or justice in all things. This is the great pillar of God's government. So long as God is just, there is hope for those who have a good cause. 2. God's faithfulness, the word has the same root as Amen; it signifies stability, truth, fidelity to engagements. 3. God's lovingkindness, or mercy, favor, kindness, goodness, merciful kindness. See on Ps. xvii. 7. 4. God's Truth, including his sincerity and veracity. See on Ps. xv. 2. 5. God's salvation. To those, who trust his righteousness, faithfulness, lovingkindness and truth, salvation is sure to come, bringing with it full redemption. Hengstenberg: "It may seem, on a superficial observation, as if David used here too many words. But they will judge quite otherwise, who understand the natural coldness of the human heart, its lukewarmness in the praise of God, its forgetfulness and unthankfulness, and the inclination of the lazy mouth to silence." We need all God has promised. If these verses refer to Christ, then we see how all the attributes of God are pledged to build up his throne, establish his kingdom, and make him see his seed, and satisfy him with ample reward for all his fidelity and eminent services in vindicating the divine honor in all he said and did, speaking for God as none else ever did. At the close of these verses we find a transition from praise to prayer. Our Saviour did indeed pray, but it has been shown in the introduction to this Psalm that he could not have fitly used some of the petitions of this Psalm. It is not necessary that we should apply any part of the remainder of the Psalm to Christ. All the petitions suit the case of David.

11. Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O LORD. The doctrine of the divine attributes and government laid down in the preceding verse is here used for personal support and encouragement. Tender mercies, in the Hebrew one word, often so rendered, also mercies, compassions, bowels. Let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me. Lovingkindness and Truth as in v. 10. Our version makes the whole verse a prayer; but the original has it in the future, and so some render it.

12. For innumerable evils have compassed me about. Evils, either natural or moral, either sins or afflictions. The Hebrew original, like our word evil, does not determine which class of evil is intended. This is left to the connection. See on Psalm v. 4; vii. 4, 9; x. 6; xv. 3. The next clause shows which class of evils is spoken of: Mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up. Not to be able to look up is to be ashamed, filled with self-reproach and remorse. Our Saviour never had either remorse or despair. He could not have had either, simply because he was pure and innocent. Nor did he bear the sins of himself; for first, he had no sins, and then, he bare the sin of MANY, not of one. Our iniquities take hold of us when we have a terrible sense of God's just displeasure against them, and when we see their guilt, their multitude and their aggravations. For taken hold upon many prefer overtaken. Whoever has a just view of one of his sins commonly sees that his offences are countless: They are more than the hairs of mine head. Christ truly convinced the woman of Samaria of one sin, and she went away and said, "Come, see a man that hath told me all things that ever I did." Therefore my heart faileth me. Clearly these words apply to the type and not to the antitype. Psalm lxx. is nearly the same as the residue of this, and no one applies that to Christ.

13. Be pleased, O LORD, to deliver me. Be pleased, not before found in the Psalms. The same word is rendered Delight, take pleasure. It is a petition that God would set his heart on rescuing his servant. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1; xxii. 20. O LORD, make haste to help me. The case was urgent. The crisis had arrived.

14. Let them be ashamed and confounded together that seek after my soul to destroy it; let them be driven backward and put to shame that wish me evil. See on Ps. xxxv. 4, 26. Alexander: "Strictly speaking, this is not so much the expression of a wish as of a confident expectation." See Introduction, § 6.

15. Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame that say unto me, Aha, aha. On Aha see on Ps. xxxv. 21, 25. Desolate, a dreadful word, expressive of a complete overthrow, sometimes rendered astonished, as at a fearful catastrophe.

16. Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee. The relevancy of the petitions of this verse, as of the three preceding, is this, that when God finally and fully decides for the righteous and against the wicked, he acts out his own excellent and unchangeable nature. So that a deliverance now wrought for David, a representative of a class, would give joy to many. Let such as love thy salvation say continually, The LORD be magnified. The deliverance wrought for David has made millions glad. They have cried out, Great is the Lord, or, Let the Lord be great, i. e., in the eyes of all his creatures.

17. But I am poor and needy. Poor, see on Ps. ix. 12, 18. Needy, see on Ps. ix. 18; xii. 5; q. d., I am in a low condition, I am afflicted, I bear my trials in a meek and humble way, I am just in that state in which divine interposition will be honorable to God. Yet the LORD thinketh upon me. This declares his confidence that his prayer is heard, and his judgment not passed over. The Chaldee: God meditates good for me; other versions: The Lord careth for me; Alexander: The Lord will think of me. The phrase is one of hope and confidence. Thou art my help and my deliverer. He was satisfied that his prayer would be fully answered. Make no tarrying, O my God. The deliverance was not yet fully achieved. Speedy aid was what his case required. Arnd: "Thou art my help in heaven, because I have no helper and deliverer on earth. Therefore delay not. I know thou wilt choose the right time and not neglect me." The old English Psalter: "Let us not be so long under distress and misery that we lose our patience and our love to Thee."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Patient waiting is a very difficult duty, but it is essential to Christian character and comfort, v. 1. It belongs to true piety under all dispensations. "Faith is not thoroughly tried except by long endurance."

2. There is a remarkable similarity in the accounts of the experiences of God's people from age to age. The whole account given in vv. 1-3 of David's deliverance would well suit any great deliverance wrought in behalf of himself or of any other saint, whether from temporal or spiritual distress, whether from awful convictions, or religious depression. The real author of the Scriptures must have known all things, else he could not have cast so great variety of mental exercise into so few and brief moulds of words.

3. Many of the trials of God's people are truly dismal and horrible. A pit of noise and miry clay are apt images to represent the evils they endure, v. 2. Distress, perplexity, a terrible and protracted warfare with sin and hell are the lot of the saints. Adams of Wintringham: "I found myself a sinner at three-score and ten, and I find myself a sinner still at four-score."

4. Deliverances are generally such as to show that none but God could have wrought them, v. 2. The pit was too deep for a created arm to reach to its bottom. The load was too heavy for created strength to bear. God will have, because he deserves to have all the glory of man's salvation.

5. The greater the trial, the greater is the deliverance, and the more joyous and loud should be the song which we sing to the praise and glory of God, v. 3. To praise God for redemption only as we do for a cup of water is shocking. Dickson: "It is a part of our duty to glorify God after every mercy, and in a special manner when the mercy is very notable."

6. The reason why wicked men do not become wise, is not that no truth is set before them, that no examples are placed before them, or that no wonders are wrought in their sight. All who open their eyes do see, and fear, and trust, v. 3. God always instructs such as love the truth. Nature, providences, Scripture, all point to God, to truth and to duty.

7. No mortal can tell half the blessedness of a truly good man, v. 4. Some pious and able men have spent a long time in stating the privileges and advantages of godliness. Nor has their work been useless or unimportant. But none of them has had complete success. The best enumeration that man can make must end with etc., etc., etc.

8. As true piety does not turn to the wicked with complacency, so its expectations of help and succor are not at all from that quarter, v. 4.

9. What an ennobling theme of meditation and praise have we in God's providences! v. 5. From what miseries has he delivered us! How amazing have been our escapes! How gracious have been the answers to our prayers! How pleasant have been our friends! How few and feeble have been our enemies! How abundant have been the means provided for our sustenance, our refreshment, and our entertainment! "Great are the works of the Lord, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein."

10. Not only are God's works in themselves admirable, but also as they disclose his plans, his counsels, his thoughts, v. 5. These we learn both from Scripture and providence. God does what he will, and so we know his mind. He says what he will do, and so we learn his thoughts. The thoughts and plans of God are in many respects amazing. They comprehend all worlds, all agents, all objects, all subjects, all causes, all effects. They provide for all contingencies. They all favor piety. They all frown on sin. They are friendly to the poor, the humble, the stranger, the forsaken. They are true, and holy, and righteous altogether.

11. Creation and providence are noble themes of study and of worship; but redemption is still greater, vv. 6-8. Morison: "The wonders of the great salvation shall engage the counsels and fill up the praises of eternity; but the works and thoughts of Jehovah to our fallen race, especially as displayed in Christ Jesus the Son of his love, shall far exceed all finite powers of calculation, and shall be forever telling, yet untold."

12. Another matter illustrated by vv. 6-8 is the fact that Christ and his redemption are ever welcome themes to the prophets. They take it for granted that these subjects will be grateful to their pious readers. Often they give no notice, and ask no permission to introduce Messiah, his work, his sufferings and his recompense. "The testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy."

13. How effectually everything in salvation is arranged to secure glory to God. The Father devised the scheme; the Son executed it; the Spirit applies it. All men, who receive it, renounce all personal merit and all boasting. They unitedly sing, "Glory to God in the highest!" The plan is God's will. Christ does that will. Long since God revealed the plan. Long since it was finished. All works and sufferings of man are as nothing compared with this great device. Even the most costly gifts and sacrifices are wholly rejected, vv. 6-8.

14. When will the world learn that forms and ceremonies, though ordained by God, are wholly inefficacious for salvation? v. 6. Baptism and the Lord's Supper can do no more good than sacrifices and circumcision did of old. To despise any ordinance of God is certainly sin; but to put an ordinance in the place of hearty piety towards God is to despise God himself; and to put any ordinance in the place of Christ is to become a thief and a robber.

15. If any ask our reason for receiving Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah, we point to "the volume of the book" of God, and there find that Messiah was to be, to do and to suffer just what Jesus was, and did, and suffered, and that no other person, who has ever appeared on this earth bore those prophetic marks, v. 7.

16. It is to the joy of all pious hearts as it is to the glory of God that Christ's obedience was perfect in all respects, v. 8. It lacked nothing. It was divinely accepted. Neither has the most enlightened conscience ever found it insufficient.

17. God desires truth in the inward parts. In his eye all true holiness flows from an internal principle. Henry: "When the law of God is written in our hearts, our duty will be our delight." Then also it will be the delight of God, v. 8.

18. There is a universal obligation to make known the glorious attributes of God, proclaiming them in all proper ways, and never concealing the truth which he has made known, vv. 9, 10. Tholuck: "Though the wonders of divine mercy cannot be numbered, should we not count as many as we are able?" Let us recount the mercy of the Lord forever. "The more faithful preachers are to declare the gospel to the salvation of souls, the more confidence and comfort shall the testimony of their conscience afford to them in the day of their trouble, when they come before God."

19. After our best services we have as much need to plead for tender mercies as ever before, v. 11. Our prayer to our dying day must be, "Forgive us our debts."

20. Though our views of sin may through life be inadequate, yet we have no reason for believing that our sanctification will progress rapidly, or ever be perfected without our experiencing a deep sense of personal vileness and ill-desert, v. 12. A perfect view of his iniquities would sink any man in despair, unless he had far clearer apprehensions of God's mercy in Christ than are attained by the majority of converted men. Let us ask for such a sense of our sins, as we can bear, and as will make the cross of Christ most dear to us. Dickson: "Nothing can so empty a man, and lay him low, and fill him with confusion of face, as his sin pursuing him." Whatever thus abases him is useful to him.

21. In all our straits and trials effectual help must come from God only, v. 13.

22. The higher the wicked rise, and the more they seem to prosper, the more disastrous will be their overthrow, v. 14.

23. The dreariness of the final state of the foes of God is indescribable. It is desolation, v. 15. There shall be left to them nothing to be glad of.

24. The joyfulness of saints is a great fact established by history and authorized by all God's word and arrangements, v. 16. Their bliss shall increase forever.

25. God's people greatly prefer that all their deliverances, all their salvation should come from God alone, v. 16. There is no other Saviour. They do not desire another. They refuse all others.

26. This Psalm, like many others, illustrates the rule that before honor is humility. God's plan is that service should precede reward, and trial go before the crown.

27. In like manner we see how honor always comes after humility. Our low estate is not despised by God. He as readily goes to a hovel as to a palace. He has powerful leanings to the poor and sorrowful. Nor will he make any tarrying, when the right time for their deliverance comes, v. 17.

PSALM XLI.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 Blessed is he that considereth the poor: the LORD will deliver him in time of trouble.

2 The LORD will preserve him, and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth: and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies.

3 The LORD will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.

4 I said, LORD, be merciful unto me: heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee.

5 Mine enemies speak evil of me, When shall he die, and his name perish?

6 And if he come to see me, he speaketh vanity: his heart gathereth iniquity to itself; when he goeth abroad, he telleth it.

7 All that hate me whisper together against me: against me do they devise my hurt.

8 An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him: and now that he lieth he shall rise up no more.

9 Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me.

10 But thou, O LORD, be merciful unto me, and raise me up, that I may requite them.

11 By this I know that thou favorest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.

12 And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and settest me before thy face for ever.

13 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. Some make Psalms xl. and xli. a pair; but see Introduction, § 12. As the Jews divided the Psalter into books, this was the last of the first book; see Introduction, § 11. The title and general consent make David the author of this ode. If it had a historic occasion, we know not what it was. The Syriac title reads: "A Psalm of David when he appointed overseers to take care of the poor." Patrick, Dodd, Scott and others think it finds its occasion in David's sickness and in the rebellion of Absalom. But we can prove none of these things; though the latter conjecture is plausible. Unless we certainly know the occasion, it is not safe to lay much stress on it. The scope of the poem is of much more importance. The Arabic title says it is "a prophecy concerning the incarnation, and also concerning the salutation of Judas." Horsley: "In this Psalm Messiah is the speaker." Fry: "The poor is none other than the same holy sufferer, whose sorrows and injuries have been all along the subject of these Psalms." Horne: "The prophet is speaking of the person of the Messiah." But the confession of personal sin in v. 4 is fatal to the theory that Christ is the speaker throughout the Psalm. The safest mode of interpretation is that called Typical-Messianic. See remarks on Ps. xl. Calvin: "Certainly we ought to understand that, although David speaks of himself in this psalm, yet he speaks not as a common and private person, but as one who represented the person of Christ, inasmuch as he was, as it were, the example after which the whole Church should be conformed—a point well entitled to our attention, in order that each of us may prepare himself for the same condition. It was necessary that what was begun in David should be fully accomplished in Christ; and, therefore, it must of necessity come to pass, that the same thing should be fulfilled in each of his members, namely, that they should not only suffer from external violence and force, but also from internal foes, ever ready to betray them, even as Paul declares that the Church shall be assailed, not only by "fightings without," but also by "fears within." Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1021; Clarke, B. C. 1033; while Tholuck thinks it was written during the reign of Saul. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. Blessed is he that considereth the poor. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1; xxxii. 1; O the blessednesses. Considereth the poor; Chaldee: Attendeth to the distressed affairs of the poor so as to pity them; Arabic: Is kind to the poor; Calvin: Judgeth wisely of the poor! Ainsworth: Prudently attendeth unto the poor weakling; Fry: Rightly considereth the afflicted; Hengstenberg: Acts wisely towards the poor; Ainsworth thinks the word rendered considereth "implies both a skilful minding or judging, and a carriage according in word and deed." Scott: "This clause is generally understood to refer to the considerate, active, and liberal kindness, shown to the poor and afflicted, from genuine faith and love." Diodati: "It consists as well in judging soberly and charitably, of the hidden causes of their affliction, as in words and acts of humanity and mercy." The purely benevolent man shall not be unrequited. The LORD will deliver him in time of trouble. Deliver; save, preserve, cause to escape. Calvin has comfort. Trouble; evil, affliction, mischief, wrong. See on Ps. v. 4; vii. 4, 9. God allows his people to see trouble, but he saves them from the evil of affliction. They have learned the art of rejoicing in tribulation. But the wicked faint when they are rebuked. Some have thought that the word him refers to the poor; others, to him that considereth the poor. Both senses are good. The latter pretty certainly gives the meaning of the prophet. The same is true in vv. 2, 3.

2. The LORD will preserve him and keep him alive. These verbs are in the future. Some of the ancient versions, but for no good cause, put them in the optative. The best scholars follow the Hebrew. The connection is thus kept up. Preserve, keep, guard; see on Ps. xii. 7; xvi. 1. To keep alive is to cause to live, to save alive, to quicken, to recover from sickness. There is no objection to making the clause include the promise of a resurrection and of a happy life beyond. Good things given in covenant love here are pledges of better things to come. And he shall be blessed upon the earth. Godliness has promise of both worlds. Calvin regards this clause and the preceding as of like import, and says the prophet "does not in the least exclude by these expressions the hope of a better life after death." For blessed, Calvin and Fry prefer prosper, and Alexander, be prospered. The Hebrew is commonly rendered blessed, though it seems primarily to signify led, guided, and afterwards relieved, and finally blessed in general. See Pr. xxiii. 19; Isa. i. 17; ix. 16. God will lead, guide, relieve such a man. And thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies. They will, they wish and seek his ruin temporal and eternal; they love to make him appear ridiculous, contemptible, odious and vicious. The wicked shout when they see the righteous stumble. The verb is by many rendered in the optative, Do not thou give him up; but this is not good.

3. The LORD will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing. Strengthen; pri- marily prop, stay, uphold, then sustain, strengthen. The Chaldee: The word of God will aid him in his life; Calvin: The Lord will support him on the bed of sorrow; Jebb: The Lord will preserve him upon the couch of languishing; Green: When he languisheth upon his bed, the Lord shall support him. The renderings quite agree in all but the tense. The future is best. The next clause fully maintains the parallelism. Thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness. Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway: Thou hast turned all his couch in his sickness; Calvin and Ainsworth: Thou hast turned all his bed in his sickness; Green: Thou shalt make his whole bed easy during his sickness; Fry: Thou hast changed all his bed in his suffering. Some have thought that the meaning was that in sickness God would change (that is exchange) the bed for something else. But the more common and obvious view is better. It represents God as exercising the office of a nurse, smoothing the pillow and making the bed of his sick and distressed servants.

4. I said, LORD, be merciful unto me. To any soul rightly affected with a sense of sin the cry for mercy is natural. Good men in this life never get beyond the prayer of the publican, Luke xviii. 13. The former verses of this Psalm seem to declare a doctrine coincident with the experience David is about to recite, a sorrowful experience in which he had conflicts and trials. He begins with earnest crying for mercy and help. If we get rid of any affliction, it must be through mercy. Justice would rivet upon us every sorrow that ever befalls us. Heal my soul. The worst of all troubles are soul-troubles. For I have sinned against thee. Saul and Judas each said: "I have sinned;" but David says: "I have sinned against thee." Compare 2 Sam. xii. 13; Ps. li. 4. We never get right views of the nature of sin, till we see that it is against Jehovah. The enormity of every offence is to be determined in part by the character of him against whom it is perpetrated. A sense of sin deeply affected the Psalmist. He seems to have connected his distress with his transgression, and he "expects that as soon as he had obtained forgiveness, he would also obtain relief from his affliction."

5. Mine enemies speak evil of me. Evil may be ill, mischief, sorrow, and then speak has the sense of predict or imprecate; or evil may be wickedness or malice, and then to speak is to utter. The wicked hate the righteous in a deadly manner. The proof is that they say: When shall he die, and his name perish? The form of question here is optative and not interrogatory. There are many instances of this form of speech, Ps. xlii. 2; ci. 2. The wicked desire the utter overthrow of the righteous, and at times they seem confidently to expect it. They forget that a just man falleth seven times, and riseth up again. Even when the wicked witness the temporal death of the saints, they but see a mysterious method of raising them to glory. The hope that the name of the righteous shall perish is quite idle; the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance.

6. And if he come to see me, he speaketh vanity. Enemies are either open or secret. Open enemies were mentioned in the preceding verse. Here we have a hypocrite visiting David in his sickness. A more difficult duty is seldom before us than when hypocritical men call on us in our sickness. Such men are both more detestable and more dangerous than overt enemies. The change of number from plural to singular is not unusual and does not vary the sense. Some read one of them for he; but this is not necessary. His heart gathereth iniquity to itself, i. e., He is "collecting materials for calumnious reports;" and is framing them together ready for use, or, he is "devising some deceitful and malicious purpose," some real iniquity, and in due time he will bring it out. Fry has it, He surmiseth evil. One of the greatest afflictions of good men is that they are not judged fairly, nor have their motives rightly construed. Evil surmisings are among the most mischievous acts of human wickedness. They soon burst forth in slanderous words and uncharitable deeds. When he goeth abroad, he telleth it. Pent up malice will break out in some form, sooner or later.

7. All that hate me whisper together against me. Conspiracy and falsehood are appropriately represented in all good writings as first muttered. The whisperer of the Bible is one of the worst characters, Prov. xvi. 28; Rom. i. 29; 2 Cor. xii. 20. The Hebrew is here very idiomatic: Together against me they whisper, all my haters. The action is first declared, then the actors, then their unanimity. Against me do they devise my hurt. Hurt is evil, damage. When one man sets himself to manufacture falsehoods, and to invent modes of injuring another, he sometimes accomplishes much; but when a number of the ill-disposed put their heads together, they can do a deal of mischief, especially if they are so far sunk in sin as to go to praying over their wickedness.

8. An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him. Evil disease, literally, a word of Belial. For word we have the authority of the Chaldee, Syriac, Septuagint, Vulgate, Montanus, Musculus, Cocceius, Gejerus, Venema, Bythner, Gill, Hammond, Alexander and others. Belial signifies nothingness, worthlessness, or destruction. A man of Belial is a worthless or wicked man. If we read word, then the meaning is, some foul or terrible reproach, some hellish crime, is fastened on him, so that his character is ruined. This is the easiest mode of explanation, and agrees with the next clause: And now that he lieth he shall rise up no more. "The calumniator may destroy and ruin, as well as the pestilence." Slanderers often foolishly think that they have forever prostrated the just. Others understand by evil disease, some 'devilish thing, something which cannot be accounted for in a natural way.' That we may read thing is beyond dispute, Ps. ci. 3. Either interpretation is pertinent. The first is preferable.

9. Yea, mine own familiar friend in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me. Mine own familiar friend, literally the man of my peace. Oriental notions of hospitality were utterly opposed to treachery in host or guest. To eat of one's bread did also sometimes signify an honorable dependence, to forget which could not but have been an act of basest ingratitude. This verse is partly quoted by Christ in application to Judas, John xiii. 18. But he neither calls Judas the man of my peace, nor does he say, I trusted in him. Our Saviour never in his heart confided in Judas, but knew that he was a devil, John vi. 70. But Judas did hold an honorable post in Christ's family and did eat of his bread. The verse is primarily fulfilled in the treatment David received at the hand of Ahithophel or such men; but David is so far the type of Christ that these words had also a fulfilment in our Saviour. To lift up the heel is to kick as the horse or ass does against his master. Instead of hath lifted up his heel against me, Mudge and Green read hath shown great treachery towards me.

10. But thou, O LORD, be merciful unto me, and raise me up, that I may requite them. The form of the mercy here desired was such entire recovery from his distressed condition as to be able to bring to an account his bitter foes. A restoration short of this would be but a sad continuance of his affliction. To the innocent and the injured it is a blessed day when God lifts up their heads above all their enemies round about. In all contests, where either the righteous or the wicked must from the nature of the case triumph, it is right for all good men to desire the total defeat of the cruel and malignant. Nor do the Scriptures, which forbid all malice, prohibit public persons in authority from executing vengeance. If this verse, as some think, relates to Christ, it is his intercession for his own glorious reward, in which he should make a show of his enemies openly, triumphing over them in his cross, and receiving from God the Father glory and honor.

11. By this I know that thou favorest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me. The general truth of this verse is illustrated in the history of every good man. The foot of David sometimes well nigh slipped, but the Lord held him up. The wicked can go no further than Jehovah pleases. They never gain the final victory. If the Saviour is through his type, David, still the speaker here, then how marvelously did he always defeat his great adversary. The prince of darkness never had such a blow struck against his kingdom as on Mount Calvary. Alexander: "The last verb means properly to shout or make a noise as a sign of exultation, more especially in war." See 1 Sam. xvii. 20.

12. And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and settest me before thy face forever. Integrity, the same word is also rendered uprightness, Job iv. 6; Pr. xxviii. 6. It is also rendered simplicity, 2 Sam. xv. 11. The Septuagint and Hengstenberg have blamelessness; Syriac, Vulgate and Ethiopic, innocence; Jebb, perfectness; Fry, perfection; Calvin, integrity or soundness. The most common rendering is integrity. God's people are upright, simple, sound, men of integrity. That absolute perfection is not claimed by David is clear from v. 4. Even the measure of uprightness attained by him was the fruit of divine grace. Thou upholdest [literally, thou hast upheld] me in mine integrity. In one place David prays for the blessing which he here says he had received: Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe, Ps. cxix. 117. To set before the face denotes approval and blessing. The perpetuity of the mercy here recorded is expressed both by the future form of the verb and by the word forever. This verse has an unlimited fulfilment in Messiah.

13. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. This doxology is well placed here whether we regard it as merely the conclusion of this Psalm, or as also the close of what the Jews call the first book of Psalms. Morison: "Similar additions have been made to the other divisions of the books of the Psalter." The terms of the doxology are plain and well understood. Blessed, as in Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46. "In the triumphant song of eternity angels and men shall unite; so that from age to age, from generation to generation, and from eternity to eternity, the Lord's name shall be praised." Amen, and Amen. Amen means sure, firm, then true, faithful. The Septuagint and Vulgate render it, So let it be. The Arabic erroneously substitutes a single Alleluiah for the double Amen. At the beginning of a sentence Amen is a solemn mode of asseveration, Matthew xviii. 3; John iii. 3. At the close of a sentence, it expresses a wish that what has been said may be found true, and a confidence that it shall come to pass. It is twice applied to God in one verse, and is there rendered truth, Isa. lxv. 16. It is one of the titles of Christ, Rev. iii. 14.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The union between Christ and believers is so close that even prophets in describing the conflicts and victories of the saved often describe those of the Saviour himself and vice versâ. We suffer with him; and he was tempted in all points like as we are. Commentators, even the best, are often in doubt whether a prophet is speaking of himself, or of some other man. This commonly produces no harmful perplexity. Christ and his people are one.

2. Wicked as the world is, charitable judgments concerning all humble and patient sufferers are not only most conducive to personal happiness, but are actually nearest the truth. God's blessing is on those, who rightly consider the cases of affliction known to them, v. 1. Harsh judgments concerning our fellow-men are common and grievous sins.

3. Although we may fitly judge ourselves with a severity, which would ill become us in judging others, yet it is a blessed thing to be able to hold fast a well-grounded confidence of our interest in Christ, and to take cheerful views of our own case, when we are poor, or sick, or afflicted, or forsaken, v. 1.

4. Wherever we go, we may expect to meet with those, who need our compassion. This is implied in v. 1. It is declared elsewhere, "Ye have the poor always with you."

5. Right thoughts will produce right actions. He that properly considereth the poor will be sure to open the hand, and secure the blessings of charity; and they are many—even blessednesses, v. 1. Henry: "Liberality to the poor is the surest and safest way of thriving; such as practise it may be sure of seasonable and effectual relief from God." We know who it is that said: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me;" and, "It is more blessed to give than to receive." Morison: "We cannot bless others without being blessed ourselves."

6. But in all our acts of supposed charity let us carefully scrutinize our motives. There is reason to fear many have no genuine, Christian principle in kind deeds towards men. Prodigality is not beneficence.

7. The penitent poor and he, who cares for such, shall alike have deliverance in time of trouble, v. 1.

8. Yea, the righteous shall also be preserved and kept alive, v. 2. The narrow escapes of almost any good man, if well written, would form a wonderful chapter, if not a volume. Such deliverances as are wrought for the saints are themselves good, and pledges of good things yet to come.

9. The benevolent and beneficent man shall have many temporal good things: He shall be blessed on the earth, v. 2. Compare Ps. xxxvii. 16; Pr. x. 22. Dickson: "None of the godly man's afflictions shall hinder or take away his begun blessedness, even in this world."

10. Much as Satan and wicked men resemble ravenous wild beasts, greedy for their prey, and surely as they think they have secured it, yet they shall not in a single case get the soul that makes God his refuge. God will not deliver him unto the will of his enemies, v. 2.

11. We may all reasonably calculate on being both sick and sad. We ought to prepare for such trials. They are needful for our sanctification. When they shall come, we shall need strength and help. Henry: "God has not promised that his people shall never be sick, nor that they shall not lie languishing, nor that their sickness shall not be unto death; but he has promised to enable them to bear their affliction with patience, and cheerfully to wait the issue." We shall then need strengthening and soothing, v. 3, which none but God can give. "When he giveth quietness who can make trouble?" Job xxxiv. 29. "I am calm, because I am in the hands of a calm God," said Mrs. Hewitt.

12. Sickness of soul is the worst disease, v. 4. Scott: "Nothing is so distressing to the contrite believer, as a sense of the divine displeasure, guilt on his conscience, and the prevalence of sin in his heart: pain and sickness will remind him to pray especially for pardoning mercy, and for the healing of his soul, which is wounded and diseased, because he has sinned against the Lord."

13. Let us continue our cry for mercy however long our trials may last, or however great our prosperity may be, v. 4. We always need God's gracious compassion. Blessed is he, who feels this truth. Anything is good for us, if it makes us loathe ourselves, and penitently sue for mercy. Let affliction in its worst forms assail us, if it but make our consciences tender, abase us for past follies, and show us the hideous nature of sin and the preciousness of redemption.

14. The tongue is a world of iniquity, v. 5. Evil speaking is no new thing.

15. If the wicked had their way in this world, they would not leave a remnant of the pious, nor a vestige of goodness, v. 5. Utter destruction and misery would be in their ways. The hatred of Cain to Abel was the type of all malice against the church.

16. Impudent hypocrisy and foul double-dealing have antiquity on their side, v. 6. Insincerity is always odious, but peculiarly so, when it comes with its grimaces to the sanctuary, and with its whines of pretended sympathy to the house of mourning and affliction. Beware of men. There must be a hell as well as a heaven. A just God will not put sincere Christians and vile hypocrites into the same company.

17. No man knows the falsehoods whispered, or the plots muttered against him, v. 7. But God knows all wicked devices. He can defeat the counsel of Ahithophel, and rebut the slanders of many. Our safety is in his omniscience, as well as in his omnipotence and boundless mercy.

18. If ill will and ill words could have destroyed the church, long since she would have been rased to the foundations, v. 8. Compare Ps. cxxiv. 1-5; Isa. i. 9; Rom. ix. 29. But the Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the tents of Jacob.

19. The spirit of prophecy is the testimony of Jesus, v. 9. Everywhere in Moses, in the Psalms, and in all the prophets even as many as have spoken, we find hints, allusions, types, or direct predictions of Christ. The more calumnious and murderous our foes, the closer should we cling to his doctrine, his example and his person. He, who would pass to glory without the hatred, contempt and ingratitude of the wicked, cannot know the fellowship of our Lord's sufferings, Phil. iii. 10. If friends turn to foes, let us turn the more to him, who commendeth his love to us in that while we were yet enemies he died for us.

20. It has often happened that a man's foes were they of his own house. It was so with David. It was so with Christ, v. 9. If the wicked should now act differently we should suspect the truth of revelation.

21. It is marvellous that the wicked are not alarmed at the thought that every step they take in sin is contrary to the prayers of saints, v. 10. The cause which cannot succeed, except by God's refusal to hear the prayer of faith offered by his whole church every day, must be absolutely desperate and forlorn.

22. Let us commit our cause to him that judgeth righteously, fully purposing to do all that is right, and leaving results with him, v. 10. Dickson: "Every believer may be assured of this, that what injuries are done to Christ in his person, Christ shall requite his persecutors."

23. We ought therefore to pray earnestly, and we may pray in hope that the wicked may not triumph, but be effectually put down, v. 10.

24. There are always some tokens for good to the righteous, v. 11. If they are troubled on every side, yet they are not distressed; if they are perplexed, yet they are not in despair; if they are persecuted, yet they are not forsaken; if they are cast down, yet they are not destroyed; if they are sorrowful, yet they rejoice in tribulation; if the rod of the wicked falls, yet it does not rest on the lot of the righteous; if their feet well nigh slip, yet the Lord holds them up; if their enemies do get the foot of pride on their necks, yet they cannot quite stamp them into dust. And then when they begin to rise, let Haman and all like him look out! Esth. vi. 13.

25. God's people are a generation of upright men. They are simple. They are honest, not deceitful, not double-tongued, not knavish. They are men of integrity. They would rather be right and be thought wrong, than be wrong and be thought right. Yet a good man does not covet reproach, but esteems a good name above great riches.

26. Even in this world, in the long run, innocence under a cloud is better than iniquity in its gaudiest glitter. Dickson: "Uprightness is a special means to bring a man through difficulties, and whatsoever infirmities the believer be subject unto, he shall not want comfort, if he keep conscience of integrity, uprightness and sincerity. This is the Psalmist's rejoicing," v. 12. It was Paul's also, 2 Cor. i. 12.

27. If any of us have integrity, real excellence of character, it is all owing to God's mercy and grace to us, upholding us in it, v. 2. It is a demand of common honesty for us to say so.

28. God loves his own image and approves his own workmanship, v. 12. Alexander: "As man sets God before him as an object of trust, so God sets man before him as an object of protection."

29. The worship of God by doxology is very ancient, v. 13. It seems to have been among the earliest methods of devotion, Gen. ix. 26; xiv. 20; xxiv. 27; Ex. xviii. 10. The New Testament gives us a rich variety of doxology. This kind of worship greatly abounds in the temple above.

30. Let us learn to say amen to every suitable doxology, thanksgiving, prayer, confession and adoration. An audible amen is no indecency in the house of God, if seasonably and reverently made. But we should always say it in our hearts. Pool: "The doubling of the word shows the fervency of his spirit in this work of praising God."

PSALM XLII.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah.

- 1 As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.
- 2 My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?
- 3 My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?
- 4 When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holyday.
- 5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance.
- 6 O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar.
- 7 Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.
- 8 Yet the Lord will command his lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.
- 9 I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?
- 10 As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; while they say daily unto me, Where is thy God?
- 11 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

ON To the chief Musician see on title of Psalm iv. On Maschil, Instruction, see on title of Psalm xxxii. The rest of the title is not clear. Some regard the sons of Korah as the authors. Such supply in the title A Psalm, as we do in title of Psalms xi. xiv. It is also true that instead of for we may read of as in title of Psalm iii. and often. Against the authorship of the sons of Korah, it may be stated 1, that in no Psalm whose origin we know, are two or more persons united in the authorship. 2, Ps. lxxxviii. is also said to be "for the sons of Korah," and yet it is added that it is Maschil, or an Instruction "of Heman the Ezrahite." Nor does it weaken this statement though we should admit that Heman was probably one of the sons of Korah. 3. There is reason for regarding David as the author. It is written as of one man, and not as of many. It says, I, mine, me, and not we, our, us as in Ps. cxxxvii. where the afflictions of a people are described. It well suits the case of David in his long exile from Jerusalem in the days of Saul. As the Psalms were designed for the temple, it is not probable that the private experience of any obscure person would be made the theme of public worship. The geographical position of David in his exile corresponds with that noted in v. 6, i. e., it was in the land of Jordan and of Hermon. Hengstenberg, however, thinks David's experience is the subject of the Psalm and that one of the sons of Korah was its author, and sang it "as from the soul of David." With him agrees Tholuck. But we have no right to say that one man composed it, if the title ascribes it to several. Besides, as Alexander says, "It is a much more obvious supposition that David himself wrote it to express his own feelings at a particular juncture of his history." 4. The great weight of authority is on the side of the Davidic authorship. So the Syriac, Rabbi Moses, Calvin, Bellarmine, Gussetius, Piscator, Fabricius, Cocceius, Patrick, Gill, Dodd, Jebb, Hammond, Morison, Horne, Scott and Alexander. Add to this that Ps. xliii. is commonly admitted to have been written by the author of this, and that the Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Syriac all give David as the author of that Psalm.

If David wrote it, or even if he is the subject of it, to what period in his life does it refer? Several incline to the notion that it points to the time of Absalom's rebellion. But it as well suits the time when Saul drove David from the sanctuary. Moreover, the rebellion of Absalom was of too short continuance to make the language of this Psalm so appropriate to that occasion as to David's former exile. But who were the sons of Korah? These opinions have more or less prevailed. One is that they sprang from some one of that name in the days of David. Mudge and others think the sons of Korah were a society of musicians, founded or presided over by Korah. Others think that the sons of Korah were the surviving descendants of that miserable man who, together with two hundred and fifty of his adherents, who were princes, perished, when "the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah." In Num. xxvi. 11 we read: "Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not." They had taken the warning given, and had departed from the tents of those wicked men, Num. xvi. 24, 26. It must be admitted that the name Korah, and the patronymic Korahite are found in the Scriptures in a way that creates considerable doubt respecting the particular man from whom the Korahites are named. See 1 Chron. i. 35; ii. 43; vi. 22, 54; ix. 19; xxvi. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 19. Yet the more common belief is that they descended from him who perished for his gainsaying. This view is taken by Ainsworth with entire confidence, by Gill and others. Korah, who perished, was a Levite. Whatever may have been their origin, it is clear the sons of Korah were "a Levitical family of singers." Nothing then could be more appropriate than the dedication of a sacred song to these very people. Samuel the prophet was of this family. Some have thought that this Psalm and the forty-third form a pair; and some have even united them into one composition. In as many as thirty manuscripts, the Hebrew copyists have transcribed them as if they were but one composition. But in other MSS. they are divided. Their being placed near together may be owing to mere accident. Alexander thinks that the next Psalm was actually written as an appendix or continuation of this. See Introduction, § 12. Morison: "It does not appear that any regular order has been preserved in the disposal of the various materials of this Book. They seem rather to have been inserted as they presented themselves to the attention of the collectors." This is the first Psalm in what the Jews called the Second Book of Praises. But that division was a human invention. See Introduction, § 11. Scott dates it B. C. 1021. In it we have three names of the Most High, Jehovah LORD, El God and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; iii. 2. The Psalms inscribed to the sons of Korah have been thought remarkable for the frequent use of Elohim.

The scope of this Psalm is not always agreed upon. The Syriac says this is "a Psalm of David sung when he was an exile, and desired to return to Jerusalem." The Arabic calls it "a prayer for the Jews who had fallen," or backslidden. Luther and Hengstenberg think the best insight is gained by duly regarding God as sometimes hiding his face and then clearly revealing himself in mercy as a light and deliverer.

1. As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God. The public worship of God as ordained in his sanctuary was to pious Jews the liveliest representation of spiritual good things. Even when they were in distant countries they prayed towards their holy temple. David, now in exile, breaks forth into intense longings for communion with God. Some have expounded this verse and the next as if all the Psalmist desired was to revisit the tabernacle. But truly pious men were never satisfied with the ordinances of God without the God of ordinances. Alexander: "The first noun is masculine, but the verb feminine; so that we may either read hart or hind." The Septuagint, by using the feminine article, pronounces for hind. The other ancient versions have it hart or stag. Panteth, or brayeth, as in the margin and some others, or desireth, as the Septuagint. In Joel i. 20, cry. The hind is said to be more thirsty than the hart. But either of them hunted over the hills or plains of Judea was an exceedingly fit emblem of a soul intensely longing for some absent good. Water-brooks, fountains of waters, streams of waters, or springs of waters. See on Ps. xviii. 15. In the sanctuary everything reminded the devout worshipper of God.

2. My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God? The first and last word here rendered God is Elohim; the second, El. The verb is the same as in the preceding verse. The repetition of the declaration shows the intensity of the desire. No doubt the pious Jew thought much of the tabernacle, the shew bread, the altar, the sacrifices, the visible glory and other things pertaining to the temple. But the God of Jacob, who made a Bethel in a desert, could always make any place the gate of heaven. Evidently more is here meant than a mere longing for the privilege of public worship. Piety, which has its seat in the soul, consists much in communion with God, not in rites and forms. Hengstenberg: "The longing of the Psalmist is described as directed towards God himself, not towards the place of his worship." True piety engages the affections. It awakens the longings of the soul. Because the best men are very imperfect and have but low actual attainments, true piety in this life consists very much in desires after holiness. The knowledge of God, his favor, his image, his soul-cheering presence and the hopeful prospect of dwelling forever with him are objects of sufficient worth and excellence to draw out the heart of the best and greatest of men. What a wondrous revelation of these we have in the person, work and sufferings of Christ! "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." Scott: "David longed and mourned after the courts of God: but still more for the living God himself; for his presence, and favor, and those pleasures which he had enjoyed in communion with him." The living God, not dead as mere idols are, Ps. cvi. 28; 1 Thess. i. 9; or living, in the sense of active, powerful, Ps. xxxviii. 19; Heb. x. 31; or living, as a fountain, Jer. xvii. 13. This longing for God was increased by the taunts of the ungodly.

3. My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God? They who can do nothing but shed tears, commonly must shed those tears alone. Mankind are so busy, each one with his own affairs, the human heart has so little genuine philanthropy in it, and overtures of sympathy have been so often met with ingratitude, that sadness is commonly left solitary. Oftentimes human wickedness makes things worse than ever. It charges the subjects of distress with hypocrisy and wickedness. Or, it declares the sufferer's case to be hopeless. Where is thy God? q. d., God has deserted you; you may as well give up all hope. By saying that tears were his meat [or bread] day and night, he declares that he had lost his appetite for his food, and found no relief but in continual weeping. See Ps. lxxx. 5. The taunt, Where is thy God? has obvious reference to strong confidence formerly and publicly professed. It denies God's covenant relation and faithfulness to David. Steir: "Although the railers may not incessantly cause such things to be heard, yet the oppressed soul continually hears their railery clanging in itself."

4. When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me. These verbs are by Venema, Marloratus, Hengstenberg and Alexander rendered in the future; by the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic, in the preterite; but Calvin, church of England, Vatablus, Piscator, Amesius, Ainsworth, Fabritius, Mudge, Green, Waterland, Edwards, Jebb, Horsley, Fry and Tholuck agree with our common version. This makes as good sense as we gain in any other way. For things Boothroyd and Edwards read times. This does not vary the sense. These things are those mentioned in the context—his former privileges, his present banishment from God, his want of comfortable communion with God, and the remembrance of his present condition compared with what it had been. For I pour out my soul in me; Chaldee: I will pour out upon me the thoughts of my soul; Syriac: My soul was troubled; Ainsworth: I pour out upon me my soul. The sense of the phrase is well expressed by the Syriac though our version is more literal. For I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holy day. The memory of this greatly troubled him. The variations in the renderings of this part of the verse are considerable. But they either greatly disregard the Hebrew text; or they so overstrain the matter as hardly to merit an extended notice; or they do substantially justify the common version. For I had gone some read marched. The procession that ascended Mount Zion to the temple was very solemn, orderly, and imposing. Hengstenberg: "The use of music in the processions is clear," 2 Sam. vi. 5. Solemn dancing was not unknown at such times, 2 Sam. vi. 14. Thoughts on these scenes so depressed David, that he would have quite despaired, but that God enabled him to administer timely reproof and exhortation to his own soul:

5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? His dejection and disquiet were great. Present appearances were against any hope of a change for the better; enemies were rancorous; his condition was sad and forlorn; but the covenant and its promises stood firm. Hope thou in God, i. e., confide in God, trust in God. Jebb and Alexander: Wait thou for God; Ainsworth: Wait hopefully for God; Green and Fry: Wait patiently for God. For so doing the Psalmist had cause: For I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance. To faith the darkest night has a star of hope. Adverse providences may be followed by happy results. Praise, as in Ps. ix. 1; xxx. 4. The countenance or face was a term well understood among the Hebrews from the days of Aaron, Num. vi. 25, 26; see above on Ps. iv. 6. By the help literally helps, supports, salvations of God's countenance every conflict is at last decided in favor of the righteous. Calvin: "The countenance of God is taken for the manifestation of his favor." Even the hope of it keeps us from despair while the billows roll high.

6. O my God, my soul is cast down within me. Cast down, as in v. 5. In both verses the form is reflexive, q. d., My soul casts itself down. Within me, literally upon me. Therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermon- ites, from the hill Mizar. Two views may be taken of this passage. One is that David would remember God in order to cheer up his own soul. This is favored by the tense of the verb remember in the Hebrew. The common version and many others give this construction. The other is that thoughts of God troubled David. Those, who thus understand it instead of therefore, read when, because, or for that, and instead of will remember, have remember. The Hebrew future may be taken for the present where it is clearly required by the sense. See Introduction, § 6. Thus Calvin: O my God, my soul is cast down, when I remember thee. Ainsworth has much the same. But the common rendering is to be preferred. The geographical positions pointed out in this verse demand some notice. From the land of Jordan; some think it designates the region lying on both sides of the Jordan. This seems the more obvious view. Others think it denotes only the region beyond Jordan as one goes down from Jerusalem. So Calvin. Others suppose it has special reference to the region at the head waters of the Jordan. So Diodati. Others, among them Hengstenberg, think that the land of Jordan must be taken in connection with the next phrase, and of the Hermonites, and that these two designate generally the Transjordanic region. Pool takes all the phrases referring to geography not to designate a particular locality, but all the places and parts of the land, to which David might be driven. This gives a good sense and is accompanied with fewer difficulties than most of the others. But what are we to understand by the land of the Hermonites? The original word is plural of Hermon—Hermonim. The word in this form occurs no where else. It pretty certainly designates not a people, but a range of mountains, the Hermons, because there were several high points in the range to which this name was given, as we say the Alps, Alleghenies. The singular, Hermon, designates chiefly the Southern portion of Anti-Libanus. If a large mountainous region is designated by the Hermons, then we have the reason given for David's remembering God, viz. his remoteness from the sanctuary and his perils in that wild district. Mizar means little. The Chaldee understands Mount Sinai. But Piscator, church of England, Mudge and others understand some little hill in Hermon. Dodd: "Hermon probably rose in more eminences than one, and therefore is expressed plurally, one of them perhaps smaller than the rest is called here Mizar, the little one." The Septuagint, Arabic, Syriac, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Ainsworth, Amesius, Horsley, Tholuck and Hengstenberg all render it, from the little mountain. Ainsworth thinks that the singular may be here put for the plural; and that the author of the Psalm may refer to the Southern mountains, which compared with Hermon, were small. Lighfoot thinks Mizar is the same as Zoar, "near the extreme part of Jordan, close to the salt sea." There is no doubt that by these phrases conjointly the Psalmist would designate the general route of his wanderings. Pool thinks all these geographical terms equivalent to this: "From all the places and parts of the land to which I shall be driven." The passages supposed to refer to the same locality as Hermon, are Num. xxxiv. 7; Deut. iii. 8; Ps. lxxxix. 12.

7. Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts. John Rogers' Translation: One depe calleth another wyth the voyce of thy whystles; Genevan: One deepe calleth another deepe by the noyse of thy water spoutes; church of England: One deep calleth another, because of the noise of thy water-pipes. Deep, often rendered abyss. The representation is that of one ready to perish in the sea, when it is agitated by high winds, and when water-spouts add to the peril. Some think the whole imagery of the verse is probably taken from the Noachic flood. However this may be, miseries multiplying upon us have long been compared to a tempestuous sea with angry and heavy clouds passing over it. The great home of waterspouts is Cape Horn and the adjacent waters; but Shaw saw them at three points on the coast of Syria. They at times visit all tropical and temperate latitudes. Anderson: "A water-spout is a large tube or cylinder formed of clouds, by means of the electric fluid, the base being uppermost, and the point let down perpendicularly from the clouds. It has a particular kind of circular motion at the point; and being hollow within attracts vast quantities of water; which it frequently pours down in torrents on the earth or the sea." It is a great terror to seamen. If one empties itself on a ship she is gone. All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me. He was in a sea of troubles. For waves and billows some read breakers and floods. Both terms point to huge masses of agitated waters. There could be no fitter mode than that here adopted, of describing great troubles, some from men here below, and some direct from God. Yet great as were his sorrows and temptations, he was not in despair.

8. Yet the LORD will command his lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life. It is well when hope puts on her helmet, and mirth sings her song, and faith at the same time offers up her prayer. Command is a word of authority. Lovingkindness, kindness, mercy, goodness, favor; see on Ps. v. 7; xvii. 7. The Lord's song is the song of thanksgiving. The God of my life is the God who gave and preserves my life. The prayer is not that of sadness but of cheerfulness of heart. The Arabic, Edwards and Hengstenberg put the verb command in the present tense; Vulgate, church of England, Boothroyd and Hammond, in the preterite; Fry has the optative form. Our version and many others of high authority properly follow the original. God's servant, in the darkest state of his affairs, still relied on Jehovah, thankfully praising him and devoutly praying to him.

9. I will say unto God my rock. The word here rendered God is El. Rock, as in Ps. xviii. 2. Why hast thou forgotten me? Remembering denotes care, support, reward; so forgetting denotes neglect, forsaking, consigning to misery, Judges xvi. 28; 1 Sam. i. 11; Neh. xiii. 14; Luke xxiii. 42; Gen. xl. 23; Judges iii. 7; Ps. lxxvii. 9; cvi. 21. It seemed as if God had deserted David's cause. But the prophet filled his mouth with arguments. He humbly expostulated against the Lord's desertion of him and his cause. Prayer may have great vehemence and strong argument in it. Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? Mourning, i. e., squalid, with garments covered with dust and ashes, as was the manner of mourners, see on Ps. xxxv. 14. The weight of the evil brought on us by adversaries is sometimes all but intolerable. It greatly oppresses us. Yet the righteous may earnestly plead with God for the removal of so great a calamity. His honor and their purity demand it, Ps. cxxv. 3.

10. As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me: while they say daily unto me, Where is thy God? The taunt and derision of the question in this verse are the same as in v. 3. David says they were like a sword in his bones. For sword the margin and Chaldee read killing; Hengstenberg and Alexander, murder; Ainsworth, murdering weapon; in Ezek. xxi. 22, the same word is rendered slaughter. It describes excruciating pain.

11. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him. Thus far the verse is quite as the beginning of v. 5. It is added, Who is the health of my countenance, and my God. The variation of this clause from the corresponding clause in v. 5 is that here we have my countenance for his countenance. This ought to appear in any version. There is no reason for correcting the text. It is right already. Such changes are natural and beautiful. Health, in v. 5, help; see Ps. iii. 2, 8; most commonly salvation, then help, welfare, deliverance, health, saving health; here and in v. 5 plural.

The health of my countenance is he, who graciously looks on me and gives me boldness when otherwise I should sink into despair. Alexander: "And my God is not an unmeaning or gratuitous addition, but has reference to the taunting question in the preceding verse, Where is thy God?"

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Love to God's house is of the essence of true piety. It always has been so, v. 1. There is no piety without a devotional spirit; and that spirit is always gratified in the assemblies of the saints. Even the memory of hours spent in the delights of public worship is cheering to one deprived of the ordinances.

2. Dickson: "It is not a bare formal use of the ordinances, but communion with God himself, which the lively believer seeketh after, in the use of public ordinances," v. 1.

3. Ought not those, who leave the churches of our old settlements, to see to it that some provision be made for edifying public worship in the places where they settle? Ought not those, who go into voluntary exile from God's worship, to suspect that all is not right? Can it be safe for them, of their own accord, to do what it so grieved David to be compelled to do? v. 1.

4. It would greatly promote true religion, if all God's people would put a just estimate on the privileges of public worship, vv. 1, 2. Henry: "Sometimes God teaches us effectually to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and whets our appetite for the means of grace, by cutting us short in those means."

5. True religion consists much more in longing desires for more grace and knowledge, than in being satisfied with that, which we have attained, vv. 1, 2. Compare Matt. v. 6. The Saviour represents the desires of the pious, after holiness both by hunger and thirst; David by thirst only. Thirst is said to be more tormenting than hunger.

6. It is a blessed thing to be able to mourn an absent God and to desire his soul-cheering presence, v. 2. It is better to weep and cry for lost spiritual privileges and comforts with a relish even for their memory, than it is to be at ease in the fulness of earthly comforts. Godly mourning is better than carnal rejoicing.

7. True religion is ever the same and always produces similar effects on character, v. 2.

8. As the ordinances, without God's blessing, do not satisfy a believer, so also the most precious seasons of devotion on earth do awaken in him heavenly-mindedness, and great longings to participate in the worship of the temple not made with hands, vv. 1, 2. There sin never mars delight. There the face of Jesus in his glory shines on every redeemed soul. There floods of glory and salvation fill the soul with ineffable delight.

9. It is no new thing for good men to be filled with anguish and to pour out tears day and night, v. 3. The happiest may soon be plunged into the deepest distress. Wicked men, fallen angels, God's providences, dismal fears, loss of courage, banishment from home and a thousand frightful forms of ill may all be against us.

10. It is a favorite device of the great adversary and his minions to attempt in various ways to drive believers to despondency and even to despair, v. 3. If they cannot destroy, they are determined to torment God's people.

11. Taunts are no novelty. The greatest and best of men need not be surprised at them. Reproach is a sword, vv. 3, 10. Calvin: "Whenever the ungodly triumph over us in our miseries, and spitefully taunt us, saying that God is against us, let us never forget that it is Satan who moves them to speak in this manner to overthrow our faith." Let the wicked spit their spite, but let us be steadfast with God.

12. Appearances of help are often wanting when succor is at hand, vv. 3, 10. The darkest hour in the history of man's redemption was just before the resurrection of Christ.

13. Even if the memory of past joys has some tendency to deepen present distress, yet it is best not to forget them, for he, who once filled our mouth with praise, can bring back the days when the candle of the Lord shined upon us, v. 4.

14. When tempted to despond, we must rally and exhort ourselves by a consideration of the truths suited to our cases, vv. 5, 11. Dejection is not the offspring of piety. We must have faith and hope in God, or we must lose our cause.

15. It is a great mercy that we may tell God all our sorrows and griefs, v. 6. He has an ear to hear and a heart to feel for all our woes.

16. No situation in life, no anguish of mind, no cares or duties can justify us in forgetting God, v. 6. We must call him to mind, though nothing but our wants and sorrows in a howling wilderness remind us of him.

17. Let none be surprised at the violence of temptations, v. 7. They often come in like a flood. Onset succeeds onset, until we are ready to yield. But the only thing that ever lost a believer the victory was cowardice.

18. Let all prepare for the worst. We may well expect sorrow upon sorrow. In David's case deep called unto deep. One unclean spirit often brings seven others with him.

19. All our hope is in the lovingkindness of the Lord, v. 8. We need no other ground of peace and joy.

20. We may lawfully be very earnest and urgent with God for his gracious interposition, v. 9. It is eminently fit for God to undertake cases which without divine assistance are hopeless.

21. The loss of God's gracious presence and of the light of his countenance constitutes the greatest grief of pious souls, v. 4.

22. Some rely wholly on past experience without inquiring how it is now with them. Others forget all God has done for them as soon as new troubles rise. Let us avoid both these errors. Tholuck: "Those who are rich in past experience possess in it an eminence from which they may also enjoy genial prospects of the future.

23. However evils may press upon us now, if we are saints, good days are coming; and if we are saints and have good times now, still better are coming, vv. 5, 11. Redemption draweth nigh. We shall soon be forever with the Lord.

24. In every extremity let believers plead their covenant relation with God, saying, Thou art my God, v. 11. This will sustain them when all else fails. Often this is all they can do. Dickson: "Although the Lord, for a time, shall neither remove the outward affliction nor inwardly give comfort, yet faith will sustain itself by the covenant, and lay its whole weight upon it."

25. This Psalm shows that of old, as in modern times, the saints had groanings which cannot be uttered.

26. To all true Christians "the house of the Lord is where the word of God, and the promise of grace are preached;" where Christ is held up as the hope of glory, and a heaven of sinless holiness promised to the faithful.

PSALM XLIII.

1 Judge me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation: oh deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man.

2 For thou art the God of my strength: why dost thou cast me off? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

3 Oh send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles.

4 Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy: yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God my God.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

IN Hebrew this Psalm has no title. Syriac: A Psalm of David when Jonathan informed him that Saul desired to slay him, and a prayer of the prophet. He also speaks lightly of the Jews; Arabic: A prayer for the Jews who had backslidden; Septuagint: A Psalm of David. All these are unwarranted. Kennicott, Lowth, Horne, Mudge, Edwards, Horsley, Tholuck, Cobbin and others make it a part of Ps. xlii. Williams: "The Jewish choristers having, on some occasion, found the anthem too long, have divided it for their own convenience, (no uncommon thing among choristers;) and being once divided, it was ignorantly supposed, it ought to be so divided." But this is a sweeping statement, with little to support it. Psalms xlii. and xliii. when united, contain fewer verses and less matter than many which the choir sang. Besides, the church of God has never so carelessly regarded her sacred writings as to allow such liberties. The want of a title proves not that this belongs to Ps. xlii. The reasons against uniting these two Psalms are given at length by Hengstenberg and Alexander. The authorship is pretty certainly the same as that of the xlii. Of the date we know nothing certainly. Scott gives it as B. C. 1021. In it we have two names of Jehovah, Elohim God and El God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4.

1. Judge me, O God. Chaldee: Judge me, O God, with the judgment of truth; Syriac: Judge my judgment, O God. We had the same verb in Ps. vii. 8; xxvi. 1; Ps. lxxxii. 3, defend. Fry: Give me justice, O God. And plead my cause; the same verb as in Ps. xxxv. 1, which see. Syriac: Undertake my defence; Arabic: Relieve me; Ainsworth: Plead my plea; Fry: Sustain my cause; Hengstenberg: Plead my quarrel; literally, Strive my strife, contend my contention. If we vary from the common version, we can get nothing better than, Conduct my controversy. The Septuagint, Calvin, Ainsworth and others have a pause after cause. But the Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate and others without any pause immediately add the clause, which we render against an ungodly nation. Chaldee, against an unjust race; Syriac, against a merciless people; Vulgate, a nation that is not holy; Calvin, a cruel nation; Mudge, an ungenerous people; Jebb, a people without mercy. The mass of the people showed unkindness to David whenever his life was sought. Of all foes none are more to be dreaded than a people unjustly excited against a great and good man, especially, one who has rendered eminent public services. Some of his foes were particularized: Oh deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man. This description so well suits the case of Ahithophel that some hence conclude that this Psalm certainly refers to Absalom's rebellion, in which that fox was the cunning adviser. But no wicked plot was ever conducted with candor and justice. It may describe any bitter, crafty foe. He, who designs or perpetrates a wrong against a good man, must either be very miserable, or must harden himself in crime by deliberate deceit.

2. For thou art the God of my strength. This is also rendered my God and my strength, also God my strength. Strength, also rock, fort, fortress, Judges vi. 26; Dan. ii. 19; Jer. xvi. 19. The most common rendering is strength; see on Ps. xxvii. 1. Why dost thou cast me off? Chaldee: Why hast thou forsaken me? Syriac: Why hast thou forgotten me? Arabic: Why hast thou driven me away? Calvin: Why art thou estranged from me? In the Hebrew the verb is in the preterite, but it expresses the act as continued to present time. He is deploring his exile from the house and public worship of God. Why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy? see on Ps. xlii. 9.

3. Oh send out thy light and thy truth. Darkness represents distress and danger; light, relief and deliverance. Here the light sought is that of the divine countenance, the favorable aspect of providence; see on Ps. iv. 6. Truth is the truth promised to David, involving the divine faithfulness. The Syriac reads thy faithfulness; the Arabic, thy equity. To send out or send forth light and truth is to bring them to bear on the case. Let them lead me. God can make darkness light and crooked things straight. His faithfulness never lets go its hold on believers. Let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles. Alexander: "The mention of the tabernacle and the holy hill shows that the Psalm is neither earlier nor later than the times of David and Solomon, before whom there was no holy hill, and after whom there was no tabernacle." Tabernacles, in the plural, may be thus explained: 1. There were different parts of the great tent, as we learn from many Scriptures. Paul fully explains this matter in Heb. ix. 1-8. So that the one tabernacle may be spoken of in the plural. 2. In David's time there were two tabernacles where God was duly worshipped, one in Mount Zion, as many Scriptures show; the other at Gibeon as we learn from 1 Chron. xvi. 37-39. So that in two ways we may justify the use of the plural.

4. Then will I go unto the altar of God. God, Hebrew, Elohim. Here is the vow, made in distress, as vows commonly are. It is a solemn pledge and engagement that he would make offerings to God before all Israel. Some regard these words as the expression of a hope that he shall be able to do these things. This may be so; but the other is the better explanation. Unto God my exceeding joy. God, Hebrew, El. Chaldee: My God, from whom is the joy of my exultation; margin, Jebb and Alexander: To God the gladness of my joy; church of England: Even unto the God of my joy and gladness. In his existence, personality, attributes, providence, word and salvation God is the source of unspeakable joy. Yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God, my God. Harp, see on Ps. xxxiii. 2. Praise is comely, even in times of distress, and the purpose to render it is always becoming. The covenant relation expressed in the words God, my God, was the foundation of perpetual confidence to David.

5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God. See on Ps. xlii. 11. Tholuck: "Having committed his cause to the Lord, he succeeds for the last time in appeasing his troubled soul."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is an unspeakable comfort to be able to ask God to judge us, v. 1. His judgment is true, impartial, not after appearances, but after the heart. He who can with a good conscience commit his way to God, has nothing to fear.

2. For where our cause is good, our Judge becomes our Advocate and pleads our cause, v. 1. When the Lord is on our side, it cannot go ill with us. He knows all truth. He is a Counsellor.

3. No public service, no piety, no benevolence, no humility can exempt God's servants from ill will and wrong doing in this wicked world. David had his foes, v. 1. Christ had his murderers.

4. The enemies of God's servants are often so many, so cruel, so cunning and so powerful, that it is a marvel they do not eat them up. Less grace, less aid than God affords would not meet their case.

5. As the righteous cannot practise the deceit and injustice, nor use the weapons employed against them, the only resource left them is to enlist God, v. 1.

6. The confidence which the righteous repose in God is not misplaced. He is the God of their strength, v. 2.

7. It is wise and profitable to inquire into the cause of our afflictions. Why dost thou cast me off? v. 2. A failure so to do leaves us without profit from our sorest trials.

8. One of the direst forms of affliction is the oppression of the wicked, v. 2. Man is cruel.

9. In the darkest hour on earth we may pray, we ought to pray, v. 3. We may always ask for light, truth, guidance, and comfort from the word of God.

10. Cobbin: "In some way or other we may expect that earnest prayer will meet with a gracious answer, v. 3. The faith of the Psalmist saw the successful end of his prayer, and transported him at once to the sacred altar. Such holy and ardent desires as he expressed will be sure to obtain an audience in heaven."

11. He who has no love for the house of God has no piety, v. 3. Henry: "Those whom God leads, he leads to his holy hill, and to his tabernacles; those therefore who pretend to be led by the Spirit, and yet turn their backs upon instituted ordinances, certainly deceive themselves."

12. It is optional with us whether in our affliction we will engage to do something we are not commanded to do. Even distress does not oblige us to vow. But when the vow is made, it must be kept, v. 4; Ecc. v. 5.

13. As under the law no fitter place for a sinner could be found than the altar of God where atonement was made by bloody offerings, so under the gospel the first thing every sinner should seek is the expiation of sin by the blood of Christ, v. 4. He is our Altar, Sacrifice, Lamb, Righteousness. Live in sight of the Cross.

14. God himself is the source of ineffable joy to all holy creatures, v. 4. Slade: "The faithful servant of God is always either delighting in him, or mourning after him." Heaven will chiefly consist in the enjoyment of God.

15. Seeing we have God for our exceeding joy, surely we ought never to be disheartened, nor faint by the way, v. 4. If outward things look dark, let us look to the throne of God. There all is radiant with glory.

16. On instrumental music in the worship of God, see REMARK No. 4, on Ps. xxxiii.

17. If seasons of terrible depression come, no strange thing has happened to us. The same came to the author of this Psalm. A horror of great darkness once fell on Abraham himself, Gen. xv. 12.

18. If temptation is sore, if afflictions multiply, if enemies are many and powerful, let us hold fast and firm God and his truth, v. 5. The more terrible the storm, the more necessary is the anchor, Heb. vi. 19. Hope in God.

PSALM XLIV.

To the chief Musician for the sons of Korah, Maschil.

1 We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old.

2 How thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand, and plantedst them; how thou didst afflict the people, and cast them out.

3 For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them.

4 Thou art my King, O God: command deliverances for Jacob.

5 Through thee will we push down our enemies: through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us.

6 For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me.

7 But thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us.

8 In God we boast all the day long, and praise thy name for ever. Selah.

9 But thou hast cast off, and put us to shame; and goest not forth with our armies.

10 Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy: and they which hate us spoil for themselves.

11 Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat; and hast scattered us among the heathen.

12 Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price.

13 Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us.

14 Thou makest us a byword among the heathen, a shaking of the head among the people.

15 My confusion is continually before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me, 16 For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth; by reason of the enemy and avenger.

17 All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant.

18 Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way;

19 Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death.

20 If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god;

21 Shall not God search this out? for he knoweth the secrets of the heart.

22 Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter.

23 Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever.

24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction and our oppression?

25 For our soul is bowed down to the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the earth.

26 Arise for our help, and redeem us for thy mercies' sake.

THE several parts of the title are explained on titles of Ps. iv. xxxii. xlii. The date and authorship are wholly uncertain. The Syriac says that it was sung by the people and Moses at Horeb. Calvin and Clarke regard it as probably belonging to the times of the captivity. Patrick and Edwards suppose it was written by Hezekiah. Geddes thinks it was written during the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes; while Scott conjectures that David was the author, and that it was written for the use of the church in all ages. Tholuck thinks it probably belongs to the time when Jehoiachin and thirty-two nobles were carried into captivity. There is nothing to justify us in dating it as early as the time of Moses. We do not find the chapters relied on, 2 Chron. xxix. xxxi; 2 Kings xviii. 13, 17; Isa. xxxvi. 1, sufficient evidence to date it in the times of Hezekiah. If we compare verses 17–22, with Dan. ix. 3–18, we can hardly refer it to the captivity. Geddes relies on 1 Maccabees i. ii., and supposes Matthias was the author. But we have no evidence that the canon of Scripture was enlarged at that time by the addition of a chapter or a song. The reign of Jehoiachin lasted but a few months, nor did the character of his people then correspond with the teachings of vv. 17-22. The most probable opinion is that it was written by David or one of his cotemporaries. To this there is no unanswerable objection. Many so hold. Theodoret and others make David speak prophetically of Antiochus Epiphanes, "who first hated and persecuted the Israelites on account of their religion," but who could not seduce them to idolatry. Paul quotes v. 22, as applicable to Gospel times, Rom. viii. 36. Calvin: "It is to be observed that the state of the church such as it was to be after the appearance of Christ is here described. Paul did not understand this Psalm as a description of the state of the church in one age only, but warns us that Christians are appointed to the same afflictions." But there is no good reason for denying that it describes a state of things existing in the lifetime of David, when there were much piety and prosperity, and yet some very painful events. Hengstenberg gives it the same historic occasion as that of Ps. lx. See 1 Kings xi. 15, 16; 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Chron. xviii. 12, 13; Ps. lx. cviii. Alexander thinks it cannot have a later date than the times of David. Any defeat to the arms of Israel produced the greatest public distress. See Josh. vii. 6. Any disaster in war to that remarkable people, owing to their peculiar relations to Jehovah, argued that he was angry with them. There is nothing gained by dividing the Psalm into various portions and making it dramatic. Its scope is pretty clear to the attentive reader. In it we find two names of Jehovah, Elohim God and Adonai Lord; on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4.

1. We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old. What we have heard with our ears is contrasted with what we now see. The former triumphant state of Israel made their present depressed condition the more sad, and furnishes an argument from what God had done to what he is desired to do. The work was the conquest of Canaan, or the marvellous delivery of the people in generations gone. We have a parallel to this verse in Judg. vi. 13. There is no need of confining, as some do, the historic reference of the verse to any one period of ancient history previous to the date of the Psalm.

2. How thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand, and plantedst them; how thou didst afflict the people, and cast them out. Many versions give the sense better than the English, owing to the indefinite nature of the pronoun them. Syriac: Thy hand destroyed the peoples, but those thou didst plant; thou didst trouble kingdoms, but those thou didst establish. Beyond reasonable doubt the word them or those, in both clauses refers to the Israelites, though our translators do not seem so to have understood the latter clause. Heathen, see on Ps. ii. 1, 8; ix. 5, 15, 17, 19, 20. People, see on Ps. ii. 1. Cast out has the sense of expelling in Gen. iii. 23; Isa. l. 1; in numerous places it signifies to multiply, propagate, cause to flourish, extend or stretch out, Ex. ix. 15; Num. xxi. 6; Ps. xviii. 14; lvii. 3; lxxviii. 25; lxxx. 11; Prov. vi. 14; Ezek. xvii. 7. Here it pretty certainly signifies to increase or cause to flourish as a branch. Diodati says, it is "a term borrowed from vines and other plants which do bud and spread abroad after they are planted and have taken root." Geddes: "The whole metaphor is taken from the vine or some other luxuriant tree." Edwards: "Thou madest them like young trees shoot forth their roots and branches." In the first clause we have God's people spoken of as planted; in this, as made to flourish, to increase. The Hebrew has it, Thou, thy hand. If this doubling has any signification, it is that beyond a doubt the work of conquering Canaan, and of establishing the Israelites in it, was the work of God alone. So the pious Jews did always confess.

3. For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favor unto them. Tholuck: "Israel had to fight for the possession of the land of Canaan. But faith knows that the strength in man is not his, but the Lord's, who has created heaven and earth. The Psalmist therefore confesses that it was the hand of God which brought those mighty feats to pass." Ecc. ix. 11. It is true the Israelites as they came out of Egypt and as they entered Canaan were very numerous; but their foes were far more so. The seed of Jacob in Egypt was trained to agriculture, brick-making and servile occupations, and not at all to the use of arms; while many of their foes learned war from their youth. Every victory they gained was clearly not by numbers, by discipline, by skill or by prowess; but by the Lord alone. Yea, his right hand, his arm, that is his skill and power, and the light of his countenance, the favoring aspects of his providence, gave them all they gained. Nor did Jehovah thus fight for them for any merit in any of them but because he had a favor unto them; literally, because thou didst like them, didst take pleasure in them, accept them, delight in them, 1 Chron. xxviii. 4; Ps. cii. 14; cxix. 108; lxii. 4. God's love to Israel was free, unmerited and amazing, and he gave them a land for which they did not labor, and cities which they built not, and vineyards and olive-yards which they planted not, Josh. xxiv. 13. In some cases neither sword nor bow were used; but hornets were the instruments of conquest, Josh. xxiv. 12. Since the fall of Adam all good things in the lot of any mere man are undeserved kindnesses.

4. Thou art my King, O God. Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and some modern versions read: Thou art thyself my king and my God, or, Thou art he, my king and my God. Walford: "The speaker throughout the Psalm is the church, which accounts for the use of both the singular and plural numbers in different parts." The change of person has here the significancy of converting history into argument, and of making a plea, from what God had done of old to his chosen people, in behalf of David and of every other true Israelite. Command deliverances for Jacob. Syriac and Arabic: Who hast commanded salvation for Jacob; Edwards: [My God] that commandeth the victories of Jacob. Amesius, Piscator, Fabritius, Calvin, Ainsworth, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander agree with the English version. The language is that of authority, which kings have. It is of frequent use. Jacob, i. e., the chosen nation, descended from him.
